I predict for this tariff bill a career of great success. I need not go into the reasons for this prediction, for whether the prediction prove correct or incorrect, the reasons therefor would not be interesting. But I feel justified in so predicting because of the fact that it is an honest and faithful effort to carry out the wishes of the people, expressed at the polls on election day. It is an honest effort to break down the wall that has protected a few at the expense of the many. It is an honest effort to readjust our commercial fabric in harmony with modern tendencies. It is a faithful effort to keep our promises. It is our plighted faith, our sacred honor, our life and all for which we fight to-day. And we ask the American people to be not frightened by the scarecrow placed before them by the Republican mischief makers, but to adjust themselves honestly and patriotically to the new duties with faith and hope and determination to prove the utter falsity of the doctrine that American energy, genius, brain, and courage can not conquer the markets of the world unless they are subsidized by the people's Government.

We have heard much of so-called Republican prosperity. We have seen the rich grow richer, and we have seen poverty and squalor and ignorance and vice increase in the great centers of our population. We have seen a few men pile up fortunes like Ossa upon Pelion, seeking later to soothe their consciences by the endowment of colleges and libraries, giving their bounty-gotten wealth back to those from whom they did not take it. We have seen the mansion of the magnate with one eye and with the other the hovel of the toiler. We have heard with one ear the music and laughter of the guilded salon and with the other the cry of hunger from the street. We have seen wealth centralized in the hands of a few to such an appalling extent that it is said now that 90 per cent of the total wealth of this Nation is owned by less than 10 per cent of the people. And yet this is called prosperity. Republican prosperity. God save us from such a prosperity. The mission of the Democratic Party to-day is so to adjust the laws of this Nation as to bring about equality before the law to every man, high and low alike. Not necessarily equality of brain or wealth or physical force, but equality of opportunity, and a Government which does not vouchsafe to its people equality of opportunity is not a free Government and can not long endure.

For what shall it benefit us to know that on yesterday we walked upon the mountain top, if to-morrow our children shall grope in the darkness of the valley? What shall it benefit us to know that yesterday we sat at a table laden with sweet morsels from the corners of the earth, if to-morrow our children shall feed upon the husks of the swineherd? What shall it benefit us to know that yesterday we basked in the splendor of palatial beauty, surrounded with all that art and wealth and culture can supply, if to-morrow we shall sit upon the doorstep of a stately poorhouse, a sovereign pauper? Give us, then, a prosperity which shall endure not for a day nor for ourselves alone, but one which may be bequeathed to all the people and for all time. A prosperity which shall be planted squarely upon the bedrock of eternal justice, instead of perpetual duplicity. A prosperity which shall not find its lodging place alone among those who need it not, but a prosperity which shall descend on all the people alike, as the refreshing rain descends from Heaven. A prosperity which shall find true realization in the Jeffersonian, Democratic, American doctrine of "Equal rights to all, and special privileges to none."

In the past, Mr. Chairman, when the people have called upon the Republican Party for relief from the burdens of unjust taxation they have acted as if they were of those who, having ears hear not, and having eyes see not. When the people have asked for free lumber in order that they might build humble homes in which to abide, the Republicans have responded by placing acorns upon the free list. When in the past the people have asked for cheaper fuel in order to keep their bodies warm, the Republican Party has responded by placing ashes on the free list. When in the past the people have asked for cheaper meat upon which to feed themselves and their children, the Republicans have responded by placing bones upon the free list. When we have asked for cheaper shoes, they have given us free spunk. When we have asked for cheaper milk, they have responded with free dragon's blood. When we have implored them to give us cheaper beef and pork, they have responded by placing hoofs and horns upon the free list. When we have asked for cheaper sugar, they have handed us untaxed ipecac. When we have prayed for cheaper iron and steel, they have responded by placing junk upon the free list. When we have asked for cheaper clothing so that we might protect ourselves from the winter's chill, they have cheerfully responded with free rags. When we have implored them to give us a cheaper beefsteak, they have replied by placing teeth upon the free list. When we have asked them for bread, they have responded with free apatite.

And so on, from bad to worse, the shameful story runs ad infinitum. But the dawn is now appearing. A better day is approaching. Democracy rules in this Nation and all is well. Along with acorns we give free lumber. Along with ashes we give free fuel. Along with bones and hoofs and horns we give free meat. Along with spunk we give them free hides and shoes. Along with dragon's blood we give them milk. By the side of ipecac we give them sugar. Along with junk, including the Republican Party, we give them cheaper iron and steel. Along with the rags we give them cheaper clothing. Along with teeth we give them beef, and along with apatite we have given them bread. Not only is this true, but through the income tax, which is now a part of our fundamental law by reason of the efforts of the Democratic Party, we shall shift some of the burdens of taxation from the poor to the shoulders of the rich. We shall lighten the load now borne by the workingman and transfer it to those who have prospered at his expense. We shall attempt to equalize the burdens of the Government no less than its benefits.

To this end, therefore, we invite the cooperation of all forward-looking, patriotic men. We ask your aid in establishing again the just doctrine of competitive superiority as against paternal favoritism. We ask for nothing except that justice may dwell among our people; that capital shall receive a fair profit upon its investment and energy; that labor may receive a full day's wage for a full day's work, and that he may go into a market where the laws of nature and of trade shall govern to buy the things that are necessary for his life. We believe this tariff bill will accomplish this purpose, and we open our faces to the rising sun with hope and confidence, inviting all who believe in genuine reform to join our ranks. The Democratic Party has always been the party of reform. It was the Democratic Party that first began to agitate the income tax. It was the Democratic Party that first began to agitate the question of the election of Senators by the people. It was the Democratic Party that first declared in favor of the publicity of campaign funds. It was the Democratic Party which first declared in favor of the physical valuation of railroads. It has been always the Democratic Party which has thundered against the abuses of benighted and defunct Republicanism, and it is to our party that the people look to-day for the redress of their grievances and the lightening of their burdens. Let us hope that its mission may not fail; that it may reconstruct the broken fragments of public confidence into a more enduring liberty, which shall find fruition in the realization of a government of, by, and for the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, as I recall how the people of this country have returned to their allegiance to the Democratic Party, after wandering off after false gods, I am reminded of an incident that occurred down in Christian County in the good old State of Kentucky. There was a young man who married a rich man's daughter, and by force of circumstances he was unable to make a conspicuous success at providing a living for them. Finally, after a large family had grown up about him, he said to his father-in-law, "If you will give me a team of mules and $200 I will go to Colorado and try to make an honest living for my family." The old man, weary of the burden himself, gave him the $200 and the team of mules, and the son-in-law started in his canvas wagon for Colorado, where they have to irrigate the soil in some places in order to get sufficient moisture to grow a crop. He planted his crop of corn, and when it got almost large enough to "lay it by," the irrigation became defective, the corn dried up, and he made nothing in Colorado. He said to his wife, "I guess we had better go down into Kansas. We can not make anything here. We do not understand this irrigation business, anyway." So he moved his family into Kansas, and the next year planted another crop of corn. When it reached the same period of development, one of those hot Kansas winds came along and parched it and dried it up, so that the corn crop was a failure in that State. His money was gone, his mules were thin, and he said to his wife, "I hate to go back to the old man, but I can not live out here. I am bound to go back, though it be humiliating to me. I know they will tease and torment me because I am returning to the parental roof, but I can not see my babies starve to death. I can not see them cry for the food and raiment which I can not give." So he loaded them in his canvas wagon and started back to Kentucky. All the way home he wondered what excuse he could give for returning, but just as he turned over the hill in sight of his old home, he saw a bunch of pokeberries in the corner of the fence. Stopping his wagon, he got out into the fence corner, pulled a bunch of the berries, mashed them into ink, and wrote on the side of his wagon his reasons for returning. And I think the reasons which he gave on the side of his wagon will apply with equal force as the reasons for the return of the American people to the fireside of Democracy at the present time. These were the reasons which he gave:

Colorado irrigation,
Kansas winds and conflagration,
High tariff and taxation,
Bill Taft's administration,
Roosevelt's vociferation,
Hell-fire and damnation,
Bring me back to my wife's relations.

[Laughter and applause.]

I trust that I am not incorrect in assuming that something of the same feeling actuated the American people and caused them to return to the fold of the Democratic Party, where "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" shall be the motto. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in his inaugural address, leaning down from the heights of altruism and talking down to his followers in a language that none of them understood, the President explained to them that the Nation was intending to use them "for a large and definite purpose." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

This gave general satisfaction until it was explained to them that it did not involve their employment in official capacity. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The Postmaster General, however, as the connecting link between altruism and appetite, is understood to be giving diligent consideration to a method of simplified civil-service examination of fourth-class postmasters, designed to give the Government an opportunity to use the brethren more largely for "definite purposes." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In this way the carnal man is being sustained while his rudimentary spiritual part is being ministered to by homeopathic suggestion.

Next to the last election the most interesting convulsion of nature is the Democratic rush for office.

In filing a bill of particulars of "the large and definite purpose" to which he conceives the Democratic Party to have been called by more than a million votes against them on the tariff question [laughter], the President starts with "a repeal of a tariff which cuts us off from our proper part in the commerce of the world, violates the just principles of taxation, and makes the Government a facile instrument in the hands of private interests."

This easily separates itself into three parts.

First. The present tariff "cuts us off from our proper part in the commerce of the world."

Second. It "violates the just principles of taxation."

Third. It "makes the Government a facile instrument in the hands of private interests."

This sounds realistic, and when the people heard it they shivered and felt a vague and sinister tariff influence going through their pockets and stealing away their commerce.

Mark Twain, commenting upon the maxim that "honesty is the best policy," says:

This is a superstition. There are times when the appearance of it is worth six of it.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

There is also a certain impressiveness about saying solemn things in a solemn way with solemnity.

THE INSPIRED INSTRUMENT.

The instrument by which, in the language of the President, the "commerce of the world" is to be opened to us, by which "the just principles of taxation" are to be established among us, and by which this Government is to be emancipated from the thraldom of "private interests," is this bill, framed after three weeks of testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, where only "private interests" were heard. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Let us examine how this bill proposes to give us a quitclaim deed to the commerce of the world, to whiten the ocean with ships running to and fro between our ports and the ports of other nations, and to keep the sea so hot with cabled orders for our products that parboiled whales will lie belly up all the way across. [Laughter and applause.]

Let us examine how this bill proposes to establish "just principles of taxation," so that all the taxable world with shining faces will stand waiting at our ports of entry and our income-tax offices, anxious to contribute to a tax millennium.

Let us examine how this bill proposes to loosen the strangle hold of "private interests" and banish them forever from unlawful sustenance.

"OUR PROPER PART."

First, then, what is our present commerce with the world and what is our "proper part" in it?

Last year the exports and imports of the international commerce of all the world amounted to $35,000,000,000. Of the exports of that commerce we sold 12.9 per cent and of the imports of that commerce we bought 9 per cent—that is, we sold more than we bought, and unless the fundamental bases of political economy are to be broken up and cast upon the rubbish heap of rejected theories, it is better to sell our surplus abroad and get other people's money for circulation among ourselves than it is to have no surplus and to buy abroad and send our money abroad to enrich other people at our own expense.

Therefore, our "proper part" in the commerce of the world would seem to be to sell all we can abroad and buy what we need, just as it is good business for a farmer to make his farm as productive as he can, sell what he can, and buy what he must.

Second, what is our domestic commerce, what is its relation to the commerce of the world, and why should we give it away to other nations?

Here in America we have a trade among ourselves of $36,000,000,000, in which we buy and sell among ourselves fifteen times as much as we sell abroad and twice as much as all the other nations of the world import.

Our water-borne traffic, coastwise and otherwise, connects with a network of 250,000 miles of railroad over which 61,000 locomotives are hauling the products of the prosperity of 100,000,000 people, whose prosperity is increased or diminished accordingly as they are employed or unemployed, and this bill proposes to divide this market and this prosperity with other nations which protect their markets against us.

The Detroit River floats more tons of freight in eight months of navigation than the Suez Canal floats in a year, and it floats most of it in American ships manned by American men, owned by American capital, built by American labor out of American material, cut, dug, and framed out of American mines and forests, and above most of these ships floats the American flag [applause on the Republican side], and this bill proposes to rust the heart out of our domestic commerce for the benefit of foreigners.

MAINTAINING THE STANDARD OF AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

How does protection "cut us off from our proper part of the commerce of the world?"

The Republican theory of protection is that duties should be so levied as to equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and that to ascertain that difference with scientific accuracy we should have a tariff commission whose business it should be to ascertain the cost of production at home and abroad, so that we may fix the standard by which to measure duties.

Why should duties be so levied as to equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad?

First. Because if duties are raised above the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad it invites domestic monopolies to overcharge domestic consumers.

Second. Because if duties are fixed below the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad it invites foreign monopolies to participate in our markets and force down the wages of American labor.

Third. Because we hold the quality of American citizenship above dollars and cents. We are not only growing and making commodities but we are growing, and by our naturalization laws making American citizens who are being called upon to participate more and more directly in the making of laws and constitutions, and we can not afford to lower the standard of American citizenship. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Fourth. Because protection of American labor and American industry means protection of American manhood and American citizenship. We can not lift the rest of the world up to the level of American citizenship, and we decline to lower the level of American citizenship down to the level of foreign citizenship by forcing American wages down to the level of foreign wages. [Applause on the Republican side.]

BUYING ABROAD.

All commerce has two ends—one the buying end, the other the selling end—and the Democratic theory is to increase our buying abroad and by consequence to decrease our selling everywhere.

Is this the way to increase "our part in the commerce of the world"?

But in order to buy we must have something to sell with which to get money to buy [applause on the Republican side], and the more we buy abroad the less we make at home, and the less we make at home the less we have to sell, and the less we have to sell the less money there is in circulation, and the less money there is in circulation the more people are thrown out of employment, and the more people are thrown out of employment the more the slums of big cities are populated. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The more we buy abroad the more money we send abroad, and the more money we send abroad the more we drain our own arteries of trade and swell the arteries of foreign trade.

The more money we send abroad the more we stimulate foreign production and depress our own.

The more money we send abroad the more money we take out of the pockets of American labor and put into the pockets of foreign labor.

THE INTERESTS THAT FRAMED THIS BILL.

Is this our "proper part" in the commerce of the world?

In what way does protection make the Government, in the language of the President, the "facile instrument of private interests"?

There are a good many private interests in this country.

We have thirty-five and a half million people here engaged in gainful occupations. Of these, twelve and a half millions are engaged in agriculture, eight and a half millions in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, six millions in trade and transportation, and eight and a half millions in professional and domestic service.

Comparatively few representatives of these "private interests" were heard by the committee which framed this bill, but importers' interests and foreign manufacturers' interests were represented there as never before.

The special interests which helped to make this bill were not the men of genius, courage, and ability who have lighted the fires of our furnaces and given employment to millions of our people; not the American farmer, who has pushed our frontier westward to the Pacific Ocean and built the American schoolhouse on the edge of every clearing; but importers' associations like the Italian Chamber of Commerce of New York, subsidized by the Italian Government to obtain low duties or no duties on Italian products; importers' associations like the Merchants' Association of New York; importers' associations like the Merchants' Reform Club of New York—these are the "interests" that helped to make this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Men who want to carry out the broad, patriotic, and nonsectional ideals of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who declared a year ago that "we in the South intend to make New England millmen come and put their mills in the South or else go out of business"; these are the men who framed this bill.

Men who want to increase the flocks of Australia, South America, and South Africa, and drive the flocks of the United States to the slaughterhouse; these are the men who framed this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Men who want to reduce or remove the protection of American farmers and promote the prosperity of foreign farmers; men who want to fertilize the beet and cane fields of the rest of the world with American money and drive American farmers, planters, and laboring men out of business; these are the men who framed this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In this way is our Government to be made to discriminate against our own people, who are taxed to maintain it, and made the "facile instrument" of foreign monopolies?

In this way are foreign looms and foreign machinery to be set humming to the tune of new industry, while our own gather rust and cobwebs?

In this way are the patriotic interests of this Government to be made subservient to the views of cloistered professors of free-trade political economy? [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE DEMOCRATIC "FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE."

How does protection "violate the just principles of taxation," and what are these "just principles of taxation," anyway?

In your platform you "declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue."

It is a "fundamental principle," then, of the Democratic Party that protection is unconstitutional.

But if protection is unconstitutional, how did it happen that the first tariff law ever passed was avowedly a protective tariff law and was framed in part by men who had just finished framing the Federal Constitution, and was reported by James Madison and signed by George Washington?

Were Washington, Adams, Madison, and Monroe unpatriotic and unconstitutional when they helped to make that first protective tariff law and put it on the statute books as a part of the national celebration on the 4th day of July, 1789?

If they were unpatriotic and unconstitutional, is the President patriotic and constitutional?

But if protection is unconstitutional, why is it not unconstitutional all the time?

If it is unconstitutional to protect one thing, why is it constitutional to protect another?

If it is constitutional to retain an inadequate duty on wheat, why is it unconstitutional to protect rye? Is wheat constitutional and rye unconstitutional?

If it is constitutional to retain an inadequate duty on cattle and sheep, why is it unconstitutional to protect hogs? Are hogs unconstitutional and cattle and sheep constitutional?

If it is constitutional to retain an inadequate duty on cattle and sheep, why is it unconstitutional to protect beef and mutton? Are cattle and sheep on the hoof constitutional and their meat unconstitutional?

If it is constitutional to protect Texas Angora goat hair, why is it not constitutional to protect wool? Is goat hair constitutional and wool unconstitutional?

You talk about your devotion to the interests of the farmer, but you have never lost an opportunity to injure him.

You made Canadian reciprocity a law and you refused to repeal it three times after Canada had repudiated it.

In that law you juggled with your "fundamental principle," that protection is unconstitutional, and advertised your deep damnation of "private interests" by making wood pulp and print paper unconditionally free, regardless of whether Canada accepted or rejected reciprocity, and this you did to curry favor with the newspaper "interests."

The effect of this bill also, according to John Norris, of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, will be "to admit news-print paper and mechanical pulp free of duty from all the world without qualification of any sort." The President's press agent is obviously not forgetting his newspaper relations.

In that law you juggled again with your "fundamental principle" by taking the duty off from the farmers' wheat and retaining a duty of 50 cents a barrel on the millers' flour. If it was constitutional to protect the miller, why was it unconstitutional to protect the farmer?

In that law you juggled again with your "fundamental principle" by taking the duty off from barley and keeping a duty of 45 cents a hundred on barley malt.

If it was constitutional to protect the brewers' malt, why was it unconstitutional to protect the farmers' barley?

In that law you juggled again with your "fundamental principle" by taking the duty off from rye and keeping a duty of $2.60 a gallon on whisky. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

If it was constitutional to protect the distiller of whisky, why was it unconstitutional to protect the farmers' rye?

In that law you juggled again with your "fundamental principle" by taking the duty off from meat on the hoof and keeping a duty of a cent and a quarter a pound on dressed meat.

If it was constitutional to protect the packer's dressed meat, why was it not constitutional to protect the farmers' cattle, sheep, and hogs?

If it was constitutional then to protect beef and mutton and was unconstitutional to protect cattle and sheep, why is it unconstitutional now to protect beef and mutton and constitutional now to protect cattle and sheep?

Is your "fundamental principle" reversible? Is your "fundamental principle" a thing of time and expediency?

Does the statute of limitations run on your "fundamental principle" in two years? [Applause on the Republican side.]

A LOAF OF BREAD.

Thinking to catch the city vote in the North and knowing you will get the Southern vote from force of habit [laughter], this administration now talks about low rates on the "market basket." This is only another way of telling the people who live in cities that farmers are getting too much for what they have to sell, because the people who live in cities are paying too much for what they have to buy, and amounts to an assessment of the farmer to make up for the profits of city dealers.

You are cutting the duty on wheat down to 10 cents a bushel in this bill. Why do you not take it off entirely? Do you think to fool the farmer by keeping a little duty?

The great Canadian Provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, with a total area equal to about 10 States the size of Michigan, and containing almost as much wheat land as lies west of the Mississippi River, are growing an average of 24 bushels of wheat to the acre, against an average of 15 bushels here.

Under a protection of 25 cents a bushel the price of our wheat has averaged about 10 cents a bushel higher than the price of Canadian wheat. With a duty of 10 cents the difference in favor of the United States will be all the way from 3 cents down to nothing.

A bushel of wheat makes 60 loaves of bread, and one-sixtieth of 10 cents is one-sixth of a cent, and one-sixtieth of 3 cents is one-twentieth of a cent.

I leave it to the "higher mathematics" of the President to answer whether any consumer has ever had to pay one-sixth of a cent more for a loaf of bread by reason of protection to the farmer's wheat, the reduction of which will make him millions of dollars poorer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I leave it to candid men everywhere to say whether when this bill has gone into effect and you have made the farmer millions of dollars poorer a loaf of bread will be likely to be sold one-twentieth of a cent cheaper.

SUGAR.

In the same way you propose to save money on sugar.

The estimated population of the United States is 97,160,336, and the total consumption of sugar in the United States in 1912 was 3,504,182 long tons, or 7,849,367,680 pounds.

The per capita consumption of sugar in the United States, then, last year was 81 pounds.

One million six hundred and sixty-four thousand eight hundred and sixty-three long tons, or 47.5 per cent of the total amount of sugar consumed in the United States last year, came from Cuba, and 47.5 per cent of 81 pounds, the amount consumed by each person, is 38.4 pounds.

Nine hundred and forty-three thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine long tons, or 26.9 per cent of the total amount of sugar consumed in the United States last year, came from our insular territory, and 26.9 per cent of 81 pounds is 21.8 pounds.

One hundred and six thousand three hundred and fifty long tons, or 3.1 per cent of the total amount of sugar consumed in the United States last year, came from the world outside of Cuba and our insular territory, and 3.1 per cent of 81 pounds is 2.5 pounds.

All the rest of the sugar consumed in the United States last year—789,200 long tons or 22.5 per cent of the total amount consumed—was made from domestic beets and cane, and 22.5 per cent of 81 pounds is 18.2 pounds.

Now, the duty on the 38.4 pounds of Cuban sugar consumed by each person, at 1.348 cents per pound, is 51.76 cents; the duty on 2.5 pounds of sugar coming from the world outside Cuba and our insular territory, at the full duty rate of 1.685 cents per pound, is 4.21 cents; and no duty was collected on insular sugar.

Therefore, the total duty paid, theoretically, by each person in the United States on all the sugar he or she consumed last year was 55.97 cents.

By this bill you propose to charge a duty of 1.256 cents per pound on all 96° sugar coming from the world outside the insular territory of the United States and Cuba for three years, and for all sugar coming from Cuba you propose to charge a duty of 1.005 cents per pound.

Assuming, for the sake of illustration, that Cuban and other foreign sugar will enter our market in the same proportion as now, the duty on the 2.5 pounds of sugar consumed per capita by the people of the United States coming from the world outside the insular territory of the United States and Cuba at 1.256 cents per pound will be 3.14 cents, and the duty on the 38.4 pounds of Cuban sugar consumed by the people of the United States per capita, at 1.005 cents per pound, will be 38.59 cents, and the total duty paid by each person will be 41.73 cents.

Therefore, since, under existing law, each person theoretically pays a duty of 55.97 cents a year on the 81 pounds of sugar that he consumes in a year, and since under the proposed law he will pay a duty of 41.73 cents a year, he will save the difference between 55.97 cents and 41.73 cents, which is 14.24 cents a year.

Therefore, each person will be saved, theoretically, the munificent sum of 14.24 cents a year for three years. After that you propose to arrange it so that he can riot in a total surplus of 55.97 cents a year saved on sugar.

But only two-thirds of the 81 pounds of sugar consumed per capita per annum in the United States is consumed as sugar; the rest is used in manufactured products like candy, gum, and condensed milk.

Therefore the change in duty on one-third of the sugar consumed by each person will never be perceptible to consumers but will be absorbed by manufacturers, so that the amount of sugar actually consumed by each person per annum as sugar is 54 pounds, and the amount theoretically to be saved per capita during the next three years will be only 9¼ cents a year. After that the amount theoretically to be saved will be 37.31 cents a year.

But assuming, for the sake of argument, that it is better to save 9¼ cents a year for three years and after that to save 37.31 cents a year on sugar and reduce the revenues of the Government derived from sugar by over $50,000,000, what certainty can we have that everybody can carry home a half a cent's worth more of sugar a week in his market basket?

What assurance have we that the sugar refiners will not take possession of the market and raise prices after you have destroyed their competitors, the beet and cane sugar industries of the United States?

But if the refiners do not take all of our half a cent a week on sugar which you propose to save for us, what assurance have we that our half a cent a week will run the long gantlet of intermediate dealers between the sugar fields and the consumer?

Or, if the refiners do not control prices against us, and if the intermediate dealers do not absorb our half a cent a week apiece, what assurance can we have that the inexorable law of supply and demand will not deprive us of our half a cent a week apiece and raise the price of sugar when our own beet and cane sugar growers are driven out of business?

WOOL AND WAGES.

In the same way you propose to save money on wool.

You have coldly calculated the labor cost at home and abroad and deliberately intend to sacrifice American labor and American industry in the interest of foreign labor and foreign industry.

You know that it costs the American manufacturer more to build and equip a factory than it does the foreign manufacturer, because the American manufacturer pays better wages than are paid abroad; and you deliberately require that the American manufacturer shall pay lower wages or build no more factories.

You know that when the foreign manufacturer begins to dig for the foundations of his factory it costs him 40 cents a day in Belgium, 64 cents a day in Germany, and 80 cents a day in England for diggers, whereas it costs the American manufacturer not less than $2 a day.

You know that when the foreign manufacturer proceeds to lay the walls of his factory it costs him only 64 cents a day in Belgium, $1.04 a day in Germany, and $1.68 a day in England for brick and stone masons, whereas it costs the American manufacturer not less than $5 a day.

You know that the foreign manufacturer pays only 40 cents a day in Belgium, 64 cents a day in Germany, and $1.04 a day in England for hod carriers, while the American manufacturer pays American hod carriers not less than $2 a day.

You know that the foreign manufacturer pays carpenters only 56 cents a day in Belgium, $1.04 a day in Germany, and $1.60 a day in England, whereas American manufacturers pay carpenters from $3 to $5 a day.

You know that the foreign manufacturer pays painters only 56 cents a day in Belgium, 96 cents a day in Germany, and $1.44 a day in England, whereas American manufacturers pay American painters $3 to $4 a day.

You know that the foreign manufacturer pays plumbers only 64 cents a day in Belgium, 88 cents a day in Germany, and $1.60 a day in England, while American manufacturers pay from $5 to $6 a day.

You know that the foreign manufacturer pays skilled mechanics 64 cents a day in Belgium, $1.04 a day in Germany, and $1.36 in England, while American manufacturers pay skilled mechanics anywhere from $2.50 a day upward.

You know that it costs the American manufacturer from 45 to 51 per cent more to build a factory than it does the foreign manufacturer.

You know that when the foreign manufacturer proceeds to make cloth the average wages paid weavers on the continent of Europe are $6.50 a week, and in England $9 a week, while the average wages paid weavers in America are $13 a week.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WINGO). Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How does it come that the wages of free-trade England are so much higher than in the protected countries on the Continent which you mention, namely, Germany, Belgium, and others?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is an ancient question. It has been asked a great many times since I have been here——

Mr. GORDON. Well, answer it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan (continuing). I am going to be candid with the gentleman—and I have answered this question this way before—I doubt if there is any scientific, accurate way of stating the reason why wages are higher in England than they are on the Continent, any more than there is of stating why wages are higher in Germany than in Belgium.

England has a different industrial system than Germany. If you say it is the tariff that makes the difference, your logic will fail there; that is, provided you want to discuss the matter in a fair and dispassionate way. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HELGESEN. If you can not make them understand why, I suggest you ask if free trade brings such high wages in England, why the wages are not higher than in America.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to be perfectly fair, and I do not believe in discussing these matters in a petty, cheap way.

You know from the Tariff Board's report that the average wages paid 10 of the highest-paid German weavers are $7.12 for a week of 55 hours, while the average wages of 10 of the highest-paid weavers in similar American mills are $17.34 a week.

You know that the average wages of weavers in France are 81.77 cents a day.

You know that the wages of woolen weavers in England range from $5.47 to $6.68 a week, while the average wages of woolen weavers in the United States are $3.50 a day.

Knowing these things—knowing that foreign wages range all the way from a third to a half of the wages paid here—knowing that labor and machinery are no more productive here than there, because machinery can be run no faster here than there without injury to the fabric; knowing that it costs twice as much to spin a pound of yarn or a yard of cloth here as it does there; knowing that a duty of 50 per cent is necessary to equalize conditions here and abroad, you cut the duty down to 35 per cent and deliberately require the American manufacturer to pay lower wages or go out of business.

"THE EXCITEMENTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF GREATER FREEDOM."

You know that it costs the American woolgrower 11 to 12 cents to produce a pound of wool; that it costs the woolgrower of Argentina 4 to 5 cents to produce a pound of wool; that it costs the Australian and New Zealand woolgrower practically nothing to produce a pound of wool after crediting the flock with other products; and knowing that the American woolgrower can not compete with the foreign woolgrower, you deliberately propose to remove the whole duty from all wools, washed and unwashed, and drive the American woolgrower out of business.

When you do this you know that the American manufacturer will have to pay lower wages or go out of business; you know the American laboring man will have to take lower wages or no wages; you know that his purchasing power will be reduced and that he will deposit no more money in savings banks; and you know he may have to wear shoddy, which you have made free presumably to meet that emergency; but superciliously smiling down from your height of temporary power you invite him to warm himself with the consolation that he is giving the foreign laboring man more work to do; and the President invites him to warm himself with his pleasant little sarcasm in his address to Congress about getting accustomed to "the excitements and responsibilities of greater freedom." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Greater freedom to do what? Greater freedom to watch his savings dwindle away? Greater freedom to look for work while his family is in want?

You know that when you make raw wool free you will drive American sheep to the slaughterhouse.

But you invite the American farmer to console himself with the knowledge that he is promoting the sheep-raising business of Australia, South Africa, and South America, and discipline himself by getting accustomed to "the excitements and responsibilities of greater freedom."

Of course, when you have destroyed the sheep business, the prices of mutton and lamb will go up and with fewer sheep to kill, the prices of beef, pork, chicken, and eggs will go up, but the man out of work and the shepherd without a flock can console themselves by thinking how they are helping the shepherds of Australia, South America, and South Africa, and the weavers of Europe, and how much better it is to give than to receive, anyway. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

A MATTER OF NO CONCERN.

With the cocksureness of a man accustomed to instruct the immature minds of youth, the President, in his address to Congress, undertook to settle in eight minutes problems which have vexed the minds of statesmen for more than a hundred years. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

To him and to you it is a matter of no concern that all the nations of the world, except England, protect their markets against us and against all other nations.

To him and to you it is a matter of no concern that the colonies of England, including Canada, protect their markets against us and against all other nations, except England.

To him and to you it is a matter of no concern that Canadian newspapers are jubilant over our invitation to her to share our markets with us at the expense of our own people.

To him and to you it is a matter of no concern that Canadian millers and wheat growers are well pleased with conditionally free flour and 10-cent wheat, because it will save them the long haul to Europe and wipe out the international boundary line between them and our 100,000,000 population market.

To him and to you it is a matter of no concern that conditionally free flour and 10-cent wheat will force the price of American wheat down to the level of Canadian wheat and make the American farmer millions of dollars poorer.

To him and to you it must be particularly pleasant to read in the London Daily News that your bill is "a staggering attack on the whole fabric of protection—the heaviest blow protection has received since Peel established free trade in England 70 years ago."

THE "CHIEF SUFFERERS."

With uplifted eyes and the nasal twang of hypocritical piety you told the American farmer and the American laboring man in your platform that they were the "chief sufferers" by reason of protection. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Is it because of your sympathy with the farmer's "suffering" that you propose to lower the duty on the farmer's wheat and give the Minneapolis millers a license to range at will over the wheat fields of Canada and the United States and in combination with Canadian millers to dictate terms to farmers? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Is it on account of your sympathy for the "suffering" of farmers that you propose to cut the duty on oats from 15 cents to 10 cents a bushel and put oatmeal and rolled oats on the free list? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Is it on account of your sympathy with the "suffering" of farmers that you propose to cut the duty on barley from 30 cents to 15 cents a bushel?

Is it on account of your sympathy with the "suffering" of farmers that you propose to cut the duty on hay from $4 to $2 a ton?

Is it on account of your sympathy for the "suffering" of farmers that you propose to make rye free?

Is it on account of your sympathy with the "suffering" of farmers that you propose to make potatoes free?

Is it on account of your sympathy with the "suffering" of the best-fed, best-paid, best-housed laboring man on earth that you propose to drive him into competition with foreign labor?

Again, I call attention to the Chaplain's prayer, "Since cant and hypocrisy are the worst of sins, preserve us, O Lord, from these." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

HIGH PRICES.

You talk about "private interests," but by this bill you will either centralize industries in the hands of a few great corporations by driving small competing industries to the wall or you will drive our industries out of business and turn our $36,000,000,000 market over to the exploitation of foreign monopolies which will raise or lower prices at will.

You charge in your platform that protection makes high prices, but prices are high the world over, and the Republican Party has not put a tariff wall around the world.

Mr. GORDON. It has not jurisdiction.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Prices are high, but protection has not made them high.

Prices have been going up alike in free trade and protected countries for the last 15 years. In the campaign of 1896 you Democrats said more money makes higher prices, and you demanded the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 to make more money in order to make higher prices.

More money does make higher prices, and in the 15 years from 1896 to 1911 the world's supply of gold increased from $202,251,600 a year to $461,000,000 a year.

More money does make higher prices, but it is only money that goes into use and circulation that affects prices, and in Democratic administrations the quantitative theory of money ceases to act affirmatively, because in Democratic administrations money refuses to go into circulation and is hidden away in fear. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Prices are high, and one reason why prices are high is because certain kinds of people feel more exclusive if they pay exclusive prices, and our merchants always try to accommodate.

There are certain kinds of people who actually feel superior because they eat expensive things. With these people superiority and exclusiveness come through the stomach and not through brains. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Prices are high. A picture, by Rembrandt, of a woman picking a hen sold awhile ago for $250,000. [Laughter.]

Prices are high. If a carload of eggs should go to smash, it would cause a flurry in Wall Street. [Renewed laughter.]

Alimony is high. [Laughter.] I noticed the other day that a complainant in a divorce suit was demanding $125,000 a year alimony. She said it was necessary to enable her to maintain her standing in the society in which she moved. [Laughter.] I reckon it was. [Laughter.]

Life is cheap and prices are high. We read in the papers of some poor devil worn out with the struggle of life offering his body for sale for dissecting purposes, and in the next column we read of an expensive dinner being given to an aristocratic bulldog [laughter]—in New York. [Renewed laughter.]

Life and death are full of contrasts. It cost $200,000 to bury King Edward, and when some of us were being shown through the crematory connected with the quarantine station at Honolulu I saw a small tin can containing the ashes of an unknown man which had been there on a shelf for more than seven years. It did not cost much to bury him, poor fellow. [Laughter.]

Prices are high. It is getting so some people are afraid to go on living on account of the income tax and afraid to die on account of the inheritance tax and the undertaker's charges. [Laughter.]

Prices are high, and we are high with them. When the high cost of living struck Kansas an inspired commentator put it this way—he said: "We build schoolhouses and we send our children away from home to be educated." [Laughter.]

We grow weeds and buy vegetables. We throw away ashes and buy soap. We go fishing with a $10 rod and we go hunting 10-cent game with a $50 gun and a $20 dog. [Laughter.] Prices are high. [Laughter.]

But there are other causes of high prices than the increase of gold and one of these causes is found in the law of supply and demand. This question of prices is almost as difficult for a Democrat as that one about the difference in the scale of wages between England and Germany and between Germany and Belgium.

In the 10 years from 1900 to 1910 our population increased 21 per cent, while dairy cows increased only 20.4 per cent, and other cattle decreased 18.6 per cent, and sheep decreased 14.7 per cent, and hogs decreased 7.4 per cent. This in itself is enough to account for the high price of meat.

If on the six and a half million farms in this country 2 bushels of wheat or corn or oats or rye or barley could be grown where only 1 is grown now, or 2 head of cattle or sheep or hogs could be grown where only 1 is grown now, the problem of high prices would be swiftly solved, but it is a poor way to solve it by cutting down the price of what the farmer grows to sell upon the mistaken theory that because the people who live in cities are paying too much for what they have to buy the farmer is getting too much for what he grows to sell. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE FARMER IS NOT RECEIVING HIGH PRICES.

There is another cause of high prices, and that is the movement of our population into cities. Every man or woman who leaves the farm reduces the number of producers of food.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Give me five minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The most ominous fact of modern conditions is that 46 per cent of our population is congested in cities, and this bill is a bid for the city vote.

These people are told that they are having to pay too much for what they have to buy because the farmer is getting too much for what he has to sell, but, as the Secretary of Agriculture says in his report for 1910, "The price received by the farmer is one thing; the price paid by the consumer is far different."

As a result of an investigation covering 78 cities scattered throughout the United States it was found that on the whole the farmers were not getting 50 per cent of the city retail price of things which they produce, and the Secretary of Agriculture winds up this part of his report by the statement that "the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the price he pays."

COUNTING THE DOLLARS OF DEMOCRATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

This administration went into power with a full Treasury and abundant revenues, clamorously denouncing the "lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses," and ever since that time the Ways and Means Committee has been busy devising ways and means to meet appropriations until the total of appropriations and contract obligations voted in the last session of the Sixty-second Congress have outrun the appropriations and authorizations of the last session of the last Republican Congress by $86,860,049.22 and amount to $1,175,604,134.21.

We are told that a Treasury expert can count 4,000 silver dollars in an hour, and that in a day of 8 hours he can count 32,000 silver dollars.

Counting at that rate he can count a little less than a million dollars in 31 days, but if the appropriations and contract obligations of the last session of the Sixty-second Congress were converted into silver dollars and a Treasury expert were called upon to count them, when he had counted a million dollars he would be only at the beginning of the count.

In 10 years, counting at the rate of $4,000 an hour, he would have counted only a little over $119,000,000, and if he should keep on counting until he was old and gray and his eyes grew too dim to see and his ears too dull to hear the clinking coin, and the undertaker finally knocked at his door, he could not finish counting the dollars of Democratic appropriations and authorizations in the last session of the Sixty-second Congress, and no man since the days of the scriptural patriarchs has lived long enough to count them. [Laughter.]

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S SUGGESTION.

This money is drawn from American citizens, and if they complain the Vice President, who has talked more since he entered upon his "four years of silence" than ever before in his life [laughter], and to less purpose [laughter], has had the happy thought to advise them that the quietus long ago advocated by Karl Marx of repealing the laws of descent and cutting off the right to transmit property by will may be applied to them. [Laughter.]

There are crowds in great cities, and crowds breed demagogues. There are crowds in tenement districts, where people are stacked up story above story, whose daily existence depends upon steady work, and if hard times should come back as a result of this bill this ill-advised suggestion of the Vice President will furnish the text of many a harangue by many a demagogue, with his flaring torch, talking at night from the curb under the shadow of great buildings, owned by colossal capital, to men out of work with families in want.

This is a time of national unrest, and I appeal to every patriotic American who holds a public place to stop playing for party advantage by sensational means, to stop playing to the galleries, to stop trying to outdo some one else in sensational utterances, and try the effect of sober sense and honest work. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] is recognized.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, it is undoubtedly somewhat presumptuous for a brand-new Congressman, and more particularly a brand-new Bull Moose Congressman, to undertake to address the august, dignified American Congress, especially so, as I have been told, that the new Congressman who succeeds in finding his way through the vast maze of marble halls in this Capitol Building during his first term has accomplished all that can be expected of any new man. But, Mr. Chairman, judging from the vast number of Members of this House here present at this moment, I take it that many of the older Congressmen are still lost in the maze of marble halls in this Capitol Building. [Laughter.]

We Progressives are frequently referred to by our opponents as Bull Moosers, and the term is intended by them for ridicule; but, Mr. Chairman, a herd of 4,000,000 militant, young, and vigorous Bull Moose is a magnificent sight when compared to a slow-moving band of 3,000,000 elephants, whose clumsy bulk impede their progress, or a group of 6,000,000 jackasses frightened by their own bray. [Laughter and applause.] I have been amused and pleased to hear our Democratic and Republican friends talking loudly about their desire to give every man, woman, and child in this broad land a square deal. Amused at their evident anxiety to adopt the term made famous by our great leader, and pleased because some of the gentlemen appear to be in dead earnest about it.

Mr. Chairman, to a freshman in the House of Representatives of the greatest Nation on earth the explanation of the gentleman from Alabama, together with the special plea he made for the child of his brain, was very interesting and to some extent instructive.

Especially the reasons given for the income-tax section of this bill—deficit, $68,000,000; income, $70,000,000.

I believe the gentleman is absolutely sincere in his desire to carry out the pledge of his party platform. He certainly made a splendid speech from his standpoint, and I am frank to say that if I could admit his premise I should be compelled to agree with his conclusion.

But I find myself unable to do either.

Among other things, he said:

> Our great responsibility is the interest and rights of the great mass of the consumers among the American people. From our viewpoint industry must be considered as secondary to the rights of the consumer.

That doctrine, Mr. Chairman, would be wise indeed if we could separate those interests.

We have in this Nation about 6,000,000 laboring men, who, with their families, number nearly 30,000,000, or about one-third of our entire population.

And whatever affects the interests of the laboring man affects directly the farmer and every other citizen in our country.

The plea of confession and avoidance of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] would have been held good by the American jury had it been filed in time.

He has filed his plea, however, after the case has been tried and a verdict rendered, and his motion now for an arrest of judgment will be denied.

However, it has long been held in all courts that an honest confession is good for the soul.

In giving his reasons for the overthrow of his party the gentleman, among other things, said:

> In the first place, we stubbornly resisted reasonable reforms. Why we did so it is hard to say. Perhaps the truculent manner in which those reforms were advanced may have had much to do with our course. No man likes to be seized by the throat. No man who is a man will stand being threatened, especially by a reformer.

My answer to the gentleman's reason, as stated, is that in this case the reformer was a vast majority of the American people, and I take it that it is the bounden duty of the Representatives of the people who come to this legislative Hall to obey the orders given by those reformers. Again he says:

> The second reason for our dismissal was the fact that the country, I am sorry to say, desires a revision of the tariff much farther-reaching than the Payne law.

Again I say I can not conceive why the gentleman should regret that the country, if the country is advised, should require and demand a much farther downward revision of the tariff than was granted in the Payne law. Further he says:

> It can not be denied that subsequent reports of the Tariff Board have confirmed, in part at least, the country's judgment with respect to Schedule I and Schedule K, cotton goods and woolen goods.

And again:

> We failed to move with the age. That was the head and front of our offending. The Republican chieftains could not adjust their views to modern schools of thought.

Again I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts "honest confession is good for the soul."

One more quotation from the gentleman's speech, in which he says:

> Men sometimes forget their promises. Suppose that the Democrats fail to carry out their radical program. Will the country return at once to our party? I doubt it. The people wish to try some of these new ideas and are willing to risk the consequences of their proving disastrous. The Republicans have not given them the legislation which, wisely or foolishly, they wish. If the Democrats follow our example, it need surprise no one should the people turn to the Progressive Party.

I think the gentleman is absolutely right in his premise and in his conclusion. [Applause.]

That the leaders of the Democratic Party throughout the country are not united in their support of the Underwood bill is evidenced, not only by the fact that they were unable to agree in caucus, but that the Democratic governor of Massachusetts, in a special message to the legislature of that State, denounced this bill as a nonprotective tariff for revenue only—unreciprocal, destructive, downward revision.

And he further stated to the legislature:

> It is your right, it is your privilege, it is your duty to memorialize Congress in behalf of this Commonwealth against such a peril to the interests of Massachusetts.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, if what the governor says about the effect of this bill upon Massachusetts is true, it is also true concerning every other State in this Union.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the majority, upon whom rests the grave responsibility of tariff legislation, would present the subject to the House in separate bills, which would enable me to vote for a substantial downward revision of some of the important schedules, such as the woolen, cotton, and sugar schedules.

Can any intelligent, fair-minded man contend, after our experience with the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, that the tariff is rightfully a political issue?

Political battles have been fought, and millions of dollars have been spent by the Republican and Democratic Parties, in a vain attempt to settle the tariff question as a political issue. For more than 50 years a purely local economical business question, affecting most vitally the interests of all our people, has been used, or rather misused, by the old parties for political advantage; and now, after all these years of trial and tribulation, as if we need a still further object lesson, the Democrats are about to put through this House a tariff measure which has been kicked up hill and down by members of their own party.

It is a bill which to some extent, at least, is an attempt on the part of the Democratic Party to keep its platform pledge; but, if we can believe the papers, it could not be passed without the tremendous power of political patronage.

The prospect of patronage plums to be handed out as soon as the tariff bill is passed is exceedingly effective. We are told through the columns of the public press that the President is using his high office to force Members of Congress to favor this bill.

Many Democrats believe they will be doing an irreparable injury to their States if they vote for the wool, cotton, and sugar schedules of this bill.

Every special interest in the Nation has filed its brief and used every ounce of pressure to have certain schedules of this bill defeated in this House, and they will naturally keep up their fight in the Senate. And when this bill becomes a law it will represent a compromise between the power of special privilege and the power of political patronage.

Mr. Chairman, our Democratic brethren told us in their national platform that a protective tariff was unconstitutional. And now with a hundred and fifty Democratic majority in this House we find Democrats from the sugar States, Democrats from the cotton States, and Democrats from woolen industry

States demanding a protective tariff on those schedules in this bill which directly affects the people of their particular sections.

All of which demonstrates beyond dispute the utter futility of attempting to adjust tariff rates by making them a political issue.

Mr. Chairman, the Progressive Party in this, as well as in many other matters, comes forward with the only rational solution of this great economic question and presents an amendment providing for the establishment of a nonpartisan scientific tariff commission which shall investigate all tariff schedules and report to the President of the United States and to both branches of Congress the cost of production, the efficiency of labor at home and abroad, capitalization, and industrial organization, and efficiency and the general competitive position in this country and abroad of all industries seeking protection from Congress; the revenue-producing power of the tariff and its relation to the resources of the Government; the effect of the tariff on prices; the operations of middlemen; and the purchasing power of the consumer.

We intend that this commission shall have absolute power to elicit information, and for that purpose the commission should prescribe a uniform system of accounting for the great protected industries, to the end that the American laboring man shall secure his fair share of the benefits of a protective tariff. And to the end that when all the facts are ascertained, if it shall appear in any given case that the tariff benefits no one but the bondholder at the expense of the consumer, it may be abolished.

There are various reasons, Mr. Chairman, for the creation of a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission, but there are none more important than its removal from the field of partisan politics and the acknowledged inability of the average Member of Congress to understand its intricate details.

The brilliant and lamented Dolliver, of Iowa, died as the direct result of his unceasing labor to master the woolen schedule and present it in all its marvelous detail to the Senate. He did master it with that splendid mind, and he did present it with his God-given power of speech in such a manner that even the agents of special privilege were compelled to admit that he had exposed its inequities. And, Mr. Chairman, I am firmly convinced that if the Republican Party had even at that time been able to heed his advice, broken the spell of the special interests, and followed his leadership, it would be sitting in the seat of power to-day.

Dolliver saw the vision and read the future.

How can any Member of this House discharge the duties resting upon him in the consideration of this tariff bill without knowing whether the rates imposed by the bill are a true measure of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad?

If the duty in a given case is too low, you wrong the labor of this country, and if it has been placed too high, you just as surely wrong the consumers of the country.

Every Member of this body, before he is called upon to vote for or against any schedule in this bill, should be fully advised as to the probable effect of the law upon the country.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, at least so far as the minority—perhaps I should say the principal minority—is concerned, we are compelled to proceed without any possibility of knowing definitely whether we are discharging our obligations to the people whom we represent.

Our Democratic brethren pledged their party to a tariff for revenue only, and declared the protective principle to be unconstitutional. And yet, are they now in a position to know that they are keeping that pledge?

It can not be denied that the new economic and industrial conditions in this Nation require the most careful study and the most complete investigation in the enactment of tariff legislation.

Our Democratic friends call themselves "revenue-tariff men." They do not object to the tariff, but are opposed to its protective features, especially when it affects some article in which they have no local or special interest.

Our Louisiana brothers are revenue-tariff men on lumber, wool, and cattle, but they believe in the protective-tariff principle as applied to sugar.

Our Democratic Members of the House and Senate from the woolen-industry States are warm and faithful advocates of protection on wool, but they are revenue-tariff men on sugar.

The absolute truth is that practically all the opposition to the protective system in the United States is of that kind.

Duties on imports, Mr. Chairman, are indirect taxes, and we all know that any indirect tax bears proportionately much harder on the poor than on the rich.

To my mind, therefore, it naturally follows that an indirect tax for the sole purpose of raising revenue is much more indefensible than an indirect tax imposed for the purpose of protection.

If the chief object is one of revenue to defray the necessary and legitimate expenses of the Government, why not accomplish that purpose by direct tax, as is contemplated by the income-tax section of this bill?

Such a method of taxation, under proper regulations and limitations, would serve every purpose and would at the same time result in a much more economical administration of the Government. The man who pays a direct tax knows what he pays and watches its expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that a tariff for revenue only may easily become a tariff for protection, and very high protection, on the specious plea that the revenue produced is required to defray the expenses of the Government. The real free trader will tell you that the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff is the same as the difference between petty larceny and grand larceny.

Why not raise the curtain and stand out in the open? Why not be perfectly sincere? If revenue is the only question involved, then the indirect tax is unnecessary; and, besides, very frequently results in incidental protection.

If our Democratic friends are right, all the revenue required to run the Government could easily be produced by a direct tax on incomes, inheritances, and successions.

In any event, upon the theory of a revenue tariff the duties should fall only upon such commodities as are not produced in this country.

We of the Progressive Party believe in the protective-tariff principle. The American protective system has become an established institution, and when properly safeguarded and honestly regulated, by a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission, free from the abuses to which it has been put by the overlords of special privilege, will guard the American workingman in every legitimate way against the underpaid labor of Europe, and will give to the American producer the American market when he makes honest goods and sells them at honest prices.

Thomas Jefferson, the founder of Democracy, recognized and favored the principle of protection and advocated discriminating duties in favor of American shipping and reciprocity treaties in favor of American trade. And, Mr. Chairman, the great body of the American people, irrespective of party name, are in favor of the protective principle in tariff legislation to-day.

The ordeal through which the Ways and Means Committee passed in defending this bill in the Democratic caucus emphasizes the utter absurdity of attempting to treat the tariff as a political issue, to be definitely and finally settled by any political party.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the two old parties, better known just now as the majority and second minority parties, are afraid to drop this bone of contention over which they have growled and snapped at each other for more than two generations, and by means of which they have alternately hoodwinked the people into giving them the offices. Because they know that, with the tariff out of politics, the advanced position now occupied by the Progressive Party on all social and industrial questions affecting the vital interests of the people is such that they never can hope to overtake us by means of the most ardent lip loyalty to progressive principles.

It is true that since the November election the Republican and Democratic Parties are falling over each other in a grand rush to clean their feet on our doormat, but they can not hope to fool the people by such antics.

Why, Mr. Chairman, some of our Republican brethren have gulped down the initiative and referendum, and are now gingerly reaching for the recall. Others are protesting loudly that they always did have a fondness for the minimum wage for woman, abolition of child labor, and equal suffrage for woman. But, my brethren, you will find it difficult indeed to fool the people a second time with the taste of the last dose of medicine which you gave them still bitter in their mouths.

In 1908 you promised them a downward revision of the exorbitant tariff, responding then, for political reasons, to what you recognized as a very general demand for a speedy correction of the long-standing tariff abuses. The people still believing in your lip loyalty to their just demands returned you to power.

You refused to take advice and follow the lead of men like Dolliver, LA FOLLETTE, CUMMINS, and BRISTOW in the Senate, and MURDOCK, NORRIS, POINDEXTER, COOPER, and others in the House.

You bowed your heads to the edicts of the invisible Government, and in less than 18 months the people changed a Republican majority of 45 in this House to a Democratic majority of 62, and 2 years later completed the job by establishing a Progressive Party in Congress and making you the second minority party in the Nation.

Be not deceived, my brethren of the revenue-tariff faith, your success in the last two elections is by no means an indication that the American people have abandoned the protective-tariff principle. Your victory was not due to the strength of your cause or of your party, but was the result of a cave-in of the Republican Party, as well as a revolt on the part of progressive men and women of all parties against the domination of special privilege in the affairs of government.

The line is clean cut and distinct between the majority and the first and second minority parties on the tariff question. The Democrats are for a revenue tariff only, and claim that wages are not established by tariff rates. The Republicans are for a high protective tariff and claim that wages are established by tariff rates. The Progressives are for protection and equalization of competition by a tariff commission, with power to ascertain all the facts which properly enter in the making of a tariff rate. The Progressive Party believes that wages are affected, but by no means established by tariff rates; and that a tariff commission should have plenary power to ascertain whether or not the labor employed in protected industries is receiving a fair and just proportion of the benefits of that protection. How, I inquire, Mr. Chairman, can all these important facts be ascertained, and how can the Ways and Means Committee, which reported this bill to the House, arrive at any definite conclusion as to how their action in any of these schedules will affect the country under the system employed by the committee in making up this bill? It is an undeniable fact that the great highly protected textile industries of the country employ the poorest-paid labor in this country.

Wherever the committee increased or decreased the rate on any schedule, we ought to be furnished with correct and reliable information concerning the difference in overhead charges—cost of labor—and the value of imports in each case.

We have no complete or detailed report from the Ways and Means Committee, in which their reasons are stated for the changes they have made in these tariff schedules.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, the committee should report to the House the cost of production at home and abroad—the rates of duty here and in other countries, the extent of competition, if any, and all other information which is necessary to determine the correctness of the rates, which they ask us to establish by this bill.

THE INCOME TAX, ITS INEQUALITIES.

In 1894 Congress passed an income-tax law. The operation of that law was never tested. It was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Aside from the corporation-tax law, now in force, our Democratic friends have had no experience and very little material upon which to base the second section of this bill.

In attempting to accomplish the double purpose of reducing the cost of living and restoring competition, they have been compelled to make up the loss in revenue by direct tax. Three-fourths of the several States some months ago ratified the amendment to the Constitution, which permits Congress to pass an income-tax law, and therefore it may well be assumed that the people of this country, or at least a majority of them, are in favor of the income tax. Personally I am and have been for many years in favor of an income tax. A direct tax upon incomes, inheritances, and successions. The present bill, however, in my judgment contains many inequalities and unjust discriminations.

HOW IT WILL BE APPLIED.

The man whose income is a salary of two thousand or three thousand or thirty-nine hundred dollars, or the man whose only income from other sources is two thousand, three thousand, or thirty-nine hundred dollars will pay no tax under the provisions of this bill. The bill imposes upon the entire net income of the individual over and above $4,000 a normal tax of 1 per cent. Upon that part of the individual's net income over $20,000 and under $50,000 an additional tax of 1 per cent is provided, and upon that part of the individual's net income over $50,000 and under $100,000 an additional tax of 2 per cent. Upon that part of the individual's net income in excess of $100,000 it provides for a maximum tax of 3 per cent. In arriving at the net income the bill allows certain deductions, such as the necessary expense of carrying on any business, all sums paid by the individual as interest on indebtedness, also National, State, county, school, and municipal taxes, loss in trade, or from fires, storm, or shipwreck, worthless debts charged off during the year, and reasonable allowance for wear and tear of property used in business, dividends upon the stock of any corporation or company. The bill also provides for certain exemptions, interest upon the obligations of a State or any political subdivisions of a State, and upon the obligations of the United States, the principal and interest of which are now exempt by law from Federal taxation, the salary of the present President of the United States, the compensation of judges of the Federal courts now in office, the compensation of all officers and employees of a State or any political subdivision of a State. Why should these exemptions be allowed?

It appears also that dividends upon the stock of corporations are exempt, the reason presumably being that all such profits are now taxed at the uniform rate of 1 per cent under the corporation-tax law. The bill also provides that whenever possible the tax shall be payable at the source of the income. This would mean that the man or the corporation paying his or its employees an annual salary of more than $4,000 must make return to the Government of that fact, and must withhold from the salary of the employee and pay to the Government the proper amount to cover the income tax upon the salary. The same provision applies to lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees, executors, administrators, and receivers. This provision to me seems an invasion of the rights of the employees.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

The man whose income is $10,000 will pay 1 per cent on $6,000, or $60. The man with an income of $30,000 will pay 1 per cent on $26,000, or $260; then he will pay the additional tax of 1 per cent on $10,000, the amount of his income above $20,000, or $100. His total tax, therefore, will be $360. The man with an income of $125,000 will pay 1 per cent on $121,000, or $1,210; also an additional tax of 1 per cent on $30,000, that part of his income between $20,000 and $50,000, or $300; also the additional tax of 2 per cent on $50,000, that part of his income between $50,000 and $100,000, or $500; also an additional tax of 3 per cent on $25,000, that part of his income over $100,000, or $750. His total tax, therefore, will be $1,210 plus $300 plus $500 plus $750, or $2,760.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield me three minutes more?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Where does the gentleman from Kansas get the three minutes? I have no objection to the gentleman from Alabama yielding him three minutes, or I will yield the gentleman from Kansas three minutes out of his time to-morrow, but I am obliged to hold closely on account of the time yielded to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we have yielded one-half of the time to one-third of the membership, but I will not be parsimonious about the matter and will yield the gentleman from Illinois three minutes. But before yielding to him, in my own time, I would like to answer a question that he asked. He asked the question why we excepted the salary of the President of the United States to-day. I call his attention to the fact that the Constitution of the United States has prescribed that we can not diminish the salary of the President during his term of office. In President Lincoln's time that matter came before the Attorney General of the United States, and he decided that the tax would be equivalent to diminishing the salary, and for that reason the salary of the present President was not taxed. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Again, if Mr. Brown has an income of $3,500 from salary, he will pay no tax; and if Mr. Smith has an income of $3,500 from dividends, he will pay a tax of 1 per cent, or $35. His tax is to be paid direct by the corporation before the dividend is declared. It will, therefore, be seen that it may not come out of the dividends at all, but may be paid by the corporation from savings from other sources, such as wages to labor, clerk hire, and so forth.

Again, if Mr. Jones has an income of $4,500 from salary, he will pay a tax of 1 per cent on $500, or $5, to be deducted by his employer; but if Mr. Black has an income of $4,500 from dividends, there being no exemption, he will pay a tax of $45, while Mr. Green, who has an income of $4,500 from rents, will be allowed the exemption and his tax will be but $5.

A still further illustration of the inequalities of this bill in operation as between rents and dividends might be made, as follows:

Mr. A has an income of $60,000 from rents. He pays a tax of 1 per cent on $56,000, or $560; also an additional tax of 1 per cent on $30,000, or $300; also an additional tax of 2 per cent on $6,000, or $120, or a total tax of $980.

If Mr. B has an income of $60,000 from dividends, he will pay a normal tax of 1 per cent on the total amount, or $600.

In other words, the man who has an income of $60,000 from rents will pay $980 tax and the man who has an income of $60,000 from dividends will pay but $600.

I am unable to understand the logic of the discriminations affecting different kinds of property in the proposed bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I believe every true citizen, whether in or out of Congress, desires that the prosperity of the country and of our people shall continue under whatever tariff may finally be enacted by this Congress.

And while we differ very sharply as to methods, I am certain our aim is the ultimate prosperity and happiness of our common country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GUERNSEY].

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Chairman, the passing of the Federal Government under complete control of the Democratic Party on the 4th of March last—and southern control at that—foreshadowed changes in our governmental policies, but none foresaw that the most radical changes in the fiscal policy of the Nation since its formation were to be proposed and such as are presented by Chairman UNDERWOOD'S revenue-tariff, free-trade measure now under discussion.

This measure will put in force new methods for securing revenue for the support of the Government that not only will affect the wealthy of the country but those of most moderate means. It will compel the curtailment and in many instances the closing down of great industries that have been established under the protective-tariff system as the business of this country to-day is adjusted to a protective-tariff system.

The measure before the House was prepared with absolute disregard as to the cost of production abroad; absolute disregard of the effect of foreign competition; in absolute disregard of the extent that labor in the United States may be discharged as the result of increased importations from abroad.

In the campaign of 1912 and earlier in this House it was charged by Republicans that the Democratic Party was a free-trade party. With great heat this charge was denied here and denied throughout the United States prior to the election of 1912, yet the Underwood bill—the administration bill it may well be called—approaches nearer a free-trade measure than any tariff law ever presented to an American Congress. Its free list is of greater length. Imports aggregating last year more than one hundred millions, which paid a duty under existing law, would enter the country free under the provisions of this bill.

MORE FOREIGN GOODS.

Under the free-list provisions of the bill and the radical lower rates of the dutiable list importations from abroad will increase enormously. Every dollar of foreign product or merchandise that enters the country will replace labor and production here. Our money will be spent in the employment of labor abroad instead of at home.

Advocates of this measure claim it will lift the burden of taxation from the average man and lower the cost of living. Nevertheless the measure plans to collect from the country millions of dollars more than the existing law collects, and should its enactment be followed by stagnation in business it will add to the burdens of the people, and, instead of reducing the cost of living, as claimed by many, it will reduce living.

It is contended by those in charge of the bill that a protective tariff creates trusts, but regulation of tariffs will not prove the solution of the trust question, and, as many of the so-called trusts are to-day international in their scope, it is probable that the tariff reductions will have little effect upon them and in many instances greatly add to their advantage.

WILL LOSE CUBAN TRADE.

It is claimed for the measure that it will extend our foreign trade. It is obvious that it will increase our purchases abroad but not probable that it will materially increase our sales across the water, while in Cuba the passage of this measure will probably result in the termination of the preferential treaty with that island and the loss of a large and growing trade in flour, potatoes, and other products of the United States that are now sold in the Cuban market under the treaty advantages.

If the preferential treaty with Cuba is terminated, as I believe will be the ultimate result of the passage of this legislation, the Cuban trade will be lost by us to Canada, who will capture it with her subsidized steamship lines that are now being extended from the Maritime Provinces to the West Indies.

The present administration has taken over the Government of the United States while the country is enjoying the full swing of business prosperity that has existed throughout the entire period of the last Republican administration—industrial prosperity unequaled in our history. Never have our agricultural interests been so active and the encouragement to develop and cultivate the soil been so great as in recent years.

WILL DISCOURAGE AGRICULTURE.

The policy of the Government should be to encourage these conditions, as upon the prosperity of the farmer depends the prosperity and future of the Nation. The measure before Congress holds out no inducements to our agricultural interests. Indeed, this bill seems to have been drawn wholly for the purpose of slaughtering the American farmer. None of his products are left untouched. It is far worse than reciprocity, as it places him in direct competition with the world. It will compel him to compete with the farming conditions of Europe, and may compel him to withhold his children from school and his wife from the household for work in the field.

This measure will not only bring depression to our agricultural interests, but to our manufacturing interests, if we can judge anything by our political history, which is full of the record of disaster that has almost invariably followed radical reductions in the tariff. Many times in the past 124 years, since the adoption of the Constitution, we, as a people, have changed our financial policy, sometimes from protection toward free trade, and as often been driven back to the policy of protection by hard experience.

FIRST PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

From 1812 to 1816 the country enjoyed its first real protective-tariff laws. During that period five in number were enacted, which increased the entire list of duties about 100 per cent. Under the policy the American market was reserved for the American manufacturer, and notwithstanding the severe drain of the war with England the country was more prosperous and wealthy at the close of the war than at its beginning.

ACT OF 1816.

April 27, 1816, Congress by an act greatly reduced the duties, with the result that business depression came over the country. Henry Clay described the effect some years later:

We behold—

He said—

general distress pervading the whole country; unthrashed crops of grain perishing in our barns for want of a market; universal complaint of the want of employment and consequent reduction of the wages of labor. Property of the Nation has on an average sunk not less than 50 per cent within a few years.

TARIFF OF 1824.

May 22, 1824, Congress passed a new tariff act. It was a protective tariff, and was followed by business revival. The factory, the farm, our shipping, mercantile, commercial, and every branch of business enjoyed great prosperity. In 1828 the duties were further increased by Congress. Mr. Clay, in an eloquent speech in the United States Senate on February 2, 1832, said:

If I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of our Constitution which exhibited a scene of the most undisputed dismay and dissolution it would be exactly that term of seven years immediately preceding the establishment of the tariff of 1824. If a term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which the people ever enjoyed it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff law of 1824.

On July 14, 1832, a new tariff law was enacted to reduce the duties to a uniform level of 20 per cent ad valorem. The reduction was gradual and extended over a period of several years, but its effect on business was disastrous. One writer charges it generally to being the cause of the great financial crisis of 1837. He said of it:

Within five years a panic swept over the country that almost beggars description for its severity and its distress. Not only were manufactures prostrated, but commerce, navigation, mining, and especially agriculture shared in the general wreck. Mortgages were foreclosed and forced sales made in every direction.

In 1840 the voters of the country rose in their might and drove from power the party that they held responsible for the tariff of 1832, and on August 30, 1842, another protective law became effective. During its existence, a period of four years, business of the country recovered and financial distress and depression passed away, and the prosperity of the agricultural and manufacturing interests were restored.

TARIFF OF 1846.

The Walker tariff, as the tariff measure of 1846 is often called, was a low-tariff measure and is often pointed to by the Democratic Party as the tariff that brought the greatest and most beneficial results to the country, thereby justifying low tariff rates.

But conditions other than tariff affected that period. Successful war with Mexico and the expenditure and distribution of $150,000,000 in the country in order to carry on the war stimulated industry. Gold was discovered in California, giving further impetus to business, while famine in Ireland made enormous demands for our breadstuffs.

As time passed on, however, the benefits of these unusual conditions passed away, and March 3, 1857, the duties were further lowered by Congress, and there followed business depression in all classes of industry. President Buchanan, in a message to Congress late in 1857, called attention to the situation in the following language:

In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, and private enterprise of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

With these distressing conditions throughout the country the demand for a revision of the tariff system became imminent, and it was revised along the lines of a protective tariff, which went into effect on March 2, 1861, at the very close of the Buchanan administration.

The McKinley law, as the law of October 6, 1890, is generally known, was a protective-tariff measure, but before its effect could be judged the election of November, 1890, occurred and a Democratic majority was chosen in the House of Representatives, and with the impetus thus gained two years later the Democratic Party elected Grover Cleveland President and secured control of the Senate as well as the House.

For a long period protective tariffs had been in force and a demand existed in the country for a trial of lower customs rates. In response to this the Democratic Party sought to enact legislation in accordance with the Democratic ideas of tariff reform.

TARIFF OF 1894.

August 27, 1894, the Wilson-Gorman bill became a law, and became such without the approval of President Cleveland, who withheld his signature. The measure was publicly condemned by the President and later by the country. It was a low-tariff measure, and its effect on business was destructive. Farm values throughout the country went to the lowest point that they had reached for many years. All classes of farm products and stock were practically without a market. Unemployed men swarmed the country in every direction in search of work. Able-bodied men accepted labor at wages that gave them practically nothing but their board. Manufacturing everywhere was at a standstill, trade and commerce were paralyzed. The Government revenues fell to so low a point that it was compelled to issue bonds to pay its running expenses. These conditions not only followed the enactment of the 1894 law, but began to accumulate some time prior to its enactment in anticipation of its results. Again the country turned after this bitter experience to a protective tariff, with the result that in the elections that followed in 1896 the Republican Party was returned to power in both branches of Congress, and William McKinley was elected President of the United States.

In 1897 the Dingley tariff law—probably the most skillfully drawn protective-tariff law that this country has ever known—was placed on the statute books of the Federal Government. The results that followed this law were most strikingly beneficial. Business of the country was restored to a sound financial basis. Prosperity burst forth in every line of industry. Since its enactment farms and the mills have flourished to an extent unequaled in our history as a Nation. The results of the measure vindicate to the very last degree the wisdom of the protective-tariff system for this country.

The tariff law of 1909 continued in force the protective policies under which the Nation had made such great progress since the enactment of the law of 1897.

In the light of the history of tariff legislation of this country, can it be expected that the radical lowering of rates proposed by the Underwood bill will be beneficial? How can we view the provisions of the bill other than with alarm?

The Democratic Party is not unlike a man who has just inherited a rich estate. Will the party be able to carry it on, continue its prosperity, and increase it, or will it, through the adoption of most violent and radical changes in the fiscal policy, experimental and uncertain in result, stop production, ruin the estate, and leave it mortgaged and in bankruptcy?

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NEW ENGLAND.

An examination of the proposed tariff law leads me to believe that it is not only built along free-trade lines, but it intentionally discriminates against industries of the New England States. For years Senators and Representatives of the West have been charging that New England was unduly favored in tariff legislation, and I believe that the same feeling is entertained in the South, as during tariff discussion within two years a prominent Member from a Southern State declared on the floor of the House that he was in favor of a tariff that would close the cotton mills of New England and force them to move to the cotton fields of the South, where they belonged. Congress and the Presidency are to-day in control of southern men.

WOOLEN INDUSTRY.

The tariff bill itself bears evidence of this discrimination. It makes radical reductions in the duties on cotton goods. It is especially aimed at the great woolen industry of New England. It is toward the manufacturer of woolen goods that the full force and fury of this Democratic revision seems to be directed. Here we find the most severe cuts in the rates. These mills are to-day in sharp competition between themselves. Add foreign competition and many will be compelled to close their doors.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee asserted here on the floor but yesterday that the old, worn-out mills were being sustained through tariff legislation. Did he refer to the woolen industry of New England? There may be some such mills, but the vast majority of the New England woolen mills are the most modern in equipment and up to date in construction to be found in this or any other country.

SHOE INDUSTRY.

That leading industry in New England, the shoe industry, seems also to have been selected for sacrifice, as shoes have been placed on the free list. Why does the Democratic Party favor endangering the shoe industry of the New England States? American shoe machinery will be set up in Europe, operated by the low-cost labor of foreign countries, and our markets supplied by the foreign article. This must be the inevitable result.

SARDINE INDUSTRY.

The New England fish industry is also the subject for severe attack by the provisions of this bill. The rates proposed for the sardine packers of Maine threaten to transfer a great portion, if not the whole, of that important industry to Canada, an industry which has built up and maintains large communities along the coast of Maine. If present wage scales are maintained for those employed in this industry, competition with the Canadians will be impossible, and much less with Norway, which is a strong competitor for the American market, and where, I am told, the labor of girls employed is from 18 to 20 cents and men from 40 to 50 cents per day.

MAINE PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY.

A New England industry of great importance, not only to New England but to the country, is that of paper making. In the State of Maine alone there are 44 pulp or paper mills in operation. They represent investments of more than $40,000,000 in mill properties and employ more than 15,000 men. One company alone—the Great Northern Paper Co.—has an investment of more than $18,000,000 employed in paper making. It employs 1,500 men in its mills and in getting the raw material from the forest about 3,500 men, and produces 565 tons of paper per day.

These paper companies are developing the resources of the State. They are developing the heretofore undeveloped water powers of the State. They are developing properties, towns, and communities, often in the very wilderness of Maine. They are supporting thousands of people of the State, giving millions of tons of freight to railroads, and furnishing business to the business men of Maine, large and small.

The future of the State of Maine depends to a great extent upon the continuance and development of this great industry. There is an empire undeveloped in northern Maine, though it is in the older part of the United States. It is a vast territory containing millions of acres of unbroken forest that slopes toward the St. John's waters and is drained by that important river. On this territory it is estimated that there is about fifty millions of cords of pulp wood, which would supply an annual stock forever, by cutting at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, to paper mills producing 2,000 tons of news-print paper per day.

Great paper mills are on the eve of construction along the St. John River in Canada. Pass this bill unamended and you will insure the delivery of the great wood products from more than 4,000,000 acres of Maine forests to paper companies along the St. John, in New Brunswick, for manufacturing into a finished product to the upbuilding and growth of the Dominion of Canada, not alone for the present, but for all time.

Pass this bill unamended and you will prevent the development of this great raw-material producing territory within the United States and prevent the development of its vast undeveloped water powers, estimated to be equivalent to 200,000 horsepower, now running to waste. To my mind, the situation I have just mentioned presents a most forcible illustration of the possibility and probability of driving by legislation raw material out of the United States for manufacture into a finished product in a neighboring country. The northern Maine situation should cause Congress to pause and give to it its fullest consideration, as it is of the greatest importance. This bill will decide as to whether water power to the extent of hundreds of thousands of horsepower shall be developed and employed in the manufacture into a finished product raw material within our own country, for our own people, and the development of our natural resources.

KEEP RAW MATERIAL AT HOME.

Amend this bill so as to give this great industry fair treatment and reasonable protection. Give to it at least such protection as the Mann report said it should have, and in so doing you will legislate to save to the people of the United States the enormous natural wealth in raw material in northern Maine, and in so doing you will legislate to develop the resources of the country and upbuild the United States. My time to speak on this subject is too limited to do it justice, and I can not find language strong enough in which to condemn this legislation which will turn over to Canada the products of one of our great forests, and at the very time when the Canadian Provinces are passing restrictions that compel the manufacture within the Dominion of Canada into finished products, the products of her forests. In view of our own situation and the ease with which we might reserve these natural resources to ourselves—in view of the attitude of the Dominion and Provincial Governments—this legislation as proposed is unexplainable, unless, as it has seemed to me, that there is a well-determined purpose to discriminate against the New England States.

CANADIAN POTATO MENACE.

One of the chief food products of the country is potatoes. One of the great potato-growing sections of the country is New England and particularly the State of Maine. This industry in Maine is exceptionally exposed to foreign competition. On three sides the State is surrounded by Canada. Across the international line farm lands equally as good as those within the State are valued at 30 to 50 per cent less. Farm labor per month is proportionately less. The potato pickers of Aroostook County last fall were paid from $2.50 to $3 per day, while at the same time in the Annapolis Valley, in Nova Scotia, the same class of labor was receiving $1.50 per day.

The Democratic tariff bill selects this great food product grown in New England States for sacrifice, placing it on the free list and placing it there now, with the result that it will imperil the price of the crop this year; placing it there in the face of the fact that foreign potatoes can enter the markets of New York and Boston, the great potato markets of the East, at water rates far cheaper than northern Maine potatoes can be transported to such points by rail.

DANGER OF FOREIGN POTATOES.

The danger of this foreign competition is clearly shown by the extent that foreign potatoes entered these markets during the last fiscal year, even with the present tariff in force. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, there were imported into this country from England 3,377,426 bushels; from Scotland 4,645,877 bushels, and from Ireland 4,606,981 bushels of potatoes, which, together with some other importations, brought the total amount of potatoes imported up to nearly 14,000,000 of bushels, which paid the duty of 25 cents per bushel and entered our markets. With that duty removed foreign potatoes many times that amount will annually be imported and take from our farmers our markets to that extent.

MAINE FARMERS INJURED.

Add to the foreign competition the competition of Canada, with her lower-priced lands, lower-paid labor, and cheap water transportation from the Maritime Provinces to Boston and New York markets and it will be seen that the Maine potato grower will, under the provisions of the pending bill, suffer from severe shrinkage in his land investment and in loss of market for his product. All considered, the present 25 cents duty is none too much to properly equalize conditions with the potato producer, foreign or Canadian.

If this administration believes that a reduction in the potato tariff should be made, it should be made gradually; only a portion should be removed at this time. The immediate free listing of this important product, in the production of which so many have their all invested, will bring financial ruin to large numbers of farmers in the New England States. If this provision in the bill free listing potatoes is allowed to stand and become a law, the Democratic Party must be held accountable in the elections to come for whatever distress and disaster follows. This tariff discrimination against potatoes is particularly unjust in view of the fact that the framers of the bill in dealing with other important food products not grown in New England dealt differently.

UNFAIR DISCRIMINATION.

The great wheat-growing sections of the Northwest are allowed to retain a duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat to guard their product against the wheat fields of Canada. The rice of Texas and other Southern States is amply protected under the provisions of this bill for the well-known reason that in the South they are making at present large investments in rice culture and a protective tariff is necessary to promote the industry; consequently the rice growers are taken care of. The producers of pineapples, oranges, and grapefruit in Florida are allowed protective duties, and the Louisiana sugar grower is given three years in which to adjust his business to the proposed free listing of his product.

I assert again that the Underwood tariff measure now before Congress contains in its provisions deliberate, intentional, and unjust discriminations against the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the New England States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect when I came to Congress to take part in enacting a tariff measure for the benefit of Canada, or, to be more accurate, I did not expect to be compelled to oppose certain items of a measure that protects Canadian industries at the expense of the agricultural and milling industries of this country.

I had always believed that there was a clear line of demarcation between free trade, tariff for revenue only, and a protective tariff, and that any bill or measure that was proposed or enacted into law in this Congress would be based upon one of these policies; but it is apparent that the measure now before the House for consideration is neither a protective measure, nor a tariff-for-revenue-only measure, nor a free-trade measure.

Mr. Chairman, whatever it may be, certain features of it and certain items in it are against the best interests and welfare of the people of this country. I call the special attention of the House at this time to the items affecting wheat and the manufactured products of wheat, oats and the manufactured products of oats.

This measure places the raw material on the protective list and the manufactured product on the free list. In my limited experience, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I have never heard of such an economic propaganda being proposed. I know of no other country that has ever attempted or that now has such a provision in its tariff regulations. I know of no other country that has attempted to discriminate against its own manufacturers, its own workers, and its own producers for the benefit of the people of a foreign country.

On the contrary, every country that has a tariff gives the advantage to the importation of raw material, so that its mills and its factories may furnish employment for its labor. Every country on the face of the globe gives its manufacturers, its laborers, and its producers at least an equal opportunity with the foreign competitors, and many give them an advantage. For example: In Belgium, Russia, and British India there is a duty on flour, while wheat is free. In the United Kingdom, Denmark, Netherlands, and China both wheat and flour are free. In all other wheat and flour producing countries there is a duty on both wheat and flour, and the duty on flour is at least compensatory to that on wheat. But this bill proposes a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and a like duty per bushel on oats. At the same time it proposes to admit the manufactured products of these cereals free. What basis there is for such procedure is absolutely inconceivable.

Mr. Chairman, the framers of this bill recognized the necessity of protecting the farmer by placing a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and oats. Immediately following is a provision admitting the manufactured products of wheat and oats free, which nullifies the benefit that the farmer would get from the protection put upon his products. When flour is placed on the free list, can anyone show, by any process of reasoning, that the farmer will retain his protection of 10 cents per bushel on his product, which the authors of this bill concede he is entitled to? It does not require much investigation for anyone to discover that the very thing which by this bill it is conceded the farmer is entitled to is immediately, in the same bill, taken from him.

It is not for me, Mr. Chairman, to question the motives of the makers of this bill. I am simply going to confine myself to pointing out to this House before it casts its votes for such an unfair, unjust, and discriminatory measure its inequality and iniquity.

Not being content with attempting to make the farmer believe that he is being protected to the extent of 10 cents per bushel on his products, the framers of this bill also try to placate the flour producer by inserting a clause providing for a contravailing duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on flour imported into the United States from a country imposing a duty on flour made in this country. By writing into the proposed law this contravailing clause the authors of this bill also admit and affirmatively declare that the American manufacturer of flour needs a compensatory duty of 10 per cent ad valorem to equalize the handicap imposed upon him by placing a duty on the raw material. The contravailing clause is an admission by the framers of this bill that the American miller needs a compensatory duty to enable him to compete with the Canadian miller on an equal basis.

But of what benefit, Mr. Chairman, is the contravailing clause? Will not Canada immediately remove the duty on flour imported from this country and thus be enabled to export her flour into this country free of duty? Does anyone for an instant believe that Canada will fail to avail herself of the opportunity afforded of trading a market of 8,000,000 people for a market of 95,000,000 ; ople? Is it not a fact that under normal conditions the average price of wheat per bushel in Winnipeg is 10 cents less than in Minneapolis? And as proof of this proposition, Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert in the RECORD a table prepared by the Tariff Board showing the average monthly prices from 1905 to 1910 of wheat in Minneapolis and Winnipeg:

These tables show that the Minneapolis prices have been higher than the Winnipeg prices sixty-five times, while the Winnipeg prices have been higher than the Minneapolis prices only six times. They show that during these 72 months covered by these tables the Winnipeg prices have been 5 cents higher than the Minneapolis prices only once, while the Minneapolis prices have been more than 10 cents higher than the Winnipeg prices eighteen times and more than 5 cents higher forty-five times.

Is it not a fact that the Canadian miller enjoys transportation facilities equal with our own miller? Is it not a fact that, as far as the cost of transportation is concerned, he can place his flour in the markets of this country as cheaply as can the home manufacturer? In this connection I wish to submit a report which I received from the Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shows that the cost of shipping wheat and flour from Winnipeg to Boston and from Minneapolis to Boston is approximately the same, and that the cost of shipment from Emerson to Port Arthur is about the same as the cost of shipment from Pembina to Duluth.

Is it not a fact that the fertile Canadian wheat fields produce on the average 4 bushels more per acre than do the wheat fields of the United States? In this connection I wish to call attention to the average wheat yield per acre of the three great wheat-growing States—Minnesota, North and South Dakota—in 1911 and 1912, and also the average wheat yield per acre of the wheat fields of western Canada:

Wheat yield per acre.

Not wishing to tire the House by going into a detailed statement of the resources and productiveness of Western Canada as a wheat-producing country, I wish to quote what Mr. Fisher, former secretary of agriculture of Canada, said during the recent reciprocity controversy:

If reciprocity is going to result in our northwestern farmers selling their wheat to the United States market, why will they do it? Simply because the price the American miller will pay for it will be higher than the Canadian miller has been willing to pay for it. If 1,000,000 people in 1909, cultivating 7,000,000 acres of wheat, produced 147,000,000 bushels, what will the people of the Canadian Northwest produce when that country is fairly well filled up and we have five or six millions between the Great Lakes and the Rocky Mountains? That estimate of the future population of the Northwest is not an extravagant one, nor need we look very far ahead for these results. When that comes the Canadian Northwest will produce 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat. I venture to say that the farmers will need not only the home market and the American market but also the European market in which to sell the wheat.

Not only has Canada boundless wheat fields but she has excellent mills, that are to-day capable of grinding 111,000 barrels per day. The capacity of these mills is being rapidly increased, and it will be increased far more rapidly if the proposed measure becomes a law.

Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that the proposed tariff law gives the Canadian miller free access to our market, and that for every barrel of flour that comes into our market from 4½ to 5 bushels of the home market for home-grown wheat is displaced? Will not the American farmer be compelled to sell his wheat to the home miller for as low a price as the Canadian farmer sells his wheat to the Canadian miller, or take his choice of selling his wheat for export or cease growing wheat? Where, then, is the protection for the farmer proposed by this measure? Where, then, are the producers of 621,000,000 bushels of wheat going to market their product? In what respect does the proposed law protect the farmer in the enjoyment of his home market? Is it not apparent from what I have stated that the placing of a duty of 10 cents per bushel on the importation of wheat into this country is simply a blind to hoodwink our agriculturists?

Mr. Chairman, I have dwelt at length upon the competition that the American farmer and miller has to fear from Canada, because she is our next-door neighbor and has the greatest wheat fields, developed and undeveloped, in the world, and she has and is building the finest mills in the world. She has more coal in the ground and greater water powers than any other wheat-producing country. Can we comprehend all this and at the same time believe that the home market of the farmer and manufacturer is secure if such a measure is passed?

But Canada is not the only country, Mr. Chairman, that can take advantage of this law. Great Britain is in a position to take advantage of it at once. She has great mills and is the clearing house for the surplus wheat of the world.

The Argentine Republic, with a population of only 5,000,000, produces annually from 175,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat and only needs 25,000,000 of it for her home market. The balance she can export in either the shape of flour or wheat. She enjoys water transportation direct to the doors of our markets, and that is the cheapest kind of transportation.

Mr. Chairman, I might go on and take other wheat-producing countries and show the probability of their becoming rivals in our own markets, but I have confined myself to those which are not only probable competitors but which I consider absolutely certain to become active competitors in our markets.

Is it not apparent that the measure under consideration, first, concedes that the farmer is entitled to protection of 10 cents per bushel on his wheat; second, concedes that the miller is entitled to a countervailing duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on his flour as a compensatory duty to make up the loss to him for the 10 cents a bushel duty he has to pay on his raw material? Third, is it not also apparent and can any other conclusion be drawn but that the farmer and the miller are deprived of the benefits which the framers of this bill declare they are entitled to?

And we, as Members of this House, are asked to vote for that sort of legislation, which, upon its face, brands it as unjust and unfair.

The authors of this bill, astute men as they are, having recognized the fact that they have robbed the miller of his home market, have incorporated in this bill a "drawback clause" calculated to give him an export market in exchange for the home market taken away from him. If this provision is of benefit to the miller, how will it benefit the farmer? What benefit will he derive from the fact that legislation is enacted enabling the miller to manufacture foreign wheat into flour without paying any duty on that wheat? Does not 30 per cent of every bushel imported under the "drawback" come into competition, in the shape of by-products, with the produce of the farm? And is it not a fact, that while the miller has turned over his mill to the manufacture of imported wheat into flour under the "drawback" that the demand of the miller for home-grown wheat is lessened? This "drawback" can only be taken advantage of by the milling company which owns several mills. The small mills of the country can not take advantage of it, as under the provisions of the drawback the miller must specifically identify the exported flour as being made from wheat that he imported before he is entitled to his drawback, and in order to do this he must set aside one or more mills for the manufacture into flour of nothing but imported wheat. It is obvious that the small mills can not take advantage of this provision, and there are over 11,000 small mills in this country, distributed over every State in the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would rather not, as I close my speech in a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious to me, and I believe it is to everyone who has given the matter careful consideration, that the provisions of the proposed law that I have called attention to are manifestly unwise, unjust, and unfair, not only to the farmers and the millers but to all who form a part of our whole industrial and economic system.

One of the most distinguished men on the Ways and Means Committee admitted to-day that the only difference it made was 1 mill on a bushel of wheat. Gentlemen, can you go through all the forms provided for collecting the duty on wheat, get the drawback, and pay back to the Government anything? Is it not an unnecessary expense heaped upon a trade, and for what? For the purpose of deceiving the farmer and deceiving the miller. There may be some slight advantage to the large miller, but none to the small miller, and there is not a particle of advantage to the farmer. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3321, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 62. Joint resolution making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 23, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the committee appointed to attend the unveiling of the Jefferson memorial at St. Louis, Mo. Regretting that I will be unable to attend the exercises or serve in any capacity, I am,

Very respectfully,
J. W. COLLIER,
Representative Eighth District of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BORLAND as a member of that committee.

TARIFF REPORT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk in relation to an additional print of the tariff report. I find that we can not get enough under the order of the House, and I am obliged to get them by a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 20,000 additional copies of the report of the Ways and Means Committee on H. R. 3321, 15,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be apportioned as follows: Two thousand to the Committee on Ways and Means, 1,000 to the House document room, 12,000 to the House folding room, and 5,000 for the use of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321, the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, although this is my second term, I confess that I still feel some embarrassment when I rise in the House of Representatives, and see all the seats filled and the galleries full to overflowing, and it is hard for me to overcome that embarrassment and properly address myself to the business of the House—the tariff bill under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, this bill to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, is only different from other Democratic tariff bills in the past in that it cuts a little deeper, is a little more drastic, and is a little more reprehensible than former measures, and also contains the income-tax feature.

Aside from that you could almost imagine it to be the same handiwork of the committee that framed the Mills bill of 1888 and those again who wrote the Wilson bill of 1894. The same old stock arguments that have been handed down by Democratic Ways and Means Committees since 1846 are used here. They evidently go on the theory "that there is nothing new under the sun," especially in the ideas of Democracy. Like the laws of the Medes and Persians, they are immutable.

Mr. Chairman, the people and the Government of the United States have been the most prosperous in the last decade of any nation in this or any other like period of the world's history.

There has been greater advancement in all material things than ever before, and we think in moral and mental attributes as well. Our people have been better fed, better clothed, better warmed, better taught, and better protected in all essentials than ever before in our history—not that we have been free from hunger, want, and suffering, or from oppression and outrages of various kinds. Unfortunately, we will probably never be free from such misfortunes and calamities, but we have had less of these than at many other periods in our history.

Mr. Chairman, it was inevitable that at a time of such unprecedented prosperity some abuses should arise, some mistakes be made. It has been found that certain interests were benefiting by the mistakes and abuse which crept in during this great period of development, of exploitation, and national prosperity. The entire people have become convinced of that fact and have been clamoring for corrections of abuses, for laws curbing special privileges, and for the checking of unlawful combinations in restraint of trade.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] referred with some pride in his opening speech on this bill to that period prior to the Civil War when, under Democratic Congresses, this country levied low tariff duties under which both the Government and the people thrived and prospered. He evidently got those ideas from some of the reports of later Democratic Ways and Means Committees who were endeavoring to justify their attempts to put this country on a free trade or tariff for revenue basis and not from competent records written by members of his own party.

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENT TELLS OF DEMOCRATIC TARIFF DISTRESS.

Mr. Chairman, President Buchanan in his first annual message to the Thirty-fifth Congress speaks differently of those good old times so graphically described by the gentleman from Alabama. President Buchanan had this to say of the condition of the country, the finances, and the distress of the people:

> We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet notwithstanding all these advantages our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.
> Under the circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people. With this the Government can not fail deeply to sympathize, though it may be without the power to extend relief.

Does this extract from the message of a Democratic President correspond with the claims of universal prosperity in ante bellum days? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, by an unfortunate contretemps, which it is not worth while to discuss at this time, the Democratic Party has again come into control of the affairs of this Nation.

That party has been a splendid minority party in the past. As an instrument for holding in check the majority it has been excellent, but as a majority party history shows that partisan Democracy has never measured up to the standard necessary for the welfare of the American people.

Like individuals and families, the only way a political party can grow is by correcting its mistakes, initiating new methods, profiting by past failures, and trying to attain to higher things. Has the Democratic Party grasped this fact? No; it is attempting to better the condition of the American people by materially reducing the purchasing power of the majority of that people by striking a body blow at the greatest factor in our national prosperity, the agricultural classes of our country. This class, by the very nature of things, distribution, diversity of products, and economic position, becomes the prime factor in our development and material welfare, and fortunate indeed is the nation which by fostering care and jealous guard maintains agriculturalists as the bulwark of its moral and physical well-being.

AX, NOT JACKSCREW, USED ON FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama said that in framing this bill they had attempted to use a jackscrew and let rates down gradual, and had not used an ax. The gentleman should have qualified the remark with an exception as to agricultural products, to which, with but few exceptions, they have applied the ax most ruthlessly; also to the lumber industry of the country, including lath and shingles.

He says agricultural products were only reduced 42 per cent, but in reality it was lowered double that amount, and the leaving of 10 cents a bushel tariff on wheat was simple irony when flour was placed on the free list, the only result being to injure the farmers' home market, the milling industry, and to destroy his opportunity for getting any better than an export price for his heretofore differential or milling grades. The products of the agriculturalists of the United States placed on the free list are bran and wheat, screenings, broom corn, buckwheat and buckwheat flour, corn or maize, corn meal, cotton, flax straw, berries, hides of cattle, lard, meats of all kinds, including fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, bacon and hams; milk and cream, including preserved or condensed; oats (10 cents a bushel), oatmeal, rolled oats, and oat hulls; potatoes, dried, desiccated, and so forth; rye and rye flour; skins of goats and sheep; swine or hogs; tallow; wheat (10 cents a bushel), wheat flour, and semolina.

Agricultural products not on the free list have been reduced in many cases more than 50 per cent—wheat from 25 cents to 10 cents a bushel, but is practically free when flour is made free.

Hay was reduced from $4 a ton to $2 a ton, 50 per cent, and apples from 25 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel, or 2½ cents the bushel less than the Canadian rate.

REPUBLICAN PARTY KEPT FAITH WITH FARMERS.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a widespread belief in this country that Canada, our northern neighbor, was in no sense of the word a fruit country; that the seasons were so cold and capricious there that it was next to impossible for them to raise even the hardier varieties of fruits. And I suppose such is the opinion of the Ways and Means Committee which is responsible for this bill; otherwise I can hardly conceive that they would have put the tariff on apples down to 10 cents a bushel, which is 2½ cents less than the tariff rate charged by Canada. The Republican Party in framing tariff measures has always attempted to keep faith with the agricultural classes, and up until two years ago, when Mr. Taft was unfortunately advised to negotiate the Canadian reciprocity misnomer, in which he was so ably abetted and backed by the Democratic Party, no Republican has attempted to double-cross them. Mr. Taft, backed up by Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, and by ex-President Roosevelt, of Oyster Bay, and by the majority of the newspapers of the country, who hoped for a personal gain in free printing paper, stood for a reciprocity, which was a gold-brick fake to the American farmer, and that more than any other one thing contributed to his being retired to private life. His being unfortunate in his advisers did not excuse or lessen his responsibility.

The Republican Party, realizing that Canada's great orchard country lay contiguous to ours, and not wishing to turn our great market of scores of manufacturing cities in close proximity to Canada over to them on equal terms with the farmers of New York, Michigan, Ohio, Missouri, and all the other great apple-producing States, who help to build our roads, our bridges, our schoolhouses, and to support our county and State governments, put a tariff of 25 cents a bushel on Canadian apples to equalize those burdens and to insure to the American growers their home market. The result has been very beneficial to the industry, and the prices have been satisfactory to the American grower and not excessive to the consumer. The growing of orchards has been stimulated until thousands of acres of orchards have been planted, extending from New York to Georgia and all along the great Appalachian chain, Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland, and many other States adding to their orchard area very extensively, hoping to reap profits from a growing industry.

AMERICAN APPLE MARKET TURNED OVER TO CANADA.

Canada, on account of a 25-cent duty against its apples, has been forced to market its surplus abroad, and take the risks attendant on distant shipments by both rail and water. Canada has not been adding to her orchard area as has the United States, still its surplus sales have been considerable for the past few years. In 1910 Canada bought from the United States 59,071 barrels of apples, valued at $261,792, and sold abroad the same year 1,040,000 barrels for $4,418,567, her exports exceeding her imports by five to one. In 1908 she exceeded that. In 1910 Canada also shipped 8,126,984 pounds of dried apples. Without any commercial orchards of consequence the Dominion is shipping a surplus of green and dried apples equivalent to 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 bushels of apples. What is it capable of doing when the tariff rate is placed so low that it is more profitable to sell in the United States than to ship abroad? I hear my Democratic friends saying that it will cost as much, or more, to raise apples in Canada than in the United States. I think they are mistaken, for successful raising is one that demands eternal vigilance to keep down fungus diseases and insect pests, and every mile you travel south from the most northerly point they can be raised those fungus and insect pests become more numerous and virulent. The successful grower of apples or any other kind of fruit in the mild climates will earn all profits he can get out of the business, and should be protected against those countries that do not help to maintain this one.

QUESTION: WHO ARE NONCONSUMERS?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama yesterday laid great stress on what they were going to do for the great consuming class in the country. I can easily comprehend the difference between a producing class and a nonproducing class, but I must confess I find it impossible to understand what the gentleman denominates the great consuming class. I find it utterly impossible to differentiate as to consumers. We are all consumers, and I maintain that the gentleman's measure, while it will undoubtedly reduce the cost of living in some instances, will do infinitely more harm than good, because every million of dollars he lowers the purchasing power of the American producers by giving their market to foreign producers takes just that much wealth from the development and growth of our own activities and lessens our own general welfare beyond recall. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama very eloquently told of how they were going to secure eighty to one hundred millions of revenue from the income tax, and when I looked at his figures I found that out of a total population of nearly 100,000,000 people there were only 425,000 people who they estimate would have net incomes of $4,000 or more—less than one-half of 1 per cent of our population. Are we to judge from the fact that the agriculturists of the country are hit the heaviest in this tariff bill that you consider a large majority of this income from the "malefactors of great wealth" will be derived from the agricultural classes, and help to reduce their arrogance and pride? No; I am satisfied you had no such thought, and I have no doubt that the farmer was practically left out of your calculation in preparing this table, yet he produced values in 1910 of nearly $9,000,000,000, or almost two-thirds as much as was realized on all the manufactured products of the United States, including repairs in that period. He paid out nearly $700,000,000 for labor in 1910, and $130,000,000 for agricultural machinery and more than $114,000,000 for fertilizers.

FARMER LABORS LONGEST FOR LEAST GAIN.

Of the wealth he creates he probably gets the smallest net gain of any line of business in the United States, puts in the longest hours at labor, endures more hardships incident to exposure to variable weather and climatic conditions, has fewer of what are termed comforts of life and more of its vicissitudes than any other class. He stands to lose his all by flood or drought, by hot winds or frigid weather, by chinch bugs, boll weevil, Hessian fly, San Jose scale, army worms, insects, or fungous diseases that prey upon the products of his toil, and last, but not least, Democratic tariff revisionists who openly say they are going to reduce the cost of his products and cut the cost of living to the consumer by making it possible for increased importations from abroad of all those things which he produces.

They expect to compensate him for his losses by giving him free agricultural machinery, free binding twine that is now on the free list, and yet the Statistical Abstract shows that from 1900 to 1910 there was not a dollar's worth of agricultural machinery imported into the United States, while we exported more than $28,000,000 worth in the year 1910.

Putting agricultural machinery on the free list is simply buncombe. There was never a protest from any agricultural machinery manufacturers against their product going on the free list. No other country makes as good a class of agricultural machinery as we do, and our farmers would not buy foreign implements if they were imported. Your putting this product on the free list will not cause any foreign capital to engage in its manufacture for export to this country, for they well know that a succeeding Congress can and probably will change that provision in the law.

WASHINGTON STATE COMPLETELY DEPRIVED OF PROTECTION.

Mr. Chairman, there are none of the products of my State that this bill fails to put on the free list or reduce to a minimum—lumber, shingles, lath, fish, flour, rye and rye flour, oatmeal and milling products; barley, 54 per cent of present rate; barley malt, 60 per cent; wheat, 10 per cent—practically free; oats, 50 per cent reduction for feed, free as far as milling oats is concerned, as oatmeal is free; hay, 50 per cent reduction; cattle, reduced 62½ per cent; beef, free; horses valued at $150 or less, 54 per cent; at over $150, 60 per cent reduction; mules valued at $150 or more, 77½ per cent reduction; mules valued at $150 or less, 60 per cent reduction; horses and mules, average, 60 per cent reduction; sheep, 61 per cent reduction; wool, free; mutton, free; hogs, free; lard, pork, hams, bacon, free. On shingles alone my State, which produced 59.6 per cent of the entire output of the United States as compiled by the 1910 census, making 8,879,467 thousands out of a total of 14,907,371 thousands, total of the United States, worth on an average of $1.81 per thousand.

Mr. Chairman, this price of $1.81 a thousand in 1909 at the factory does not seem excessive to me. I hardly think the people who made them for that price can ever become "malefactors of great wealth" or bloated capitalists, yet they are a great factor in the welfare of my State, and at the price mentioned produced that year $16,066,405 worth, giving employment to thousands of people and diffusing this vast sum into the arteries of commerce in my State. The Ways and Means Committee has ruthlessly "jackscrewed" duty on this product "with an ax," reducing the rate from 50 cents the thousand shingles to the free list. Yet we are told here this is a gentle reduction that will work no harm.

The present small tariff on shingles is one sufficient to keep the industry in the United States, because with shingles on the free list the American manufacturer can not compete with the cheap Hindu labor of Canada and must needs shut up shop. Shingles, too, let it be explained, are not the product of the Lumber Trust, but, instead, are made almost solely by concerns of limited capital.

What has been said of shingles will apply equally to lath and many other products ruthlessly put on the free list. Another product of our American farmers is wool, also placed on the free list under this bill.

SIMILAR ASSAULT MADE ON AGRICULTURE IN 1888.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives in 1888 evolved a tariff much like this one, not quite as drastic, but bad enough. In the report made to Congress by the Ways and Means Committee they had this to say about wool:

> The repeal of all duties on wool enables us to reduce the duties on manufactures of wool $12,332,211.65. The largest reduction we have made is in the woolen schedule, and this reduction was only made possible by placing wool on the free list.
> A duty on wool makes it necessary to impose a higher duty on the goods made from wool, and the consumer has to pay a double tax. If we leave wool untaxed, the consumer has to pay tax only on the manufactured goods.
> We say to the manufacturer we have put wool on the free list to enable him to obtain foreign wools cheaper, and send them into foreign markets and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturers. We say to the laborer in the factory we have put wool on the free list so that it may be imported and he may be employed to make the goods that are now made by foreign labor and imported into the United States.
> We say to the consumer we have put wool on the free list that he may have woolen goods cheaper. We say to the domestic woolgrower we have put wool on the free list to enable the manufacturer to import foreign wools to mix with his, and thus enlarge his—the domestic woolgrower's—market and quicken the demand for the consumption of home wool, while it lightens the burden of the taxpayer.

The Democratic minority in the Senate had this to say about wool in the same Congress:

> The minority are firmly convinced that besides the incalculable advantage to the whole country which would result from the placing of wool upon the free list, it is easily demonstrated that no class will suffer, but that each will reap his share of the benefit. We will import more wools, of course, and in no other way can our great factories prosper, because their capacity is beyond our own wool production. The manufacturers will export woolen goods as we now export cotton and leather, and the demand for the wool will better the wool market and encourage production, while the average woolgrower himself will reap from cheapened clothing more benefits than he ever did from a tax on his product which he must himself pay.

WILSON BILL DUPLICATE OF MILLS BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the Mills bill, fortunately for the country, I think, never became a law, but five years later the Wilson bill, with much the same provisions, did become a law, and the Ways and Means Committee that brought it out used the same arguments with reference to the manufacturer, the producer, and the consumer as did the committee reporting out the Mills bill. They told how free wool would stimulate the manufacturers of woolens to the great benefit of the owner and his factory help, so that he not only could control his home market but compete on an equality with the manufacturers abroad. They had this to say:

> This House in two Congresses in recent years having after full debate passed laws putting wool upon the free list, it is not deemed necessary in this report to attempt a restatement of the reasons for doing so. It is enough to say that the tariff upon wool while bringing no real benefit to the American woolgrower, least of all to the American farmer—most all woolgrowers in this country are farmers—who in any balancing of accounts must see that he yearly pays out a good dollar for every doubtful dime he may receive under its operation, has disastrously hampered our manufacturing industry and made cruel and relentless war upon the health, the comfort, and the productive energy of the American people.

With free wool we anticipate great benefits to consumers of woolen goods, a revival of the woolen industry such as that which followed the tariff of 1857, and a steadier and better market for the American woolgrower.

PRICES CHEAPENED, BUT NO MONEY TO BUY.

Mr. Chairman, the Wilson bill was passed, and for three years we existed under it. The manufacturer who was to have free wool, so that he could buy foreign wool and manufacture so cheaply that he could compete with his goods in the markets of the world, found that he could not operate with free wool and cheaper labor—both of which he received under the Democratic tariff bill—as his home market had been practically destroyed by the effects of this measure and the purchasing power of the Nation reduced to the lowest ebb. The factory employee found the promise to him of steadier work on account of free wool did not materialize. In many cases he found himself without work at all at any price. The consumer could possibly have purchased not only his woolen goods some cheaper, but almost everything else. The truth of the matter is he found them relatively much higher than before, as he was pretty generally without the necessary medium of exchange at any price, and the poor wool producer, who had been promised an increased demand for his product and cheaper goods to counteract any lower price, found himself pretty generally without the price to purchase the cheaper goods promised him; the demand for his wool greatly diminished, as well as the price for both the wool and the sheep, each having decreased some 50 per cent, the flocks oftentimes more than 100 per cent. I tell you, gentlemen, those times made sheepmen throughout the United States "red-headed" mighty fast. With the recollection of those conditions, it really seems incredible to think that the same destructive measures are again about to be enacted into law; and as in all former Democratic measures, the agricultural classes, on whose prosperity very largely depends the general welfare of our country, have received least consideration. The farmer is not only the greatest producer of wealth, but is also the greatest consumer. The census of 1910 gives the rural population of the United States, including towns of less than 2,500, as 49,348,883, out of a total population of continental United States of 91,972,266, or practically 54 per cent of the total, who receive their principal sustenance directly or indirectly from agriculture. In addition to that, probably 25 per cent of the balance receive their living indirectly from agriculture. Take agricultural machinery manufacturing alone, which has salaried employees and wage earners numbering 75,000 people, who on a basis of four to the family would represent practically a quarter of a million people, getting their livelihood from that industry, and 90 per cent of their products are annually consumed by the American farmer. Great quantities of almost every commodity are consumed by those who comprise 54 per cent of the total, and on the prosperity of that 54 per cent is largely dependent the welfare of all. You can not reduce their purchasing power without hurting those engaged in every other line of human endeavor, and I reiterate that any Government that thinks it can become more prosperous by reducing the income of its agricultural classes is making an economic mistake from every viewpoint, and I can not see by what process of reasoning the products of one class of people are placed in competition with the products of the world for the benefit of another class.

WHY PROTECT MANUFACTURER AND NOT PRODUCER?

If wool can be produced abroad cheaper than in this country, is not the producer of that commodity as much entitled to protection as the manufacturer of the product is against the cheaper-made goods from abroad? Under the special plea of benefit to the consumer all agricultural products are practically placed on the free list or greatly reduced.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I notice that the Ways and Means Committee has seen fit to reduce the tariff on peanuts from one-half of a cent a pound, as it now stands, to three-eighths of 1 cent a pound, and on shelled peanuts from 1 cent a pound to three-fourths of a cent a pound, a reduction of 25 per cent in the present duties. I think this reduction is totally unwarranted and will work a hardship on a great many people who are engaged in a business that does not now pay any greater reward than they are entitled to. The total acreage in peanuts in 1909 was 869,887, which produced 19,415,816 bushels, valued at $18,271,929. North Carolina, Georgia, Virginia, Florida, Alabama, Texas, Louisiana, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, South Carolina, Oklahoma, Missouri, New Mexico, California, and Kansas, respectively, raise peanuts, North Carolina standing first, with 195,134 acres, and Kansas last, with 48 acres. Peanuts imported in 1910 amounted to 29,276,235 pounds, worth $1,234,088. The largest peanut-raising State in the South is North Carolina, with 195,134 acres, producing 5,980,919 bushels, worth $5,368,826. North Carolina paid out for fertilizers that year to enable them to raise all crops $12,262,533; $5,444,950 for labor. The expense for fertilizers alone was an average of $1.23 per acre for each acre of peanuts raised, or $240,014.82 for the crop.

"PEANUT POLITICIANS" MOVED BY SYMPATHY FOR PEANUT CONSUMERS.

Mr. Chairman, I presume this reduction in the tariff on peanuts was prayerfully and tearfully considered by the Ways and Means Committee. No doubt their hearts were wrung by the cry of the consumers of peanuts for a little larger glass or bag for 5 cents, and it will be the consumer and not the vender that will profit by this reduction, and if this lower tariff should result in some millions of pounds more coming from Spain, Italy, Mexico, and other foreign countries, and reduce the price a little lower to those who are paying taxes to support the governments of the various States in this country now engaged in raising this product, your committee will feel that it did not act in vain and no doubt you will expect the raisers of peanuts to hereafter speak with pride of their "peanut politicians." [Applause.] The peanut raisers, the potato growers, and all the vast army of agriculturists in this country should rise up and call you blessed, for what they get comes easy—they only work 16 hours a day for it.

Mr. Chairman, I notice on page 104, beginning at line 15, in the list the following: "Bagging for cotton," and so forth. I congratulate the cotton raisers of the South that they are to have free bagging for cotton, and the southern Members here are to be felicitated for being able to scoop their Democratic colleagues from the great wool States of Ohio, Montana, and Colorado. You get free covering for your cotton raisers, but make your woolgrowers pay 25 per cent ad valorem for the bag that carries his free wool. Likewise, the Pacific States wheat raiser; you put his wheat on the free list when you let flour come in free, but you make him pay 25 per cent ad valorem on his grain bag in which he exports his wheat to the Liverpool market, and you make the same material free to your cotton raiser, sending his product to the same or other markets. This is Democratic equality. I congratulate the cotton raisers and those Members who were able "to put this over."

MIRACLE OF MANNA FROM HEAVEN MAY BE REVIVED.

Mr. Chairman, on page 115, line 11, article 545, I observe manna comes in free under this bill. I think the people of the entire country are to be congratulated on manna being left on the free list, for after this law has been in effect for a year or two they will probably long for the manna with which the Lord God of Hosts fed the Israelites without cost and without price, and it will no doubt be a welcome adjunct to the bill of fare at free soup houses and other charitable institutions should conditions prevail after the passage of this act such as followed the enactment of the Wilson bill in 1894. May God forbid! [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3321, the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m., the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 25, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Also, petitions of Ignaz Strauss & Co., William Meyer & Co., H. Jacquin & Co., of New York, N. Y., against the assessment of any fee in relation to the filing of protests against the assessment of duties by the collector of customs; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Petition of Mr. W. B. Martin and 1,941 other citizens of the following cities and towns in the State of California: Alameda, Alvarado, Anaheim, Arroyo Grande, Artesia, Bay City, Berkeley, Betteravia, Blanco, Buena Park, Casmalia, Castroville, Chino, Compton, Concord, Daly City, Del Monte, Downey, El Monte, Foxen, Gardena, Garden Grove, Gilroy, Gonzales, Guadalupe, Harris Station, Hollister, Huntington Beach, Hueneme, Hynes, King City, Lompoc, Long Beach, Los Alamitos, Los Alamos, Los Angeles, Marysville, Meridian, Monterey, Moss, Nipomo, Norwalk, Oakland, Oceano, Orby, Orcutt, Owensworth, Oxnard, Pacific Grove, Pleasanton, Puente, Salinas, San Francisco, San Juan Bautista, San Luis Obispo, Santa Ana, Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz, Santa Maria, Sargent, Soledad, Spence, Spreckels, Van Nuys, Watsonville, Whittier, Wilmington, and Woodland, protesting against the proposed reduction in the duty on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROGERS: Petition of Rev. A. Morrill Osgood and sundry citizens of Maynard, Burlington, Carlisle, and Stow, Mass., also of William C. Buck and other citizens of Reading, Mass., favoring the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls or submitting to arbitration the question at issue with the British Government; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SCULLY: Petition of sundry mills of the United States employing dyers and finishers of cotton corduroys, velvets, etc., favoring the present rates of duty under the act of 1909, schedule I; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of J. Wiss & Sons Co., of Newark, N. J., against the reduction of duty on scissors and shears; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of sundry citizens of Shelby, N. C., against the reduction of the duty on monozite and thorium; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Walter Travers Daniel against the proposed income tax on yearly dividends in mutual life insurance companies; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petition of sundry citizens of the thirtieth district of New York, favoring an amendment to the income-tax section of the pending tariff bill, with reference to the tax proposed to be levied on life insurance companies; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 25, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, ever ready to hear the prayers of Thy children, we would draw near to Thee with open hearts that we may receive of Thy spirit sufficient unto the needs of the hour; that we may control our thoughts and direct our ways in consonance with our highest conceptions of right and truth and justice that we may render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's, and so fulfill the law and the prophets. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the Journal shows that yesterday the Speaker accepted the resignation of Mr. COLLIER from the committee to attend the exercises in regard to the Jefferson memorial and appointed another Member of the House to succeed him. I do not desire to be captious in the matter, but I would like to inquire what authority there is by this House for the appointment of anyone to attend those exercises?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair will state to the gentleman that that is not the only difficulty about that committee. When the resolution was passed during the last Congress the Speaker studied a good while to determine whether he really could appoint on that committee any Member of the Sixty-second Congress who was not going to be a Member of the Sixty-third, and so on; and the Chair really did not know whether he had any authority to do that or not, but it seemed to the Chair the only thing to do——

Mr. MANN. The Speaker will remember the resolution which was passed in the last Congress was a simple House resolution. I suppose the gentleman who drew it drew it in conformity with the idea of a Senate resolution, which was somewhat similar——

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Forgetting the distinction between the two bodies, the Senate being a continuous body and the House not being a continuous body. That resolution provided for the appointment by the Speaker of 12 Members of the House to attend those exercises and the Speaker exercised that power. When the Congress adjourned that power under the resolution ceased.

The SPEAKER. Well, did the committee cease?

Mr. MANN. Well, that is another question. The House since then has passed a bill appropriating money to pay the expenses of that committee. I do not know whether the Speaker had taken it into consideration or how many members were going to resign. I have noticed since the appropriation was cut down a very large number of distinguished gentlemen not connected with this House have declined to go. I did not know how many would decline to go——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the best of his recollection about this is that he was notified that Mr. COLLIER could not go and Mr. BORLAND wanted to go, or something of the sort, before this cut was made in the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not refer to Mr. COLLIER in that connection. I said gentlemen not connected with this House.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COLLIER did not want to go on account of this tariff bill, he being a member of the Ways and Means Committee. That is his reason. Of course, everybody knows a ticket from here to St. Louis costs $23, sleeper $5, three or four meals will run it up to three or four dollars more, tip to the porter, and so forth, altogether would increase the actual expenses of a trip from here to St. Louis to $30 and $30 back; hotel bill there, and so forth; but that had nothing to do with Mr. COLLIER declining to go, but the reason was because he wanted to be here, being a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MANN. I am very sure that Mr. COLLIER would not have declined to go, even if there had been no appropriation on that account. I wanted to call attention to it because I think the House ought to remember when it passes resolutions of this sort that one House has no authority beyond its term of office.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entirely agrees with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. We understood that when the original resolution was passed at the last session.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman was here and permitted this appropriation to pass the other day, and, so far as that point is concerned, other Members did not raise any sort of objection to it. Of course that does not preclude him from making this statement; and the Chair was in doubt, and is yet, whether or not that resolution that was passed in the last Congress was such a resolution as authorized the committee appointed to do anything beyond that Congress, but acting under the circumstances the Chair was not going to raise any such question himself.

Mr. MANN. I certainly do not desire to be understood as in any way criticizing the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. MANN. I did not raise the question on the floor the other day when the appropriation passed, it is true, although I stated privately that I did not understand how anybody could spend the money, because there was not any committee authorized to do anything.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

There was no objection.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention to participate in the general debate on this bill; the new Members on the Democratic side were sent here to act, not to talk.

The 14 distinguished Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee, who have spent months of time and labor in the preparation of this measure, are much better prepared to enlighten the House and the country upon its provisions than other Members can possibly be; and while I concur in the judgment of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the country has a right to expect and demand of the majority in this House prompt action on its part, I believe that the comparatively short period of time allotted to the large majority upon this side of the Chamber might wisely have been awarded to the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

But, Mr. Chairman, while in attendance at the session of the House yesterday I propounded certain questions to two distinguished Republican Members, who are among the oldest in point of service and certainly among the ablest in ability on that side of this Chamber; I refer to the two gentlemen from Michigan, Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. HAMILTON.

At the conclusion of his speech I asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] by what process of reasoning he was able to conclude—as he had alleged in his remarks—that the panic of 1893 was caused by the Wilson-Gorman tariff law, which was not enacted until August of 1894? To this he replied that the country had been convulsed with the panic of 1893 in anticipation of the enactment of that law, which was about one and one-half years subsequent to the commencement of the panic.

I then inquired of the gentleman from Michigan why it was that no panic had resulted from the induction into office of a Democratic administration this year and the introduction of the Underwood bill, which provided for a lower average of tariff rates than had the original Wilson bill introduced in December of 1893? To this the ingenious gentleman from Michigan replied that the workingmen of this country had saved so much money under the Republican administration that they refused to permit a panic this year, or words to that effect.

The other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] read into his speech some figures prepared by President Taft's Tariff Board, showing the comparative rates of wages paid in the cotton and woolen mills of England, Germany, Belgium, and other European countries, and these figures disclose that the rates of wage paid cotton and woolen mill employees in England are very substantially higher than in any of the countries on the Continent of Europe, all of which have the protective-tariff system.

At that point I asked the gentleman from Michigan to explain why wages were twice as high in free-trade England as they are in protective countries on the Continent, and why these low-wage countries which are much nearer England than they are America do not flood England with cheap goods and capture her home and foreign markets, and the gentleman from Michigan admitted that he did not know and could not explain this apparent repudiation of Republican campaign logic by cold facts collected by a Republican administration.

The remarks of both the distinguished gentlemen from Michigan, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD announces this morning, are withheld for revision and "will appear hereafter."

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that these are pertinent illustrations of the "pro-bunco-publico" argument of Republican campaign orators which have been dinned into the ears of the American people during the past 20 years.

A government can no more create prosperity among its people by increasing taxation than an individual can lift himself by his boot straps; the first violates the laws of political economy and of common sense as much as the latter does the law of gravitation, and it is high time that the American people, and especially their National Representatives, got back to bedrock principles in dealing with the tariff question.

In 1896 the Republicans ran away from a discussion of the money question because it was politically expedient to do so and easier to raise the vast sums of money used by them in that campaign by promising to increase tariff rates than by agreeing to maintain the gold standard, which required no change in the existing law. If the Republicans had been free to reduce some of the exorbitant rates of the Wilson-Gorman law and then let the tariff alone, the people of this country would have been saved most of the cruel extortions to which they were later subjected by the trusts and combinations which were the legitimate brood of the prohibitory rates imposed by the tariff law of 1897.

But the men who had contributed the millions of dollars to carry the election of 1896 demanded their "pound of flesh," and were represented in the United States Senate by the men to whom the money had been contributed and who wrote into the bill the rates demanded and the Dingley law was the measure of their demands.

The War with Spain and the steady increase in the production and supply of gold which injected into the arteries of trade and commerce a life-giving stimulus akin to fresh pure blood in the human body resulted in the quickening of trade and industry to such an extent that the great body of the people were insensible to the legitimate results bound to follow the prohibitory rates imposed by the Dingley Act.

Thoughtful people were quick to observe the effect which these extortionate rates of duties were bound to produce. Sheltered from competition from all foreign countries, it was as natural for the domestic manufacturers to form combinations as it is for the sparks to fly upward.

In his last public utterance made just before his assassination in 1901, President McKinley, who had approved the Dingley law, appealed for a modification of its rates in language as earnest and strong as political consistency would permit. Then Roosevelt succeeded to the Presidency and McKinley's appeal went unheeded.

Consummate politician that he was, Roosevelt saw the possibilities for raising campaign funds in the exorbitant tariff schedules and made good use of them in 1904, as the recent publication of the campaign expenses in that year prove.

Roosevelt spoke guardedly at times about revising the tariff through a tariff commission, but it was obvious that he was simply reminding the protected interests of their obligations to him for permitting the scandalous rates of the Dingley law to remain in force.

He hotly denied that prohibitive tariff rates encouraged the formation of trusts and combinations, as charged by the Republicans of Iowa in their platform, and otherwise behaved in a way that won him the enduring friendship of the men who own and control many of the largest trusts in this country.

William H. Taft, in announcing his candidacy for the Republican nomination in 1908, declared in favor of a reduction of tariff rates and admitted that the tariff raised prices; this was a new Republican departure and caused much political trouble and turmoil later on; just when the foreigner quit paying the tariff was not disclosed, but Taft admitted that he no longer did so.

Taft's subsequent nomination and election was followed by one of the saddest political tragedies in our history; Taft really wanted to reduce the tariff, but his party had been mortgaged to the tariff beneficiaries in exchange for campaign funds and was powerless to carry out its pledges to the people, and the Payne-Aldrich law, revising the tariff up instead of down, was the result.

What followed is recent history. This administration came into power under a solemn pledge to revise the tariff downward, "unmistakably downward," and I believe that this covenant with the American people will be faithfully kept.

The bill now before the House is unmistakable evidence of the earnest purpose of the Democratic leaders to keep faith with the American people, and it will pass this House in due time, make no mistake about that.

If influences elsewhere are successful in stuffing this bill with the odious features so characteristic of Republican legislation upon the tariff, the responsibility will not be ours unless we adopt it.

Political death, swift and certain, awaits any Democrat who now doubts or falters. We were sent here to prepare and pass a tariff law which will bear the test prescribed by the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore; if any Democrat in whom the people have reposed trust and confidence now betrays them, it were better for him that a millstone were tied around his neck and that he were then cast into the bottomless sea. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose, in the time which I shall occupy, to discuss the various theories upon which the different political parties in this country would write tariff laws. I do not propose to pay any attention to the tariff question as an academic proposition. It seems to me that the country during the past four years has had a surfeit of tariff discussion and that what the people are interested in now more than anything else is the purpose and the effect in a practical way of such tariff legislation as any political party proposes to the American people. I shall occupy my time, therefore, first, in submitting some general observations upon the effect and purposes of this proposed law, intended, at least, to be of an entirely practical nature. And then, if time permits, I shall hope to pay some attention to the details of one of the schedules of this tariff law which is of greatest interest to the great industrial State which I in part represent upon this floor.

Before proceeding, however, I want to accept this opportunity to put into the RECORD, on behalf of his Democratic colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means and on behalf of his party associates on this floor, a grateful acknowledgement of the large debt which our party and our country owe to the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] His name will go down in the history of the Republic along with those of other great legislators of past days, enduringly associated and linked with a great revenue measure. He will take his place when this law goes upon the statute books amongst the immortals of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His unfailing courtesy, not alone to members of this committee and members of his party in the House, but to Members generally and to those citizens of the country who have come here to see us because interested in this legislation; his uniform good judgment and sound common sense; his consummate tact and his infinite patience under any and all circumstances, have been the most powerful factors in making this great bill what it is. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His party can never pay to him the debt which it owes, unless—perhaps I should say until—it rewards him with the honor of the only office in the Republic which is larger in power and responsibility than that which he now occupies. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. QUIN. We are going to do that.

Mr. PALMER. I have seen suggestions—principally in a hostile or, at least, critical press—that the name of another, or the names of others, will necessarily be linked with his in giving a title to this great tariff bill. There has been cooperation on the part of others in high official place in the preparation of this bill, and I am glad that that is so; but there is no man in the Nation, in public station or in private life, who believes that any other has had sufficient to do with the preparation of this law to permit his name to be linked with that of OSCAR UNDERWOOD as its maker. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is another thing I want to remark before I begin what I intended to say. Some reference has been made upon the floor and elsewhere, principally by these neophytes in legislation who come here as so-called "Progressives," by way of severe criticism of the methods which have been employed in the preparation of this bill and its submission to the Congress. I think I can say with entire truth that no tariff bill which has ever been presented to the House of Representatives has received more careful study, thought, attention, and consideration at the hands of its makers than has this bill. We have been studying this question, yes, we have been writing this bill, constantly for more than two years in the Committee on Ways and Means. We began with the opening of the Sixty-second Congress, even before, and by bringing into the House various laws amending various schedules in the bill we were compelled, even had we not been willing, to give the deepest and closest attention to the question as far as those particular schedules were concerned. Upon the elections in the country going in favor of the Democratic Party, when it became apparent that it would be our duty to write a general revision of the tariff laws, the Committee on Ways and Means began its open sessions.

It listened to manufacturers and others interested, coming from all parts of the country, for nearly 30 days, sitting from 10 o'clock in the morning, almost daily, far into the night. Since that time its members have granted informal hearings to perhaps thousands more who have been interested on both sides of this great question.

There has not been a day since the opening of the Sixty-second Congress, more than two years ago, when the experts employed by the Ways and Means Committee have not been at work compiling statistics and gathering facts and lending assistance to the members of the committee in the preparation of the various schedules in the law; and when these hearings, formal and informal, had been completed the Committee on Ways and Means, or the majority members of it, in accordance with the custom that has obtained in this House during all its history, went into executive session apart from their brethren of opposite faith and spent nearly two months and a half in daily sessions writing the details of this proposed law.

When that work was completed, in striking contrast with the precedents in this House, the bill was published to the country and given to our opponents at least three weeks before they were asked to consider it or vote upon it in committee or in the House. Four years ago the first knowledge which the minority, then the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, had of the terms of the Payne bill was when it was laid in front of them in the Committee on Ways and Means and they were asked to vote upon the proposition of reporting it to the House. This year the bill was in the hands of the Republicans in this House and in the hands of the people of the country for three weeks, and during most of that time the Democratic membership of this House considered the bill in caucus, where every Member was given the fullest, the freest, and fairest right, not only to discuss every single item in it but to amend it in every particular in which he desired to submit his proposition to the caucus.

There never has been a time, I repeat, when there was such careful, thorough, and painstaking consideration of the terms of a bill, or such an earnest and honest effort to give every man a fair and free chance to express his views and impress them upon the legislation of his country, to participate in which he was sent here by his people.

There can be no question as to the attitude of the American people with respect to the present tariff law. The demand for a substantial reduction in the rates of duty has been long continued, insistent, and widespread. It began before the enactment of the present law, became louder on account of the failure of that law to satisfy in any part the claims of its sponsors, and is to-day so general that it is accepted by all parties as, in itself, ample justification for an immediate and thorough revision of the tariff rates. No issue in the history of the Republic was ever more squarely presented to the people, more thoroughly discussed by the people, nor more definitely settled than this.

The Democratic Party, therefore, approaches the work now in hand with no misgiving as to the popular call for action and with no doubt that its action, as indicated by this bill, responds to the will of the people plainly expressed. We entered into solemn covenant to do this thing, and we present this bill as the redemption of our obligation. If enacted into law in substantially its present form it will meet with the approval of the Nation and remain upon the statute books for years to come as the happy solution of a long-vexed question if, and only if, two conditions obtain after its enactment. It must have the united support of the political party which is responsible for it, and it must permit American industry to proceed toward the capture of a larger share of the world's markets without causing an embarrassment, resulting from the changed conditions, sufficient to bring distress to any large body of our people. We who so firmly believe that every tax law should be written without fear or favor, we who have long and hitherto fruitlessly contended that the protective system is built upon a structure of special privilege for the few at the expense of the masses of the people must be quite as deeply interested in the permanency of our work as in the mere doing of it. If it shall so turn out that the Underwood law shall be so weakly nourished in the confidence of the people that it fails to survive the great test of the next popular election, our wasted effort will be a small burden for us to carry compared with the increased iniquities that will be heaped upon an unsuspecting people by the sudden return to the oppressive system of taxation from which we hope to relieve them by this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Theory may write a tariff bill but it will not keep it on the books. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am glad we all agree about that. Economic truths may govern in the framing of a revenue law, but political and business conditions are more important in sustaining it when framed. [Applause.] We shall shut our eyes to the strong possibility of a repudiation of the time-honored theory upon which the Democratic Party would write its revenue measures if we do not consider with great care the political and business conditions of the times and so write the details of the law based upon that principle, and so present the finished work to the country as will most strongly appeal to the sound political sense and the good business judgment of a people peculiarly wise in political thought and exceptionally keen in business acumen.

No tariff bill has ever remained long upon the statute books which failed to enlist the united support of the party which was responsible for it. The Wilson law received its death knell when a Democratic President denounced it in unmeasured terms. The Payne law never had a chance to live after a large section of the Republican Party had left upon it the scars which resulted from efforts to strangle it at its birth. A great people will never accept the handiwork of men who quarrel over their creation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have, I hope, learned of history. The opposition of the Republican remnant upon this floor and elsewhere, like that of the Progressive embryo [laughter], will be readily discounted. The people expect it. Opposition of any considerable element within our own party, unless it be that of special interests, whose antagonism may be considered a credit to the bill, will doom the law to an early repeal.

Realizing these things, and having no hope or thought that the tariff can ever be settled upon its economic truths without resorting to its political phases, I am one of those who view with equanimity the so-called invasion of the rights of the legislative branch of the Government which is involved in the close cooperation in the preparation of this bill which has obtained between the Executive and both branches of the Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That cooperation gives promise of the prompt completion of a well-settled program and foreshadows the hearty support of this bill by the great leaders of our party in public station and in private life. I indulge the hope that this unity of party support, when we shall have finally presented the bill to the country as a finished piece of legislation, will not be marred even in slight degree by the opposition of those Representatives whose particular localities have necessarily suffered more than their duty to the people they immediately represent permits them to promptly forget. Heretofore the greatest obstacle which the Democratic Party has met in its desire to be intrusted with the people's commission to rewrite the revenue laws has been the fear—sometimes well grounded in the outspoken zeal of men who in the catalogue go for Democrats—that special interests of special localities might sway a considerable number of our party's representatives from the true Democratic purpose. This fear has been largely dispelled by the action of our party upon this bill. It ought not now to be realized in any degree by the failure of Members on this side of the Chamber, however few in number, to forget their selfish local or political interests in the common purpose to execute the plain mandate of the people to reduce the burden of tariff taxation for the benefit of all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No man can get all he wants in legislation. This bill is not as I would have written it if I had alone been intrusted with its preparation. It is not as any one man would have written it. No tariff law ever was. But as a whole it is the best tariff law ever written, and it is the only one in the time of any Member of this body which has approached the true principle which should govern the levy of indirect taxes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every man who calls himself a Democrat and knows why believes that. Therefore, in the interest of the permanent establishment of that true principle as the fiscal policy of the Nation, we should and must sink our individual views about particular items in support of the general proposition, forget the interests of particular localities in the accomplishment of the general good, and send this bill to the country with the solid, enthusiastic, and united support of the only political party from which, by reason of the present unusual political conditions, the country has a right to expect sufficient strength for some years to come to write its purpose into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No man will gainsay that the Democratic Party is pledged, both by its platform declarations and by the repeated assurances of its candidate for President, not alone to fix the tariff rates with the sole design of producing revenue for the Government, but to fix them in such a way as will not injure or destroy any legitimate industry. No change in any tariff law of any moment could be made without affecting industry. It would be a change not worth while if it did not. No change which is considerable enough to yield a benefit anywhere can be made without corresponding temporary impairment of the profits of industry pending readjustment to suit the new conditions. Every business man knows this. But such temporary impairment is a very different thing from that injury or destruction of legitimate industry which the people have a right to believe we will not permit.

I am not a protectionist in any sense, but I would hate myself if I thought I had been a factor in writing a law which would destroy any industry which could show under present-day economic conditions a right to exist without undue taxation of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] However much we may disapprove of it, we can not fail to realize that in many lines of industry a partnership has existed, under Republican-made law, between business and the Government—a partnership which, so far as business is concerned, was entered into in perfect good faith. That partnership has continued through a long period of time, though at great cost to the people who had been deceived into permitting its inception, and it would be nothing short of a breach of faith for the people's representatives now to break that partnership by withdrawing suddenly and at one time all the capital which the Government contributed to the enterprise. Business has had fair notice that the terms of the partnership are to be modified, that the amount which the people will contribute to make the enterprise profitable for the working partner is to become rapidly less and less, and the share which business itself must contribute in the way of efficiency and economy in production must be steadily more and more. Business now may take notice that as to such enterprises as can not meet the new conditions, by reason of the neglect, refusal, or inability to employ that efficiency and economy which will permit industry to stand upon its own feet with less support from the Government, the people refuse to be longer taxed to accomplish the survival of the unfit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I violate no committee secret when I say that the framers of this bill have kept present-day business conditions constantly in mind in its preparation. And I state it as my deliberate judgment that when this bill shall become a law and its effects have had an opportunity to spread through all the branches of American industry it will not cause any decrease in the aggregate production of industry in the country, and consequently will not impair the earnings of the labor of hands, which is at the bottom of all production. It may stop a wheel or drive the smoke from a chimney here and there. It will undoubtedly cause to some extent a readjustment of the uses of capital and a decrease of investment in industries where we do not excel, but that readjustment of capital will result in increased production by reason of larger investment in those lines of business endeavor where we do excel. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the aggregate production remains the same, the demand for labor will continue the same; and if the demand for labor continues the same, the price of labor will not go down. Men get the best results from that line of endeavor which suits them best. Capital makes its best return out of that which it can produce the cheapest. When men who have capital to invest realize this, then the men who have labor to sell will give to their employers a larger return for their wage in their labor's production and will command a larger share in the product.

The increase of importations under the proposed law, by reason of the reduction in the rates, will constitute but a small percentage of the total production of the articles covered by the schedules of this law, and such increased importations, while resulting in increased competition and consequent reduction of prices to the people, will not result in a decrease of the aggregate production nor in a loss of reasonable profit to the producer. And this by reason of the operation of a well-known law of trade. Every dollar of imports must be paid for, and it is a truism with reference to the world's trade that this payment takes place not in money but, in the last analysis, in the product of the country for the export trade. Increased imports mean increased exports, and this enlargement of trade is bound to result in our people buying that which can be made cheaper abroad than here, while we sell abroad that which can be made cheaper here than there.

And it is only in exceptional cases that a reinvestment of capital or a readjustment of labor will have to be made, and in most of these it will be a gradual change. In the vast majority of the highly protected industries where our rates have been written at a figure slightly below the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad they will result in only a moderate increase of importations. These imports will be kept down to the point of safety to American industry by reduction in the price of the manufactured articles for the benefit of the home consumer—a reduction which will come from the profits, in too many cases grossly exorbitant, of the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have no fear that the American wage earner will suffer unless the American manufacturer shall feel that widespread distress on the part of labor is not too high a price to pay to compel a return to the old protective system [applause on the Democratic side] and deliberately close his mills and throw his labor out of employment in order to frighten the people of the country into a repudiation of this new policy. I have more respect for the patriotism of the American manufacturer than to believe that he will do this in any general way, and too much confidence in his courage and ability to expect him to feel the necessity of resort to such methods.

Under every law of business labor will be not the first, but the last, to feel the effect of the decreased price of the product to meet increased competition. And it is almost inconceivable that American business men will attempt to reverse the general rules of division of earnings for political effect. A reduction in the selling price of the product of any plant which makes the profit and loss account of the producer at the end of the year show a less favorable figure is charged up to the returns received by those who contribute to the product in the inverse order of the lien of their contribution. The original capital is always reached last in the distribution of profits.

Interest on that portion of the invested capital which is carried as funded debt is necessarily taken care of first. The absolutely first mortgage upon the business is the capitalized cost of labor, and the first charge to be met is the wages of that labor. Out of gross income, arrived at by deducting the costs of materials from the results of sales, must first be distributed wages; next, interest and depreciation of plant; and third, returns to the contributors to the capital fund. These last returns in manufacturing enterprises in this country have on the whole been so generous as to challenge the wonder of the world, and I am firm in the belief that the result of increased competition, flowing from a reduction of the tariff barrier, when charged against these returns of capital, will in but few cases reduce them below such a figure as money in other branches of business activity is wont to earn. And as long as capital receives a sufficient return to justify its employment production will go on, and all charges, prior in lien, to the returns on capital will be met.

Most American manufacturers, while publicly protesting that drastic cuts in the tariff rates will ruin their business, in private admit that under rates largely reduced they can survive without decreased production, though with less profits, if market conditions in all producing countries should remain normal. The great industrial bugbear seems to be the fear of overproduction in foreign countries, followed by flooding this market at prices which neither producer, home or foreign, could afford to make general. Many large operators in the textile trades and nearly all in the iron and steel industry—that unerring barometer of American business conditions—admit no fear of the foreigner's normal output, but profess to see destruction in the marketing of his surplus stock. It is a perfectly justifiable fear and one well calculated to give pause to radical tariff reductions. It brings us face to face with the most perplexing problem which we must meet in our effort to lower tariff taxation without injury or destruction to legitimate American industry. It is a problem which no body of tariff makers in the history of the country ever had to grapple with before—the problem growing out of the difference in the attitude of our country and that assumed by other producing nations toward trusts and combinations and its necessary corollary, the world-wide trust. In this country the tendency of public opinion, voiced in legislative enactment and executive action, is against these great combinations. Not only is their formation discouraged and anything which smacks of suppression of competition frowned upon, but such as have been formed in violation of law are being disintegrated and old competitive conditions, wherever possible, restored. In foreign producing countries the tendency is in the opposite direction. Not only are combinations of capital with resultant economies in production and suppression of competition permitted, but they are actually encouraged, fostered, and participated in by the Governments themselves. What a cautious, law-abiding business man would do here at the risk of his fortune or his personal liberty brings a medal of honor from his Government to the great manufacturer abroad. In Germany there is at least one case of the Government itself, in effect, operating a great manufacturing establishment under a deed of trust of a former owner for the benefit of the employees, the factor of owners' profits being largely eliminated when the product enters the markets. More, subsidies and freight tariff rebates are the common practice to encourage foreign trade, and established Government agencies in nearly every market sell the manufacturer's product with little cost to him until his trade is finally rooted. These systems make the dumping of foreign surplus product in the American market a part of the regular business of the producer in those countries, and consequently compel the American manufacturer to meet competition under abnormal conditions under tariff rates levied with due regard for conditions that are normal.

To meet this situation we have done two things. In the case of world-wide trust, having their own plants everywhere and now permitting no imports into this country, we have placed their products on the free list. The American producer being a part of the world trust and helping to exploit this market by suppression of competition, it is believed that absolute free trade may encourage venturesome capital in foreign countries to oppose the un-American system now largely in vogue abroad, and thus enter our markets to the advantage of our home consumer.

Where the American branch of such world-wide trusts—as in the case of the Aluminum Co. of America—is unable, though having a perfect monopoly, to supply the home market and imports from its associates abroad yield large revenues to the Government, we have retained some duty upon the product for revenue purposes, but placed their trust-controlled raw material upon the free list, to encourage imports of the raw material for consumption here by such capital as will see the opportunity to get a part of this market by building plants to compete with the American branch of the trust. By such means no Democratic principle is violated. Trust-controlled products go upon the free list, except where no object would be gained except loss of revenue, opportunity is given for freer competition both at home and with foreign producers, and the evils to the consumer which flow from combination in restraint of trade, both domestic and international, are minimized so far as may be by a tariff law.

To meet the just complaint of the American manufacturer that he can not know what competition he must meet as long as the foreigner can sell here below his home market price and sometimes even below his cost of production, we have inserted in this bill what is known as the dumping clause, which provides:

That whenever articles are exported to the United States of a class or kind made or produced in the United States, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in the United States or the price at which such goods are consigned is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to the United States at the time of its exportation to the United States there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected, and paid on such article on its importation into the United States a special duty (or dumping duty) equal to the difference between the said export or actual selling price of the article for export or the price at which such goods are consigned, and the said fair market value thereof for home consumption, provided that the said special duty shall not exceed 15 per cent ad valorem in any case and that goods whereon the duties otherwise established are equal to 50 per cent ad valorem shall be exempt from such special duty.

Mr. WALLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. WALLIN. How will you prevent the manufacturer on the other side giving a special discount on goods shipped over here?

Mr. PALMER. That would be a violation of this dumping clause, because it would be importing their goods into this country at a less price than the fair home market price.

Mr. WALLIN. Their invoices would show the fair market price, but they could easily have an understanding, and have a subsequent discount to go back, that would get the goods in here at the underprice just the same.

Mr. PALMER. That is simply assuming that this law is not going to be enforced. Every American manufacturer who complains of the dumping of foreign manufactures will tell you that he complains because he knows that his foreign competitor does this thing. If the American manufacturer knows it, his knowledge will be at the command of the administrative officers of the Government for his own interest, and there will be no difficulty in establishing the fact that the foreign manufacturer is dumping his product into this market at a price below his own cost of production.

Mr. WALLIN. That will be very hard to prove.

Mr. PALMER. We have provided carefully for the execution of this feature of the law by giving the officers of the Government the power to inspect the books of the foreign manufacturer, and if he is unwilling to yield to that request, then his goods can not come into this market.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the gentleman to say, in reply to the question of the gentleman at my right [Mr. WALLIN], that the American manufacturer would know whether goods were being dumped here in competition with his products, and that he would protest. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is making a straight protective argument. He is trying to protect the American manufacturer against unfair competition, according to his own statement. Is not that true? And that is unconstitutional, according to your party platform. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. I anticipated that some thoughtless person on the other side [laughter on the Democratic side] would ask some such question, and I will answer it by proceeding with the statement that under a high protective tariff such a clause would be further protection. Under a real competitive tariff it is simple justice. The Republican protective tariff works its purpose with truest fidelity to the real spirit of the principle when its rates are prohibitive. Prohibition of imports is the real thing in protection. It is what the manufacturer craves and what he has long secured in most cases, thanks to the willingness of the Republican Party to further enrich him at the expense of the people.

The chief relief which the consumer has been able to get in the past from the exactions of these high rates, normally prohibitive, has come from the willingness of foreign producers to dump their surplus here when conditions of trade abroad are abnormal at such low prices as permitted some competition here even after paying excessive customs duties. With the rates laid, however, as in this bill, on a competitive basis, permitting real and substantial foreign competition even under usual trade conditions, the American manufacturer has a right to expect that we shall keep steady the relative conditions which prevail when the law is written and under which they can continue to produce, though to somewhat less extent in some lines and with less profit in nearly all. That is the design of the dumping clause, and it will close the mouth of the American manufacturer against criticism of the law, while otherwise he would find a sympathetic audience in a people determined upon fair play.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. If the foreign manufacturer or producer, agricultural or otherwise, sends his surplus product over here at a very low price, will that be in the interest of the consumer here?

Mr. PALMER. Undoubtedly it would be largely——

Mr. COOPER. Is not the whole talk of the Democratic Party that the American consumer is their special consideration?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, but we want to be fair——

Mr. COOPER. Are you protecting the American manufacturer?

Mr. PALMER. We want to be fair to the American consumer and fair to the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] With a prohibitive rate the consumer has no chance except when the foreigner dumps his surplus here. With a competitive rate we give the consumer his chance and his consideration; and in order to be fair to the American manufacturer, after having given the consumer his chance, we say we will hold conditions where they are when we give the consumer this chance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or anyone on behalf of the committee, made an approximate estimate as to what would probably be the increased imports under the new measure if enacted into law?

Mr. PALMER. I have not seen any estimate of that kind.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any idea what the increased importations may reasonably be expected to be under these rates?

Mr. PALMER. I have seen no estimate. It is a difficult thing to estimate.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman think it is an essential question in a tariff measure which may revolutionize or materially change the economic conditions of the country?

Mr. PALMER. They could not be large because they are limited to 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I notice the language used by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is that they expect material increases in importations, but no figures are given.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. Not to ask me about figures, because I am not discussing estimates, for I do not have them now at hand.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania are talking at cross purposes. I think the gentleman from South Dakota did not ask for figures or estimates under the dumping clause, but estimates under the bill generally.

Mr. PALMER. I understood the gentleman from South Dakota to be talking about the dumping clause.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must have made some estimates under the bill generally, because there is an estimate of customs receipts.

Mr. PALMER. My recollection is that they amount to two hundred and eighty-six millions. The report will show that

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The report does not show the estimates as to what will come in under the increase of the free list. It gives an opinion as to what the importations will be made under tariff duties, but no estimate as to what may be expected as an increase in importations all along the line under the bill.

Mr. PALMER. I think if the gentleman will take the trouble to read the report, and I prefer that he should do that rather than to rely upon the memory of any man, he will find that the report goes fully into a comparative estimate of the importations and of duties under this law and the present law.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit an interruption?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Will not the greater benefit resulting from the enactment of competitive rates be in the regulating of the sale of home products and thus preventing monopoly in regard to manipulation of prices of home production?

Mr. PALMER. Undoubtedly. I have tried to show that. It is our contention, and I think it is absolutely demonstrable, that the increased imports which will come through the custom-house by reason of decreased duties will result in sufficient competition with the American manufacturer to compel him to reduce the price of his product for the benefit and relief of the American consumer without decreasing his production sufficiently to interfere with the demand for labor. In other words, the reduction in price of the product of the American manufacturer, by reason of the competition resulting from decreased duties, will be charged in nearly every case against the profits which capital in manufacturing lines of industry now earns in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I have foresworn the pleasure of discussing the tariff problem as an academic or even economic question, and have evaded the duty of discussing this bill in some detail because I have felt that the effect of this law upon business is the thing in which the people of my own great industrial State are most interested. I am firmly convinced that, given the united support of our own party which will prolong its life until it can have a fair test, it will prove a boon to industry and a great benefit to all the people. It will reduce the price of many commodities which enter into daily consumption; it will push capital into lines where Americans readily excel and thus increase production here, and by removing the false work about the structure of American industry make it a stable and a self-sustaining structure ready to carry a greater share of the world's demands upon the product of capital and labor. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two about the metal schedule of this law. First, because our great State of Pennsylvania is perhaps more largely interested in that schedule than any other. For, as I have said on this floor before, in American industry to-day steel is king and Pennsylvania is the royal palace. Also because I had perhaps more to do with the framing of some of the details of that schedule than I had with any other schedule in the law.

A year ago, or a little more, we passed a revision of the steel and iron schedule through this House and through the Senate and up to the President where it was vetoed. It received little criticism worth while either in the House or in the Senate. It has received at the hands of the steel and iron manufacturers, of course, some criticism, but the most startling criticism which was made against the bill, and the one to which I desire to advert for a few minutes, was made by the then President of the United States when he attached his veto to the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has occupied one hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yielded the gentleman further time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What was it that just took place between the Chair and the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he had occupied one hour, and the gentleman from Alabama stated that he had yielded further time.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that these things be said so that the House can hear them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania took the floor I yielded to him without limitation of time, and I called the attention of the Chair to the fact.

Mr. MANN. I was not criticizing the gentleman from Alabama or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the House desires to know how much time is yielded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania any specific amount of time.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman from Alabama yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania no one could hear what took place.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I trust this is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has unlimited time.

Mr. PALMER. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois knows that I do not often abuse the time of the House.

Mr. MANN. I assure the gentleman it is a delight to hear him at any time.

Mr. PALMER. And I shall not take up much more time. The President, as I was saying, declared in his veto message that consideration had evidently been given to the tariff rates upon the heavier forms of iron and steel, but little or no consideration had been given to the rates upon the finer forms of products of iron and steel covered by the schedule; and because, therefore, he was unwilling to agree that the rates upon the finer forms of steel and iron products should be cut so drastically as we had cut them, and for other reasons, perhaps, he would refuse to sign the bill.

Mr. Chairman, on the same day that the President of the United States was making that declaration to the American Congress one of the greatest manufacturers of these finer forms of iron and steel was making an exactly contrary declaration to the American people and to the world. Upon the same day that the President refused to sign a law which would have given relief to American consumers of the articles covered by this schedule, because the manufacturers of the finer forms of steel and iron could not stand the cut, the great firm of Henry Disston & Son was advertising in a copy of the Saturday Evening Post issued on that day, August 14, 1912, this significant and, to my mind, illuminating argument to sell their wares. They call it "a little incident with a world-wide meaning," and at the top of their advertisement they place the facsimile of a letter dated "Amboy, Minn., February 24, 1911," and which reads as follows:

DEAR SIRS: Please send me some of your saw-filing hints and a catalogue showing some of your products.

Gentlemen will remember that the Disston people are manufacturers of saws and tools, files, hammers, hatchets, trowels, and, in fact, about all of the small finer articles by way of tools in the iron and steel trade. Their correspondent goes on to say by way of postscript:

I sent to Germany for one of the best saws they could get, and when it came it had "H. Disston Sons" on it. Then I laughed.
S. O. WIEHL, Amboy, Minn.

Mr. Chairman, I should think he would laugh, and the President ought to have laughed, when he was upon the same day sending his message to Congress, over the fact that an American farmer out in Minnesota anxious to get the best and the cheapest tool that he could buy finds that he can get it after American labor at American wages has produced it in the city of Philadelphia, and after its producer has paid the freight tariff across the Atlantic Ocean and the custom tariff into Germany and the freight tariff back to Liverpool and the ocean freight to New York and the freight rates all the way up to Minnesota. I should think he would laugh; but they go on to say:

The first impression of this letter is one of amusement. Then its true and tremendous significance seizes upon the mind.

We could as well have quoted a similar letter that went to England and brought back a Disston saw. There are other countries where saws are manufactured, but in them all the same recognition of the Disston standard prevails.

Disston supremacy is not only world wide but world complete. It rests upon 72 years of progressive experience.

The demand for Disston saws has penetrated by sheer merit not only through every center of civilization but to every remote saw-using settlement and camp on the earth's face.

The Disston standard is everywhere held highest. In England and all her colonies—in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India; and in Germany, Russia, France, Austria-Hungary, and every European country, including Turkey and Greece; and in Egypt and north, south, east, and west Africa; and in China, Japan, Siam, Korea, Siberia—all Asia; and in the Philippines, Straits Settlements, Samoa, Sumatra, Java, Ceylon, Borneo, Hawaii, and South Sea Islands; and in Brazil, Patagonia, the Argentine, Chile, Peru, all South and Central America, and Mexico—in these and innumerable smaller saw markets the term "best" and the term "Disston" mean the same.

So much for saws and files and tools and hammers and hatchets and the finer products of the steel and iron schedules in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand the Disston statement, it referred to saws, but whether the President had saws in his mind is another question. He may have had cutlery or razors. In regard to razors the bill then reduced the duty to 35 per cent, while this bill raises it to 50 per cent. Unless the President was right, why did you raise that duty? Was it because of the hearings before the Senate committee that demonstrated the fact that under a 35 per cent duty the razor industry in this country, as well as other cutlery industries, must go? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, the Disston people are referring, according to their advertisement, largely to saws, but they mention and picture all of their other products alongside of the advertisement.

Mr. PAYNE. They make machine-made goods.

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And these people, who have to employ the hand labor to make the little things that are so numerous and are so widespread and involve such a large amount of capital, were the people the President evidently referred to, and the gentleman and his party has proved that the President was right in regard to this thing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. Evidently there is a wide disagreement about what the President was referring to, even amongst his Republican friends, because last year, when this advertisement appeared. I called it to the attention of another distinguished Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means, not now a Member of the House, and he said that that might be true, just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says about saws, but, said he: "There are other things in this steel and iron schedule in which you Democrats have ruined the American industry," and I asked him to name one and he picked out a different one. He said, "Watches, for instance." He said: "You have cut the entrails out of the watch business in this country." Why, that was so curious that it was funny, because in this very same magazine, on the same day, on the opposite side of the very same sheet was an advertisement of the American Howard watch in which they say, these American manufacturers of watches, "Six hundred thousand Americans go abroad every year. Once an American tourist preferred a foreign watch; now he goes to Europe with a Howard watch bought over here, or he comes back with a Howard watch bought over there." [Applause on the Democratic side.] I told a friend of mine who is a manufacturer over here in Baltimore about these advertisements. He is in the shoe business. Of course, he is a protectionist.

I think if I had been a shoe manufacturer in recent years I might have been a protectionist myself. He said, just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said, that this may be true about saws and tools, files, hammers, hatchets, and may be true about watches, but it is not true about shoes. Every fellow in his own line of business believes he is up against the worst competition.

Mr. SWITZER rose.

Mr. PALMER. In just a moment. Well, I went out and bought another copy of the Saturday Evening Post. The first thing I saw was an advertisement of a great American shoe, the "Walk-Over." They call it themselves "the shoe for you," and they say, "More than 17,000 pairs bought every day. From Alaska to California, from London to the Fiji Islands, in 84 countries, Walk-Overs set the style for shoes." [Applause on the Democratic side.] I expect, if the gentleman will permit me, when I go out on the street and buy a copy of the Saturday Evening Post, I can prove to him, out of the mouths of the manufacturers of cutlery, that American cutlery are going abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Why did you raise the duty in this bill from 35 per cent in your former bill to 50 per cent now? Now, this man of straw does not answer the question.

Mr. PALMER. Well, we made a change in the classification of pocket cutlery and razors, making two classifications instead of one, because we considered that one rate on all the pocket cutlery and all the razors would be prohibitive as to some while competitive as to others, and therefore, in order to induce competition for both branches, and especially to the more expensive grade of cutlery and razors, we made the two classifications instead of one as in the previous bill.

Mr. PAYNE. They are exactly in line with the President's suggestion, of course. If the gentleman will go far enough back—it will not be a great while ago—in the Saturday Evening Post, he will see gravely asserted there that the woolen schedule in the present law is 50 per cent higher than the woolen schedule in the law that preceded it. He can find almost anything in the Saturday Evening Post. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PALMER. I am not speaking of correspondents' articles in the Saturday Evening Post, but about the admissions of American manufacturers placed in the paid advertising columns of the magazine to induce trade, and their admission must be taken as the truth, as far as the foreign trade is concerned.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman about the dumping clause, to go back to that? Of course, the gentleman knows that Germany and some other foreign countries pay an export bounty on goods in order to get them into this country, and in that way they are able to get them in. The Government even pays it, and in that way they are able to get into this country with their goods and get around the duty, and especially is that so on sugar and other items—and for the next three years there is a duty on sugar in this bill. This dumping clause does not seem to meet that proposition in any way. It is not the sale here by the manufacturer of an article cheaper than the price there. He gets the same price, but somebody else pays the bounty, and in that way he can get his goods in, notwithstanding the duty here.

Mr. PALMER. I think the gentleman from New York will find as to all of these items—he is speaking of the item particularly of sugar, I assume—that as to most of these articles in the export trade there is no bounty upon those which enter into competition with American producers, although there is a very considerable concession in freight rates and the establishment of commercial agencies by Governments abroad——

Mr. PAYNE. Established by the Government and paid for by the Government.

Mr. PALMER. In my judgment, that will not complicate the administration of this clause in the tariff law.

Mr. PAYNE. On the other hand, does not the gentleman think it will entirely nullify the effect of it if they ever get to that question and get beyond the question of undervaluation and the impossibility to prove it?

Mr. PALMER. I think it is just as easy to determine the market value of the article for the uses of the administration of this dumping clause as it is to determine the market value as the gentleman from New York wrote it into his bill, for administrative purposes. If one is impossible, the other is impossible.

Mr. PAYNE. And notwithstanding all that, we have this almost universal effort by fraudulent undervaluation to evade every ad valorem duty in the existing law; and the gentleman's bill only aggravates that by multiplying the ad valorem duties in this bill.

Mr. PALMER. I am afraid that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has not yet done us the honor to read the administrative features of this law or he would not make such a statement.

Mr. SWITZER. I have a constituent who manufactures galvanized steel sheets. He desires to know why you have changed the specific duty of $2.50 a ton on manganese to 15 per cent ad valorem, which he says now at present price will make it $8 or $9 a ton? I am asking for information. I am not acquainted with the steel or iron business personally. He says it is an increase of 300 per cent, and the tendency is to protect the United States Steel Corporation against independent producers like this steel plant in my district.

Mr. PALMER. I will answer the gentleman's question, but I do not want him to make a speech in my time. He asks for the reason for the change of this rate on ferromanganese. I had intended to leave that to the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule, but I have no objection to saying now that our purpose in making the rate on ferromanganese was entirely as a revenue-producing proposition. The new rate does not protect the United States Steel Corporation. The fact is that ferromanganese in this country is not made for sale by anybody. The United States Steel Corporation makes ferromanganese for its own use exclusively, and does not sell a dollar's worth that I have ever heard of. All other consumers of ferromanganese in the country import it. And we have believed, in view of the fact that it is such a small part of the final cost of the product of the steel manufactures of the land, that it was the proper place for the levying of a purely revenue duty. And we have come to the same conclusion in respect to that which the Payne committee came to and stood by until the pressure of American manufacturers became too strong for them in the Sixty-first Congress, and in conference they were compelled to take the duty off ferromanganese by a subterfuge, throwing it into the pig-iron schedule, where it had no business to be.

Now, let me tell you one thing further about ferromanganese. There is 1 per cent of it in a ton of steel. The present price of ferromanganese is unusually high. I think it is about $60 a ton.

Mr. SWITZER. It has been $180 a ton.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, no; it has not. I never heard of ferromanganese at $180. The gentleman is thinking of some of the other ferro alloys, which run to immense prices. It means, then, 60 cents worth of ferromanganese goes into a ton of steel, and our tax at 15 per cent means that the American steel manufacturers will pay a tax to the Government of 9 cents even at this high price upon every ton of steel produced. I have never believed that such a small tax could be carried into the final product of the steel and iron manufactures so as to be of any material harm to the consumer, and believe, therefore, that these steel and iron manufacturers ought to pay, especially with ore on the free list largely for their benefit, this small tax upon their product.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does the Steel Trust make all the ferromanganese it uses? I understand it does.

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Then the trust would pay no tariff on ferromanganese, but the independent iron manufacturer would.

Mr. PALMER. I have said that.

Mr. COOPER. I did not hear the gentleman say it.

Mr. PALMER. I said exactly that, that there is no ferromanganese made in this country for sale. The steel and iron corporation makes ferromanganese for its own use, and all other producers of steel and iron buy ferromanganese from abroad. When the Payne law was written they had ferromanganese at even a higher rate than this.

Mr. COOPER. Then, if the gentleman will permit an interruption——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. If the Steel Trust makes its own ferromanganese and does not import any, and all the other manufacturers, the little fellows, do import it, the Steel Trust will not pay this duty, but the small manufacturers will. Will not that be the situation?

Mr. PALMER. Well, we can not write a law that will make everybody pay a duty at the customhouse.

Mr. COOPER. But we are expected to write a law that will not discriminate in favor of the trust and against the independent producers.

Mr. PALMER. This will not protect the United States Steel Corporation in any particulars, because it does not sell this article.

Mr. SWITZER. If the gentleman will permit, how does it help the poor man by placing a duty of 300 per cent on all that he uses?

Mr. PALMER. I have not said that this is written to help anybody. It is written in the law as a tax, which we think the steel and iron manufacturers ought to pay, and ought to be willing to pay.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; but I am anxious to conclude.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. If I correctly understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he stated that this was an advantage to the Steel Trust to the amount of 9 cents a ton.

Mr. PALMER. Well, the gentleman has not understood me correctly, and I refuse to have remarks of that kind put into the remarks I may make. I refuse to yield further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman says there will be a payment to the Government of 9 cents a ton?

Mr. PALMER. At the present price, which is a high price.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the gentleman's theory, who pays the tax?

Mr. PALMER. Of course the consumer pays the tax. No man now will argue anything to the contrary. The consumer pays it. There is no doubt about that. But we ought to levy the tax on the consumer, where, when the consumer does pay it, it will be so distributed as to be the least burden to him. I say, with reference particularly to ferromanganese, that there is not an item in all the tariff law which enters in such a small degree into the final cost of the product which the consumer does actually buy and use as it, and since we must levy a tax on the consumer, which the consumer must undoubtedly pay, to operate the Government, it is as easy a place as I know of, and a place where it can be laid with the least burden in all the length and breadth of this law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. PALMER. I do; but I am anxious to conclude.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask the gentleman one question. I want to know who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and asked for iron ore to be put on the free list?

Mr. PALMER. We put iron ore on the free list in the Underwood bill in the Sixty-second Congress. So far as I recall, there was not anybody who came before the Committee on Ways and Means and asked us to do it again. I suspect it was assumed we would.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that everybody who appeared here protested against iron ore being put on the free list, and that nobody asked you to do it?

Mr. PALMER. Well, it is also a fact that every American manufacturer, practically, who came before the Committee on Ways and Means during all our hearings protested against our reducing the tariffs to any degree. The problem we had to face was different from and harder than that which the Republican committees have always had to face. We were compelled to write this law in the interest of the people against the protests of these manufacturers, while all that you had to do was to write into the law what the manufacturers asked you to put there. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. One more question. You say you are not writing this tariff bill in the interest of the manufacturers?

Mr. PALMER. I said we were writing it to be fair to the American manufacturers.

Mr. AUSTIN. Did it not appear in the testimony that a steel company located in the gentleman's district and in the gentleman's town imported 350,000 tons of iron ore from Sweden, upon which the duty is 15 cents a ton, and the gentleman placed that iron ore now upon the free list of this bill?

Mr. PALMER. Well, I thought the gentleman from Tennessee, after having tried that same thing two years ago, would desist from any further effort to link me up with a desire to make profit for the Bethlehem Steel Co., of my district. I treat that company as I would treat all others. We are playing no favorites.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not linking the gentleman with the Bethlehem Steel Co. I am asking the gentleman if this record does not show that statement to be true?

Mr. PALMER. I do not know whether it does or not. But I know that this is true, that the Bethlehem Steel Co., which operates in my district, does import iron ore. I say that frankly. And we did put iron ore on the free list. The gentleman knows as well as any Member of this House, however, that that was not done by reason of any effort on the part of the Representative of that district to get a special privilege for a producer in his district [applause on the Democratic side], because he knows, and has been told before, and knows it to be a fact that the present Representative of that district is not in any sense a spokesman for a great protected interest, either the Bethlehem Steel Co. or any other.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not stating or insinuating——

Mr. PALMER. But implying——

Mr. AUSTIN. I am asking you if the record does not show what I have stated, and that the remission or the placing of iron ore on the free list benefits the steel corporation in your district to the extent of $42,000 a year on importation of Swedish iron ore alone, taking that amount of money out of the Treasury and turning it over to the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Mr. GORDON. What of it if it does?

Mr. PALMER. No; that is not an accurate statement. I go as far as the truth will permit any man to go when I say that iron ore is imported by the Bethlehem Steel Co. and that we have put iron ore on the free list. But iron ore is imported by many other independent steel or iron makers of the country besides the Bethlehem Steel Co., and the gentleman knows that. And I will say another thing to the gentleman, that the Bethlehem Steel Co. are large producers of the kind of steel which takes ferromanganese, and that company will pay a bigger tax on its ferromanganese by reason of the change in this law than it will save by the putting of iron ore on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt just at this point?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. In conversation with Mr. Schwab last night he made the statement that the worst enemy to the profits of the Bethlehem Steel Co. in the United States was their Representative in Congress, Mr. PALMER. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PALMER. Well——

Mr. LLOYD. And, further than that, he said that he himself had put into the business $35,000,000 in seven years and that he had made 20 per cent on his investment during that time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PALMER. I did not expect to go into any discussion about the politics of my district, but I think it is probably fair to say this, which states the full fact, that, while it may be true that the Bethlehem Steel Co. is pretty violently opposed to the present Representative of that district in Congress, the opposition of the Bethlehem Steel Co. is entirely confined to that of its chief owner, to the struggle of Mr. Schwab himself to keep me out of Congress, and while he may boast that he is my chief political enemy, I thank God that the men who work in his mills are my best political friends. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that the tariff on ferromanganese is a tariff for revenue only. In view of that statement, and in view of the statement that the gentleman at the left [Mr. LLOYD] has made regarding what Mr. Schwab said, do you not think it would be a very good idea for the Democratic Party, as a revenue measure only, to continue the tariff on Swedish iron ore imported by the Bethlehem people, who have made 20 per cent upon their capital during the last several years, and make them pay a little of the money for the carrying on of this Government?

Mr. PALMER. I have explained to the gentleman why we put iron ore on the free list. The iron ore in this country is practically controlled by the trust. The chief help which the independent can get, which he wants to get in fighting the trust, is free iron ore from abroad. If, after the statement I have made, the gentleman gets any satisfaction out of the fact that the Bethlehem Steel Co. will perhaps save a litle money by free iron ore, he is entitled to it. It has not been enough to win the Bethlehem Steel Co. over to my support. I know that.

Mr. SUMNERS. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that this bill reduces the tariff on the articles that the Bethlehem Steel Co. produces?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, very largely. We reduce the average ad valorem rate of duty under this schedule from 34.35 per cent to about 20 per cent. We reduce it all along the line, on every article which is produced by the Bethlehem Steel Co. in my district, and we have put upon the free list one of the chief products of the Bethlehem Steel Co.—steel rails. I do not believe any Member on this side has a right to play favorites with the interests of his own district, and my people do not expect me to do it.

I want to add just one thing about ferromanganese, so gentlemen may understand. Perhaps no tariff bill can be entirely scientific, but we are trying at least to write a bill which will be logical and symmetrical. I believe that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], when he indulged in tariff making, tried to have logic and symmetry at least throughout his bill. We put ferromanganese in with ferroalloys of other kinds, just the same as the gentleman from New York did. Ferrosilicon, ferromolybdenum, ferrotitanium, ferrotungsten, and all those ferroalloys, all made in the crucible like ferromanganese, ought under every reason to bear the same rate as ferromanganese; and so we put them all in one paragraph at one rate, as the Payne bill did. And we have restored the symmetry of that section of the bill which was destroyed when the American manufacturers mustered sufficient influence in the other branch of this Congress, and with the conferees, to hide ferromanganese in the pig-iron clause, in order to deceive the people into the belief that it was paying a higher duty than it really was.

Mr. HARDY and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH rose.

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I am asking this question purely for information. Why was rice left on the dutiable list?

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman from Michigan will excuse me.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman is a member of the committee.

Mr. PALMER. I said a while ago, and the gentleman wants to be fair, that I did not intend to discuss the whole bill, but that I intended to pay some attention to the metal schedule.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the Bethlehem Steel Co. a rather large exporter of steel and iron?

Mr. PALMER. Very.

Mr. HARDY. The drawback clause will enable them to get back a large part of such duty as they pay on imported articles, while the smaller manufacturer would pay that duty and never get anything back.

Mr. PALMER. That is quite true.

Mr. MURDOCK. If I understand the gentleman, steel rails are on the free list?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman expect any change in price by reason of that, or what will be the result?

Mr. PALMER. I frankly doubt whether there will be any change in the price of steel rails by their being put on the free list, because, as we all know, there is one of those world-wide trusts in the matter of steel rails. In effect, the manufacturers of steel rails the world over have agreed upon a division of territory and the fixing of prices with respect to the entire world, except South America, which is a free and open market to the manufacturers of steel rails both in this country and abroad, and where they are able to get steel rails at a considerable less price than we do in this country or Europe.

We put rails on the free list with the thought that if that agreement should fall down, if there should be a break in it by reason of the disaffection of the foreign or the American producer, the American people might then get some benefit from free rails in this country.

Now, they tell us that these high tariff rates have been made in the interest of American labor. They tell us, especially with respect to the steel and iron schedule, that the rates were made as they were in order to keep American labor employed. I think we have shown that if the production continues the same labor will continue to be employed, and what we will do by the passage of this law, amongst other things, will be to compel the American manufacturer to sell to the American people his product at as low a figure as he sells it to the Fiji Islander and the Patagonian. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how the division of time rests between this side of the House and the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has used 6 hours and 2 minutes and the gentleman from New York has used 6 hours and 44 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from New York desire to proceed?

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the high example set by our Democratic President in drawing attention to his tariff message by an address from "the throne" is of greater value to the people of the United States than would appear at first blush. In smashing the dull routine of a century and returning to the more or less monarchial but presumably anti-Jeffersonian methods of a Washington and an Adams, the President, who proclaims "a new freedom" from a condition of industrial and national thralldom, the horrors of which are more or less chimerical, has made the millions of victims of this sort of political philosophy "stop, look, and listen." In an age which is somewhat iconoclastic, when froth passes for substance and audacity for truth; when satiated mortals with easy money weary of the workshops and markets and yearn for novelty and sensation, he has compelled "a sitting up" and a "taking notice" which augurs that the tariff question, despised and derided during the recent presidential campaign, will again be considered as of vital importance to public welfare.

FACE THE ISSUE SQUARELY.

Standing upon the Democratic platform and inveighing against the protected industries of the country as "hothouse" growths to be immediately destroyed, the President has awakened employers whose indifference to political intrigues is appalling, as he has stirred the wage earners generally to a realization of their danger.

But, thanks to President Wilson's novel expedient, all the people are beginning to inquire about the tariff. They have learned that the Democratic Party does not propose only to find jobs for its followers but that it intends to squarely face the issue which it has raised with the Republican Party. It is going to attempt to prove that the Republican policy of protection to American industry, the policy which has raised the American wage standard above all others in the world, is wrong and must be overthrown.

It is not exactly what a majority of the people expected would happen. Those who knew even a little about the question were not prepared to hear so positive and emphatic a stand against protection as the leaders of the party now in power have taken. Hence it was a real service the President performed when he ascended the rostrum in the House to make his daring deliverance.

A TARIFF PRIMER.

It is because I believe there is urgent need for publicity and careful study of the tariff question that I have written my address in the form of "a tariff primer," which I send to the desk of the Clerk, whose assistance I shall ask in propounding the questions therein noted:

Question (by the Clerk). When was the first tariff act passed?

Answer (by Mr. MOORE). The first act passed was a tariff act. It was approved by President George Washington July 4, 1789, and was regarded as an American declaration of commercial independence.

Question. What was its purpose?

Answer. To support the Government, discharge the debts of the United States, and to encourage and protect manufactures by levying duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported. These purposes were specifically set forth in the first section of the act, and they were intended to relieve the Colonial States of the necessity of purchasing supplies abroad, to keep our money in the United States, and to discourage paternalism.

THE FIRST ACT FOR PROTECTION.

Question. Did this first act of Congress stimulate and encourage American manufactures?

Answer. It not only stimulated and encouraged them, but it gave confidence and hope to the youth of America and made us a manufacturing as well as an agricultural Nation.

Question. To what extent has the tariff system thus begun been continued?

Answer. There have been various changes in the tariff system according to the views of political parties which have happened to be in control of affairs. What is now known as the Republican Party has usually favored the levying of tariff duties sufficiently high to cover the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. The Republican platform of 1912 reaffirmed this position, declaring that "the Republican tariff policy has been of the greatest benefit to the country, developing our resources, diversifying our industries, and protecting our workingmen against competition with cheaper labor abroad, thus establishing for our wage earners the American standard of living." The Republican platform further declared that "the protective tariff is so woven into the fabric of our industrial and agricultural life that to substitute for it a tariff for revenue only would destroy many industries and throw millions of our people out of employment. The products of the farm and of the mine should receive the same measure of protection as other products of American labor."

DEMOCRATS AND HARD TIMES.

Question. What is the Democratic attitude toward the tariff?

Answer. Although Thomas Jefferson and other early Democrats believed in the encouragement of American industries and the imposition of tariff duties for that purpose, the Democratic Party has taken issue with the Republican Party in certain of its platforms and has contended that what Republicans call protection was unwarranted by the Constitution of the United States and that tariffs should be levied only for the purpose of raising revenue. This was the position taken by the State of South Carolina in 1832, when it nullified the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832. The Confederate Constitution of 1861 also denied the right of the Government to levy "any duties or taxes," "to promote or foster any branch of industry," holding that such duties should be levied only for revenue to carry on the Government. During the administration of Grover Cleveland, the so-called Wilson-Gorman bill was passed under Democratic auspices, and while it undertook to levy duties for revenue only, it did fix certain protective rates, but none of them sufficient to bring in enough revenue to run the Government. The result was that many American industries, forced to compete with cheap foreign labor, were obliged to discontinue business, hundreds of concerns became bankrupt and hundreds of thousands of people were thrown out of employment. The full effects of this disastrous Democratic bill were felt from 1893 to 1897. Not only did the Government have to issue bonds to meet its obligations incurred during this period, but it was further humiliated by having to permit thousands of its factory workers to go to free soup houses for sustenance.

FARMERS AND MILL MEN HURT.

Question. Who do you think were most affected by the change?

Answer. In the last analysis, the workingman and the farmer. When the employers found they could not compete successfully with the foreign manufacturers they closed their mills. For a time the workmen were able to live upon the savings they had accumulated under the McKinley protective-tariff law which preceded the Wilson-Gorman Act, but after their savings were gone, they were without the means to purchase food. Thus the farmer lost his best customer. Prices came down and commodities were cheap, but the earning power of the consumer was destroyed. It made little difference to him if he could buy a suit of clothes or a horse and wagon for $5 if he did not have the $5, and thousands of them did not have the $5. The distress in the cities was greater than it was on the farm, because the farmers could get along with what the farms produced, but they could not sell their produce at a profit. On the other hand, the city workman's cellar was empty, and if he had no wages he was in a bad way. One of the lessons of that unhappy period was the determining of the very close relationship between the producer and the consumer. It proved that their interests were identical and that in times of adversity there was little or no difference between them.

END OF CHEAP GOODS.

Question. What efforts were made to correct the distressing consequences of this Democratic policy?

Answer. The people who had suffered as a result of Democratic blundering restored the Republican Party to power and in 1897 a new tariff bill, framed for purposes of protection and commonly known as the Dingley bill, was enacted. This new law raised a tariff barrier against the tremendous volume of foreign imports that had "made goods cheap" under the Wilson law, compelled the return to the United States of capital that had gone to Europe, Canada, and other countries, and being in the nature of a guaranty to business men that they could resume their enterprises, and to farmers that they would again have an American market for their products, the tide of prosperity returned to the United States and instead of bankruptcy there was great rejoicing in American homes.

RESTORATION UNDER DINGLEY BILL.

Question. Can you give some data pertaining to this progress under the Dingley bill?

Answer. Yes; the "Tariff Handbook," just issued by the Democratic Ways and Means Committee (April, 1913), although not thoroughly reliable, quotes the number of establishments engaged in manufactures as being 214,954 in 1904, at the beginning of the Wilson law, and 266,805 in 1909, under the Dingley law. During this five years capital invested increased from $12,515,788,542 to $18,151,053,523; the number of wage earners, independent of salaried and other workers, advanced from 5,220,461 to 6,310,454; wages jumped from $2,461,279,407 to $3,231,207,579; the cost of material used increased from $8,343,639,649 to $11,928,209,567, while the value of the manufactured products advanced from $14,470,690,353 to $20,234,488,582. The dutiable list under the Dingley law in 1909 affected 6,052,312 wage earners in a total of 242,029 establishments representing a capital of $17,148,987,686. The Dingley law was successful as a promoter of industry within the United States and as a revenue raiser. It aimed to levy duties on imports that were in the nature of luxuries and contributed more than one-third of the total revenue of the Government. Under it wages steadily advanced throughout the United States, while there was also a steady increase in the cost of the products of agriculture. It is true that while the mill worker obtained higher pay it cost him more for the supplies he purchased from the farm, but it is also true that during the period of the Dingley law the hours of labor were generally reduced, the comforts of living were everywhere increased, and the people, without regard to section or employment, enjoyed conveniences, comforts, pleasures, and even the luxuries of life, to a greater degree than ever before in the Nation's history. Nevertheless, because of certain alleged inequalities in a few of the provisions of the Dingley law, and because its free list was not extended, there was an incessant agitation against it.

SAPPERS AND MINERS AT WORK.

Question. How long was the Dingley law in force?

Answer. It was effective from the date of its approval July 24, 1897, until the Payne bill went into effect August 5, 1909.

Question. What was the reason for this change?

Answer. One reason was that the Democrats who were out of power were continually misrepresenting the tariff question, contending that it created trusts and large enterprises and that under it Americans acquired wealth too rapidly. Republicans generally were too busy with their business affairs to answer these accusations and finally the people began to accept them as true. Another reason was that the growth of population in the United States due to the inspiration of our success and prosperity, having given us the greatest home market in the world, had invited the attention and concern of other great nations which coveted our purchasing power and sought to break the firm hold our protective laws gave us upon our own trade. With establishments that cost less and with labor that was skilled but poorly paid, they knew they could compete for the American dollar in the American market, if their cheap goods could be gotten over our tariff wall. Another reason for the change was that our own people had forgotten our former distresses; in fact, we were restive under too much prosperity. In response to what the Republican Party leaders believed to be a popular demand, although there are many reasons for believing that the demand was skillfully worked up by the foreign enemies of the protective system, the Payne bill was enacted into law. It having been contended that some of the rates in the Dingley law were too high and that the tariff should be revised downward, the Payne law undertook to make reductions in duties, but this did not satisfy the enemies of the protective system within the Republican Party or without.

REPUBLICANS YIELDED TO CHANGES.

Question. Did the Republicans change the Dingley law?

Answer. In the platform of 1908 the Republican Party declared in favor of a revision of the tariff at a special session of Congress. It did not say that revision should be a downward revision, but it did declare against "excessive duties," although maintaining that "the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries." Moreover, inasmuch as certain trade agreements with Germany and other countries had been made by President Roosevelt, which seemed to give undue advantage to foreign goods over those of American production, the platform declared for a maximum and minimum tariff by which the President might thereafter be guided when the opportunity to make favorable treaties should arise. In consequence of this party pledge a special session of Congress was called, which resulted in the passage and approval by President Taft of the so-called Payne bill of August 5, 1909, the existing tariff law.

PAYNE LAW GROWTH PHENOMENAL.

Question. Did the Payne bill revise the tariff downward?

Answer. It did revise the tariff downward, and while attempting to maintain the protective principle it equalized certain duties that had been objectionable, and altogether proved a most effective revenue measure. Under the Payne law the industries of the country continued to thrive and wages continued to increase, while the hours of labor and working conditions generally improved. The value of manufactures in 1912 far exceeded $20,000,000,000, the farms produced nearly $9,000,000,000, our imports exceeded $1,000,000,000, and our exports exceeded $2,000,000,000. In view of attacks upon both the Dingley and the Payne laws, it is noteworthy that our population increased from 90,000,000 in 1909, when the Payne bill went into effect, to 95,000,000 in 1912, the latest estimate of the Census Bureau. The wealth of the people of continental United States advanced in those three years from $150,000,000,000 to $175,000,000,000, making an increase in per capita wealth from $1,656.42 in 1909 to $1,834.17 in 1912, the highest aggregate ever attained by the American people.

PEEVED AT PARTY PROGRESS.

Question. If the people enjoyed such wonderful progress, why did they complain?

Answer. They listened to ambitious politicians, agitators without conscience, journalistic party builders, magazines seeking pap, essayists who found it more profitable to write fiction than to work, theoretical college professors, nonproducers generally, and a few sincere reformers, usually misinformed and frequently misled. They contended that the Payne bill was devised in the interest of Schedule K and one or two other horrifying exhibits, which very few of them understood and which fewer undertook to investigate. Color was given to their agitation because in a speech at Winona President Taft made reference to Schedule K as "indefensible," and also because in a reciprocity treaty with Canada the President, without consulting Congress, undertook to make a reciprocal arrangement which most Republicans believed would be disadvantageous to the United States. The President appeared to have been in accord with Mr. Roosevelt and the newspapers upon this question, but the farmers of the country took umbrage at the reciprocity arrangement and joined in the assault upon Schedule K, which had protected the American woolgrowers and manufacturers of wool, largely because they believed reciprocity with Canada as proposed would have the effect of reducing the farmer's prices for the products he had to sell. Thus Schedule K became a scapegoat of the tariff and an excuse for opposing the Republican ticket. But when the Democrats obtained control of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress and attempted to revise Schedule K in response to the hue and cry that had been raised against it, President Taft was twice compelled to veto their bills. He declared that "more than a million of our countrymen are engaged in the production of wool and the manufactures of woolens; more than a billion of the country's capital is invested in the industry"; and then, adding that "five millions of the American people will be injuriously affected by any ill-advised impairment of the wool and woolen industries," he declared it essential to "proceed prudently in dealing with them upon the basis of ascertained facts rather than hastily and without knowledge to make a reduction of the tariff to satisfy a popular desire."

HAMMERING THE MANUFACTURERS.

Question. Can you explain the prejudice against the wool and cotton schedules?

Answer. It was due very largely to the fact that the disrupters of the Republican Party were intent upon having a "goat." They needed somebody to club, and they picked upon the so-called "robber baron" manufacturers. Since the manufacturer is really the "maker" of raw materials, he is absolutely essential to the welfare of the producer, but no one cared to tolerate him as an economic necessity. The manufacture of cotton goods, particularly of hosiery, languished under low rates imposed by the Dingley law, but began to flourish, giving steady employment to thousands of mill hands, under higher rates accorded by the Payne law. As to this change of rates there was bitter contention, and while hosiery prices were not advanced to the consumer, the mill-worker consumers were better able to buy farmers' products than theretofore.

The wool schedule (Schedule K), however, was the chief bone of contention. The manufacturers were denounced as "malefactors," notwithstanding they were giving employment to tens of thousands of people, many of whom were females, whose mill wages were higher than they could obtain in department stores or in domestic service. The compensatory rates of Schedule K were jeered at and denounced, and this notwithstanding that these rates were designed, first, to protect the American woolgrower against the cheaper wool of Australia and other countries; second, to protect the American woolsorter against the cheaper woolsorter wages of England, and then to protect the American scourer of wool against the scouring wages of England, and so on along the line of the processes of manufacture in the carding, combing, weaving, dyeing, and finishing stages. In each particular occupation overhead charges abroad were one-half what they cost the American manufacturer and the wages were from 50 to 75 per cent less than in the United States. It made no difference, apparently, that every one of these separate branches of industry, from the herdsman who attended the sheep to the jobber who disposed of the cloth to the merchant tailor and the consumer, were imperiled by foreign competition; the manufacturers of the cloth were held up to ridicule and opprobrium.

INJUSTICE TO MAKERS OF CLOTH.

Question. Were the assaults upon the manufacturers justifiable?

Answer. Here and there, no doubt, manufacturers or jobbers made money out of the wool business. It is to be presumed that they had a right to expect to make a profit, otherwise they would not take the risk of venturing upon such an enterprise. But many of them did not make money, and dozens of them were ready to certify that they would take contracts if a steady market for their goods could be guaranteed, to deliver cloth to the consumer for a net profit over their other expenses of 5 cents per yard, or 17½ cents for the 3½ yards of cloth necessary for a suit of clothes. But the manufacturer was not believed. It was still contended by those who sought to use him as the "goat" that he was the man who pocketed the difference between the price the farmer got for his wool to the $20 or $25 paid to the department store for a suit of clothes. In "The New Freedom," Woodrow Wilson, now President, even went so far as to state emphatically that the manufacturer also pocketed the tariff. The truth is that every dollar of tariff is collected by the Government and saves the people, who are both the producers and the consumers of the land, the expense of internal taxation, which Mr. Wilson and his party now propose to impose upon them; and to say that the manufacturer of cloth is the recipient of the tariff, except to be protected against the lower cost of production abroad, is as absurd as it is to insist that the wool grower of the United States does not actually receive the 11 cents per pound which the Government levies upon foreign wool in the grease. That the farmer should receive it directly in person, and thus deprive the Government of its revenue, would be as preposterous as it would have been to give every citizen 16 silver dollars for 1 gold dollar, as many people really believed would happen if the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, now the Secretary of State, had succeeded in breaking up the Republican Party with his "16 to 1" propaganda.

HIGH COST OF LIVING MISREPRESENTED.

Question. How do you account for the difference between the manufacturer's profit, say 5 cents per yard on cloth, and the price of a suit of clothes?

Answer. About the same way that we would account for the difference in the price of eggs from the time the good farmer's wife in Kansas sells them to the buyer at 12 cents a dozen, to the time they are delivered to the housewife in the big cities at from 40 to 50 cents per dozen. It costs something to maintain an establishment which sends out buyers to meet the farmer's wife. That adds labor and expenses to the cost of 12 cents per dozen; and then it costs something for crates and packing and hauling to the railroad station; that must be added. Then it costs something to build railroads which provide the transportation to the storage warehouses; that should be added to the 12 cents per dozen. And then it costs something to build storage warehouses and set up chemical appliances necessary for the maintenance of the proper degrees of temperature; add that to the 12 cents per dozen. And then it costs something to keep those warehouses going from April or May when the hens are laying, until the snow is on the ground and the price of eggs has advanced—that costs something. Then the jobber or the middleman must be accounted for in disposing of the eggs by the millions, to millions of consumers whose prosperity is essential to their ability to purchase the eggs. And the retail grocer must be accounted for, having his rent to pay, his bookkeeper and clerk hire, his newspaper advertising, his delivery service; all this has to be accounted for. And then the telephone service installed for the lady who buys eggs from the retail grocer and wishes them delivered in packages wrapped with golden string, in wagons handsomely painted and decorated, by delivery boys in brillant uniform. These all cost money and it must be added to the original 12 cents a dozen cost of eggs. And if, perchance, these eggs should be brought out of storage at Christmas time and be served in one of the great hotels of an eastern city, or even in St. Louis or Chicago where the freight rates would be cheaper, an allowance must be made for the excellent style and taste in which the eggs are served, for the flowers that decorate the table and the halls, and for the music that percolates through the palms in "Peacock Alley." These and other trimmings are now required by at least a portion of our modern society, and they all cost money. The farmer does not get the cost of the extras in the original price of his eggs, because the other laborers who appear upon the scene demand compensation for their services.

TARIFF HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH IT.

Question. What has the tariff to do with that?

Answer. With due respect to those who connive at the defeat of the Republican Party, and who blame the tariff for the high cost of living, it has nothing to do with it under the sun. When the maker of the American cloth, whose employees and associates, from the grower of the wool to the weaver, delivers his 3½ yards to the consumer, the tariff protecting all the industries along the line, has been paid. And if 3½ yards were sold at a fairly high price of $3 per yard, or $10.50 for the suit, the "crime of the tariff" was wholly within the $10.50. If the finished suit was sold for $25, the tariff had nothing to do with the difference between $10.50 and $25, except as there may have been some duties upon the trimmings entering into the fashioning of the suit. Therefore, "the high cost of living" that entered into that suit of clothes after the cloth was laid down at $10.50, and which could have been avoided by the consumer making up the suit with his own thread and needle, is chargeable wholly to the agencies he employed, including cutters and seamstresses, to do the work for him. It is labor that gets the difference in the cost between the cloth and the price of the suit, except as the wholesaler, the merchant tailor, or the department store may require or exact a profit. By the same token it was the dozens of agencies and the many kinds of labor employed between the cost of eggs at 12 cents per dozen in Kansas and 50 cents a dozen in New York that derived the benefit of the intervening 38 cents. It was not the tariff at all. The tariff upon eggs was sufficient to induce the eastern buyer to abstain from buying foreign eggs and to induce him to buy Kansas eggs, and the wool-tariff schedule has the same relation to the purchase of foreign or domestic materials. It is obvious that if the Kansas farmer, dissatisfied with the 12 cents a dozen he received for the eggs, desired to take the risk of holding them and preserving them until December and then delivering them in person to the consumer in New York, he could have obtained the ruling retail price, but if he did not want to take the chance of holding the eggs and carrying them in person to the consumer and of sorting the good eggs from "the rots and spots," then it is fair to make an allowance to those who assume the risk, by investing capital and employing labor to distribute his supplies at any season of the year—in times of scarcity as well as in times of plenty. The cost-of-living problem requires a treatment of reason.

THE BUNCOMBE SERVED TO THE PUBLIC.

Question. Were the people informed upon these conditions?

Answer. It is doubtful whether the people stopped to consider them. As a rule they were "too busy" to do more than read the "scare headlines" in the newspapers, and the newspapers finding the people liked sensation, gave them plenty of it. The campaign of 1912 was prolific of denunciation of the rich. Anything in the nature of faultfinding with men who had succeeded in their business was "good stuff" for the Democrats and those who were seeking power by the overthrow of the Republican Party. Even the Decalogue was brought forth as a good thing and a new(?) thing by which people should be guided in the future. The Democratic orator made merry with the mills. He taught the workman to be unhappy and pictured frightful conditions of employment which did not exist. He talked of "watered stock," and of the wealth of J. Pierpont Morgan, and all this he blamed on the Republican tariff. He continued this incessantly in the endeavor to array class against class, although he knew full well that the matters of which he complained were subject to local regulation by law and not by the revocation of customs duties that would destroy the industries. Some years ago it was generally charged that Henry H. Rogers, a man of great wealth, was another such "incubus" as the late Mr. Morgan, but upon the death of each of these gentlemen it was observed that neither the financial nor the industrial worlds stood still; and it was further observed that neither of them carried away the vast accumulations they were supposed to control. To those who stopped to think it was apparent that the money of a Rogers or the money of a Morgan was, after all, the money that is working day by day in the construction and operation of the railroads and the other great enterprises which have brought the East and the West and the North and the South together in bonds of common interest. But while this sort of buncombe seemed to weigh with the unthinking, it is a curious fact that the workingmen were piling up their savings in the banks and savings funds of the country, and that these very moneys were being invested in railroad and other corporate enterprises, through which the workingman depositor was actually obtaining interest on "his investment." The viciousness of these political assaults upon industry is illustrated by the fact that in 1910 there were approximately 273,000 wage-earning depositors in one Philadelphia saving fund, who had $111,000,000 invested in the upbuilding of railroads and other great enterprises throughout the country. Doubtless many of these depositors were not aware that in listening to the enemies of a Republican tariff they were actually encouraging the depreciation and destruction of their own property.

MOLDERS OF PUBLIC OPINION.

Question. Did the newspapers have anything to do with this agitation?

Answer. They certainly did. They had a large interest in the tariff law. What the President had attempted to do in the matter of Canadian reciprocity included free trade and lower duties with respect to printing paper and wood pulp and other articles of Canadian production, and the success of the treaty would have been of great advantage to these powerful molders of public opinion. But Congress did not approve the treaty which the President had made and many of the newspapers were hostile in consequence. The attacks upon the Payne law were renewed, a division arose in the Republican Party, and repeated arguments in favor of the maintenance of the protective system, notwithstanding the few objectionable items in the thousands of items of the bill, did not avail. One of the chief reasons for Republican defeat, apart from continued political agitation, was the opposition or indifference of the newer generation of voters, who, having no recollection of the Wilson-Gorman period and being themselves prosperous, assumed that a change from Republican policy would do no harm. "What is protection to you?" asked the college professor of the student, whose remittances from home were regular and ample in 1912. "And what is protection to you?" asked the political agitator of 1912 of the bricklayer earning his $6 a day. And generally the answer came swift and smart, "Don't worry; forget it." And so they voted. The effect of their vote was to declare against the Payne law, notwithstanding it brought about our greatest prosperity. You see the "Don't Worry Club" lives up to its motto with respect to the tariff when Uncle Sam is working.

A STUDY IN FREE LISTS.

Question. Did the Payne law increase the free list?

Answer. It increased the free list even to a greater extent than ever before, but still maintained sufficient revenue to meet the needs of the Government. Imports admitted free under the Payne law in 1912 were valued at $881,512,987, or $105,000,000 more than in 1911. The free imports were greater under the Payne law than under any Democratic law. More goods were admitted free than came in subject to duty. The percentage of free goods imported was 53.73 in 1912, or 3 per cent more than in 1911, a percentage higher than that of the Wilson-Gorman law, which attained 48.56, but notwithstanding this exceedingly high percentage of free imports which cut the revenue from $326,561,683.14 in 1910 to $304,899,366.08 in 1912, the duty collected per capita in 1912 was $3.15 against $3.25 in 1911, $3.50 in 1910, $3.21 in 1909, $3.13 in 1908, and $3.72 in 1907. And while under the Payne law the duty per capita was steadily falling, proving that the so-called "tariff burden upon the people" was being reduced, the imports per capita were steadily rising, having reached the high mark in 1912, to wit, $16.94, or twice the volume of per capita imports of 15 years before. But while the much-berated tariff was thus being reduced the internal revenue, which is derived directly from the people, was advancing from $246,212,644 in 1909 to $321,612,200 in 1912, or more than was collected from the tariff, without any special complaint from anybody except the producers of liquors and tobacco and the dealers therein. In fact, the imperceptible burden of the tariff, estimated at $3.15 per capita, the maintenance of which has a direct relation to the employment of millions of farm and factory workers, was anathema, while the greater and more direct burden of the internal revenue aroused no wonderment and scarcely any comment. Thus it appears that the people had come to believe that it would be better for them to increase their own internal taxes rather than to share their burden with the foreign business man who desired to worm his way into the American market or the importer who preferred to spend American money in foreign countries.

DISPLACEMENT OF AMERICAN BILLIONS.

Question. Is the extension of the free list good for the country?

Answer. The protectionist does not think so, and yet to gratify what seemed to be a popular demand the Payne law brought in in 1912 the largest volume of free goods ever imported. The value of these free foreign goods in that year was $881,512,987. In plain English, we sent that much money abroad to buy foreign goods in one year, when we might just as well have spent it in our own country. The year previous, 1911, we sent abroad $777,000,000; in 1910, $761,000,000; in 1909, $600,000,000. The total amount for foreign purchases sent out of the country under the much-maligned Payne law in less than four years of its operation was approximately $3,000,000,000. The money that thus left the country to buy foreign goods under the free list would have been sufficient to build 10 Panama Canals. But we preferred to send that money abroad, and we did so. Among the articles admitted free of duty were hides and skins valued for 1912 at $102,000,000. They were put on the free list because the people were led to believe the trusts, supposed to control American hides, would destroy the tanners and shoemakers. When the duty was removed from hides the price of hides went up and the price of shoes did not come down, and it also developed that the so-called trusts were as influential in the control of foreign hides as they were of the domestic. The Government lost the duty which had in 1908 amounted to $1,959,434.73. Another item on the free list was coffee, imported in 1912 to the value of $117,000,000; it was made free because the agitators or the manipulators did not want to pay a duty. The consumer got no benefit from the repeal of the duty because the export country levied an export tax on coffee and accepted for itself what the United States had given away. The importer was relieved of the duty, but the consumer paid for coffee at the same old rate. It was not a reduction of living-cost, but a deliberate subterfuge operating to deceive the people while pretending to work in their behalf, and yet the people believed the agitators for free hides and the agitators for free coffee, just as they were led to believe the agitators against the Payne law.

WE GET "ART"; THEY GET MONEY.

Question. Have you any other illustrations showing how the people are fooled?

Answer. Yes; "art works" is suspicious. When the Payne committee yielding to "unselfish" clamor put "art works" upon the free list in 1909 the idea was to encourage art and to win over a few of the "old masters" for American art galleries. In 1909 "art works" came in free to the value of $549,661. In 1910 they jumped in value to $19,114,407.19. In 1911 the value of these "art works" coming in free had reached $21,045,921, and in 1912 they climbed to the enormous value of $35,116,930.75. This was a direct displacement of $75,000,000 of good American money in four years, not for food or necessities, but for "art works," upon which to feast the eyes and inspire the applause of the connoisseur. The people, or somebody claiming to represent them, demanded "free art," and they got it by "blowing in" $75,000,000 of American money for the enrichment of foreign artists and picture dealers. The much heralded purchase of a single painting from one of the English collections, at a cost of $500,000, is a reminder that if that money had remained in the United States where it was earned, it would have been sufficient to pay $1,000 a year to 500 men, who could thus have supported a population of 2,500 in any city or village of the United States for a whole year. If these items, wisely or unwisely yielded in the Payne law, reacted upon the American people, imposing upon them a charge rather than a relief, they are to be continued in the Underwood bill in greater volume and for the avowed purpose of encouraging foreign competition.

THE UNDERWOOD BILL AND ITS MEANING.

Question. What do you mean by the Underwood bill?

Answer. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is chairman of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee, and the exponent in the House of Representatives of the theories of Woodrow Wilson, the newly elected President of the United States.

Question. Were the Democrats commissioned by the people to write a tariff bill embodying the ideas of President Wilson?

Answer. The Democrats think they were, although apparently a majority of the voters of the United States are not in sympathy with Mr. UNDERWOOD or Mr. Wilson. The protectionists of the country divided their votes between Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt, so that Mr. Wilson was elected although he is the leader of a minority party.

Question. What is the objection to the tariff plans of Mr. UNDERWOOD and President Wilson?

Answer. They are believed to be destructive of the industries that have been created in the United States under a protective tariff system. They are not actually for free trade with foreign nations, but they are so close to it in an effort to force competition upon the foreigners' terms as to discourage American enterprises and drive existing industries out of business. We have always boasted in this country that it was a land of opportunity, and we have flattered ourselves that the energetic young American was entitled to the fruits of his toil. If he should undertake to start a mill under the proposed new system, those who work for him could not expect to earn more than is now obtained for similar work in foreign countries, because the right of protection against the lower wages paid abroad would be denied. In other words, the opportunity to start the mill in this country would not be worth while, and the wage earner as well as the mill owner would both be out of employment.

THE PRESIDENT'S HOTHOUSE BANANAS.

Question. Wherein does President Wilson approve of any such doctrine?

Answer. In numerous speeches and particularly in a book entitled "The New Freedom," published this year, 1913, in which, to illustrate his belief with regard to the tariff, he refers to the very improbable "privilege" of raising bananas in Connecticut or Michigan.

"If we should undertake to raise bananas under such circumstances," says the President with a slight show of sarcasm, "we shall have in Connecticut or Michigan or somewhere else miles of hothouses in which thousands of happy American workingmen, with full dinner pails, will be raising bananas, to be sold at a quarter apiece." But growing more serious the President adds, "What I am trying to point out to you now is that this 'protective' tariff, so called, has become a means of fostering the growth of particular groups of industry at the expense of the economic vitality of the rest of the country."

all of which he likens to a garden that must be thoroughly weeded out. In this same chapter, without regard to the difference in wage and living conditions and of the cost of production at home and abroad, the President asks where and when it happened that the "boasted genius of America became afraid to go out into the open and compete with the world?"

The question has the true ring of the jingo, but the answer is that a $3 wage in the United States can not compete with a $1 wage in Germany without the loss of $2, nor can an educated civilized American make much headway if he has to compete in living conditions with coolie labor. "It is a condition that confronts us, not a theory."

FORBIDDEN TO IMPROVE ON NATURE.

Question. Has the President given these views to Congress?

Answer. The President briefly reenforced these views in a personal address to Congress. In calling the extraordinary session to consider the Underwood tariff bill, the President insisted that industrial conditions had so changed in the United States and some of them had developed so rapidly that it was our duty now to rid ourselves of all kinds of "artificial advantage" and to "thrive by the law of nature." "Our task," said the President, speaking of tariff schedules, "is to square them with the actual facts. The sooner that is done the sooner we shall escape from suffering from the facts and the sooner our men of business will be free to thrive by the law of nature—the nature of free business—instead of by the law of legislation and artificial arrangement."

"We must abolish," said President Wilson, "everything that bears even the semblance of privilege, or of any kind of artificial advantage, and put our business men and producers under the stimulation of constant necessity to be efficient, economical, and enterprising, masters of competitive supremacy, better workers and merchants than any in the world. Aside from the duties laid upon articles which we do not and probably can not produce, therefore, and the duties laid upon luxuries and merely for the sake of the revenues they yield, the object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contact with the wits of the rest of the world."

A BOLD NEW PHILOSOPHY.

Question. Is the President preaching a new philosophy?

Answer. Evidently the President has thought out a new philosophy which he proposes to try out on the people. It is in the nature of a program more universal than the "busting of trusts" by President Roosevelt or the altruistic hopes and expectations of President Taft. It is even broader than Mr. Bryan's free-silver issue or his government control of railroads. Mr. Wilson proposes to make progress by halting progress; by destroying much of the great work that has been done under Republican rule and attempting a reconstruction upon the ruins. We are no longer to labor for the success of our own enterprises, but we are to stop where we are and penalize ourselves by stagnation and losses until the other nations have an opportunity to catch up with us. The President has made a bold stroke to harmonize the races, to remove impediments in the course of human progress which, in some respects, have been insurmountable since the beginning. He has started out to obtain an equilibrium of all the people of all the earth by checking the high tide of American progress until the sluggish waters in European and Asiatic channels have reached our level or we have been reduced to theirs. We might just as readily expect to see an equilibrium maintained between the waters of Lake Erie and the rapids of Niagara by a philosophical removal of the falls, as the attainment of the President's equilibrium of the industrial and living conditions of all nations. Since no such change in our economic life as is proposed in the President's philosophy is likely to occur in our own generation, when the cold necessities of earning our bread and butter by the "sweat of the brow" still stares us in the face, it would seem an idle waste and a needless sacrifice to thus expose our homes and firesides to a prospect so intellectually well conceived but so practically impossible. As it is evident "the billing and the cooing" of the doves must ultimately yield to the building of the nest, so it becomes the human race to provide for its future happiness and comfort; and the United States method of doing it has been successful under Republican administrations. We can not live upon philosophy and, as Owen Meredith sagely observes, "civilized man can not live without cooks."

FIRST THE COMPETITOR, THEN THE HOME.

Question. To what extent would President Wilson's destruction of "artificial advantage" affect the trade and commerce of the United States?

Answer. So far as manufactures affected in one way or another by tariff duties are concerned, it would apply to nearly all of the industries, which in turn are supported by nearly all of the raw products of the United States. It would apply in one way or another to 270,000 establishments that are "artificial," in which upward of 7,700,000 people are employed and in which more than $18,000,000,000 are invested. (Abstract Thirteenth Census.) It would undoubtedly close up many of the mills and factories where direct competition with foreign enterprises would give the foreigner the advantage in the cost of labor and material. Emerson said, "If a man can write a better book, preach a better sermon, or make a better mousetrap than his neighbor, though he may build his house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to his door." But President Wilson says, in effect, if a man write a book, or if he raise potatoes, he shall not sell them except at the foreign price; if he rear a mill, he shall yield to his foreign competitor; and if he be dissatisfied with his wages under the "artificial arrangement" of protection, he shall remove to Europe or go unemployed. He says it is time to break up the industrial establishments if they can not operate on equal terms with those abroad; and this in spite of the Biblical injunction that "if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." (I Timothy, Chap. V, verse 8.)

PERTAINING TO PROTECTION BY COPYRIGHT.

Question. Does President Wilson apply this doctrine to the publication of books?

Answer. He does not. The preparation of books is brain labor, while the work of the mill man is hand labor. The President's publication, "The New Freedom," which insists that protection from foreign labor shall be removed from the mill worker and the farmer, is "copyrighted" against domestic competition, and "all rights are expressly reserved" against foreign competition. So that the President's rule does not work both ways. And yet Woodrow Wilson, the eminent scholar and author, is entitled to protection and royalties for the product of his brain and pen, a protection which should not be denied the man on the farm or the plodder in the mill.

Question. In what respect has the gentleman from Alabama indorsed the views of President Wilson?

Answer. In so shaping his tariff bill as to discourage American enterprise and industry and encourage foreign competition, to the end that cheaper goods shall be supplied to the people though their wages be lowered and their employment taken away. The Underwood bill threatens the destruction of the sugar industry in the United States, menaces the cotton and wool industries, except as it will have no influence upon raw cotton but to increase the sales of American raw cotton in foreign lands, and while admittedly destroying $100,000,000 of revenue collected at the customhouse from importers of foreign commodities attempts to make up that deficiency by an income tax levied directly upon some of the people, and only some of the people, whose offense is that they have been industrious and thrifty.

INCOME TAX AN UNNECESSARY MAKESHIFT.

And while an income tax properly graduated may be a fair way of raising revenue, as proposed in the Underwood bill, it is special to a certain class of citizens; it will be an unending annoyance to honest business men and farmers who are struggling to make both ends meet; it will encourage deception and fraud in the making of returns, and will discourage investments in industrial or labor-employing enterprises. It will raise an army of inquisitors and tax collectors and prove a direct charge upon the responsible citizen who, because he is responsible and law-abiding, is generally compelled to bear the burden of the shirk. There is small warrant for such an experiment at this time, in view of the fact that at the close of 1912, with the Payne tariff law still in operation, the United States Treasury showed a surplus of $37,224,502. The best the Democrats hope to do in substituting an income tax for the tariff is to obtain a surplus of $1,335,000 at the close of the first fiscal year. And this upon the mere guess (see majority committee report) that the income tax will yield a per annum total of $68,750,000. The margin is so close that the shadow of a deficiency is already apparent, for the bulk of the income tax must necessarily be collected from a few of the large and prosperous States that are to be robbed of both protection and prosperity. Verily, "the penny and the cake" shall "walk the plank" together.

Question. Has the gentleman from Alabama given outward expression of his belief in President Wilson's theories?

Answer. Mr. UNDERWOOD has frequently declared in debate that he is opposed to protection. During the secret caucus of the Democratic Party, considering the sugar schedule, Mr. UNDERWOOD was quoted as having resisted the appeals of some of his Democratic brethren who had the temerity to insist upon protection for the men who are employed in the sugar industry in Louisiana and for other interests. As reported in the Philadelphia Record, Mr. UNDERWOOD spoke for the President and his party.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY TO GO.

"The President only asked us for two things in that bill," he said. "He asked us for free wool, and the committee gladly gave it to him. He asked for a change in the sugar schedule, and the committee did as he asked. I appeal to you in the name of the President and the party to stand solidly behind the President and the committee on this question.

"If we as a party are to do the things we have promised to do, we must have party solidarity. The President's position on sugar is perfectly fair; there is no principle involved that is different from the principle of free sugar.

"The sugar growers of Louisiana have been brought up as a hothouse growth; that is true. They have invested many millions in their industry. Free sugar will destroy them; that is conceded; and it is only proper that their industry must give way. The President felt that it would be fairer to all concerned that these sugar growers be allowed three years in which to liquidate. They have much paper in the banks; they have suffered from two bad crops; and to put sugar on the free list to-day would damage them greatly. By giving them three years in which to liquidate we will give them time to get their houses in order.

"They can straighten out their affairs, fix up their financial matters, use their lands and mills for other purposes. Three years is a short time; and while I personally have little use for protection, we must not forget that this industry is the result of the protective theory, and we should give them time to right their affairs."

OLD MILLS MUST DIE.

Question. Has the gentleman from Alabama conceded the destruction of other industries?

Answer. Yes; he has been equally frank on other occasions. Concerning the duties upon wool and woolen clothing discussed in the secret Democratic caucus April 18, the Washington Herald had this to say:

"Opposing the amendment to put ready-made clothing on the free list, Leader UNDERWOOD conceded that the rates of the wool schedule would hurt many industries. He said he was inclined to believe that many mills would be put out of business. He insisted that there were factories in this country equipped with inefficient plants, and that they were badly administered, and he had no doubt they would go out of commission upon the approval by the President of the pending bill. Mr. UNDERWOOD declared that many woolen factories were maintained under the special privilege of protection. He said that, economically, they had no place in the industrial life of the land. They were 'hothoused' under protection conditions, and could not expect to survive under the competitive conditions that would result from the adoption of the new tariff."

LIVING COST REDUCED BY WAGE REDUCTIONS.

There is no mistaking the issue. As the matter now stands, the Democrats, who are in complete control of the Government, propose to destroy protection, as Republicans understand it, and to substitute "free competition" with all the world, except that duties shall be levied upon imports for purposes of revenue. Whereas last year, under the Payne law, we collected upon imports over $304,000,000, they propose to collect only $200,000,000, and recover the remainder by an inquisitorial and direct income tax upon the people. They contend that in this way they can reduce the price of eggs, potatoes, and meat, but they fail to take into account the losses that will fall upon the farmers who produce those commodities if the industrialist or the millworker, who is dependent upon "artificial arrangement," is shoved out of his job by foreign cheap labor. Mr. Wilson and Mr. UNDERWOOD have made it perfectly clear that they propose to stand or fall upon the truth or falsity of their theories. They are undertaking to reach the unattainable by equalizing a 100 per cent civilization with a 33 per cent industrial condition. They are keeping faith with their party.

PLAYING UP TO THE FOREIGNER.

Question. Is the Underwood bill favorable to the foreigner?

Answer. Its sponsors frankly declare they want "competition." They do not mean by that that if we have mills manufacturing metal, or wool, or cotton goods, or chemicals that there shall be more mills in the United States, but they do say that whatever mills we have shall not be increased by encouraging our own trade until we have first stood the ruinous competition of England, Germany, and other countries, which have every advantage in the matter of wages and cost of production. They make no account of wages at all, and pretending they want cheapness to destroy the trusts and monopolies, they encourage the migration of workmen and the transfer of capital to foreign countries, where, if the trust or combination be international in character, the place of manufacture is of little concern to the manipulators. One of the curious guesses in the report upon the Underwood bill is that by the transference of raw materials and other commodities from the Payne free list to the Underwood dutiable list there will be such an influx of imports anxious to pay duty that there will be realized at the customhouse $102,403,000 to aid in making up the deficiency that will result from the reckless reduction of duties generally.

AND THE TRUSTS ARE NOT COMPLAINING.

Question. Explain that point about the trusts.

Answer. I will. If it is cheaper for the International Harvester Trust, or for any iron and steel trust, or for any textile trust, or for any sugar or tobacco trust to do its manufacturing in England, France, or Cuba, of what advantage to the people of this country would it be to remove the duty upon any of the articles thus produced? Such trusts would want the duty removed. If Mr. Carnegie has as much money invested in foreign steel mills, where labor is cheap, as he has in mills of the United States, where labor is high, or if the Harvester Trust is availing itself of cheap labor in the factories it operates in foreign lands, why would they want a duty imposed upon anything they make abroad if they can still control the market of the United States? Under these circumstances it is improbable the price of reapers and mowers would be lessened to the farmer whether the duty is on or off. Thus the individual or independent operator is set upon "the sliding board" and all industry drifts into the maw of the combination with the greatest power and the most money and they save the duties.

SAVING SOMETHING FOR THE SUGAR IMPORTER.

There has been so much special pleading for the "poor consumers" of sugar emanating from the importers' offices in New York as to lead to the suspicion that the wealthy gentlemen who pay the import duty, amounting to $56,000,000 per annum, and who now have to meet a fair American competition which enables sugar to be sold at retail for 4½ cents a pound, are not wholly disinterested in the destruction of the industry in Louisiana and the West; but the Underwood bill proposes to take the duty from sugar even though the duty paid by these importers, which the Government stands to lose, if reduced to the pound consumed, precludes a lessening of the retail price. The Sugar Trust is not opposing the removal of the duty on sugar.

Question. How was the Underwood bill prepared?

Answer. By the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee holding secret deliberations. It was drawn in defiance of those whose business and employment were involved and was then submitted to the Democratic caucus, which also met in secret. After the party caucus had deliberated upon it in secret it was returned to the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, by whom it was made public three days ago—April 22. It is a document of 218 printed pages, a hurried comparison of which with the Payne law of 1909 shows it to be in title and text a direct contradiction of the policy of protection.

A LITTLE SPECIAL PRIVILEGE; THAT'S ALL.

Question. How does the Underwood bill differ in title from the Republican law of 1909?

Answer. The contrast in title is significant. The Republican law was entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes." There is nothing to "encourage the industries" in the Democratic bill, the title of which is "A bill to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes." A better title for the Democratic bill would be "A bill to encourage foreign competition and to reduce American production," for this, in fact, is substantially the purpose of this bill, except as to raw cotton.

Question. Does the Underwood bill provide for any protection at all?

Answer. None on principle, but a little on "special privilege."

Question. Name some of the "special-privilege" items.

Answer. Cotton, as stated, does not need any protection. It is an American monopoly, sold largely abroad, and is therefore on the free list; but several of the cotton-growing States are taken care of in relation to cattle, cotton bagging, Angora goat hair, press cloth, citrus fruits, peanuts, briar wood, and so forth. The desire to destroy protection in chemicals, earthenware, iron and steel, woolen and cotton goods, and other factory products, however, is not applied in the bill to shipowners, who are offered a direct bonus of 5 per cent over foreign competition; that is to say, the bill is consistent in its purpose to destroy protection, except in the case of a few political friends whose "ox is gored."

Question. What is the objection to the 5 per cent ship subsidy?

Answer. In some respects the 5 per cent protection or subsidy to shipowners may be a good thing. It proves the inconsistency of the Democratic position. As most of the ships that would be benefited belong to so-called trusts, like the Standard Oil Co., "the taxing of the rich and the relieving of the poor," which the gentleman from Alabama in his opening speech proclaimed to be the purpose of the Democratic Party, is not apparent in this case.

WAS THE FARMER TREATED FAIRLY?

Question. Is there a report accompanying the Underwood bill?

Answer. Yes; there is an explanatory report which was put into print for distribution day before yesterday. In his opening address the gentleman from Alabama followed substantially the lines of this report.

It is a labored effort to find excuses for the drastic and unscientific changes contemplated in the bill. It first contends that the people got along happily under revenue tariffs until the Civil War, and then complains of the higher tariffs since existing. It fails to note that all the real progress of the Nation occurred under Republican tariffs since the war. Now it finds that the Payne Tariff Act of 1909, which gave us a surplus of almost every commodity, including free imports, was responsible for the high cost of living—an economic phenomenon in no way special to the United States. Again, the committee fails to recognize the steady employment of labor at increased pay and reduced hours. Nor does it consider the advantage to the agricultural population whose farm products, sold in the cities, advanced 93.2 per cent in price from 1897 to 1910, while city-made clothing, sold to the farmer, advanced only 35.8 per cent in the same period, and house-furnishing goods only 24.2 per cent. And as to this it may be explained that the differences between Republicans in the campaign that elected Mr. Wilson were due largely to the persistent untruths that were circulated with regard to the high cost of living. The farmer was told he paid too much for his clothing. The figures just presented (and they are taken from the committee's report) show that the price of farm products advanced under the Payne law more than twice the amount of advance upon clothing prices. The farmer profited under the tariff more than the industrialist, but he was lied to and made to believe the industrialist was not his friend.

PROSECUTING THE TRUSTS.

Because of the organization of large combinations of capital made necessary since the Civil War by increased public demand for transportation and other utilities and commodities the tariff is blamed for certain bad trusts, and this in spite of the fact that Grover Cleveland, the last Democratic President of the United States, and his Attorney General, Mr. Olney, refused to proceed against unlawful combinations, although they have since been successfully prosecuted under successive Republican administrations. And there is a peculiar effrontery about this, in view of the free-trade provisions of the Underwood tariff bill, which operates directly in the interest of the sugar, iron and steel, oil, match, salt, chemical, and other trusts large enough to have an international "gentlemen's agreement," by which they may crush out their independent American competitors, avoid the tariff, and put the revenue burden upon the lessened earning power of the American people.

POPULATION RISING TOO RAPIDLY.

The report holds the Republican tariff responsible for the utilization of our natural resources. This is amusing. It deplores the fact "that the protection system has been greatly influential in maintaining a too rapid rate of depletion of natural resources in order to satisfy the constantly increasing demand of a rising population." Evidently, it expects a rising population of 95,000,000 to adopt the idealistic, but nonbread-winning, theories of President Wilson to discard "the artificial arrangement" and return to the "laws of nature." We are not to erect any "hothouses" to protect our plants; we are to leave them naked to the tender mercies of the beautiful snow. Why eat salad which is raised under glass when you can get any old grass by rooting in the ground?

Question. Then you do not regard the Underwood bill as a "scientific production"?

Answer. It is neither scientific, practical, patriotic, nor just. It is guesswork—a mere stab at rates in order to justify the Democratic contention. The loudest howl of the campaign demagogue who pretends to represent the people has been levied against luxurious living. The Democrats said they would punish the luxurious. They were "dead against the wallflowers and the dress-suit fellows." Heaven forbid that anyone should ever see a Democrat riding in automobiles or going to theater parties in "swallowtails." Perish the thought that any true Democrat should ever wash with castile soap or deny "pot licker" for the city brew.

DEMOCRATS WANT MORE PERFUMED SOAP.

Question. And how did the Underwood bill meet this delicate political situation?

Answer. By reducing the duty on perfumed toilet soap from 50 per cent ad valorem under the Payne law to 40 per cent ad valorem under the Underwood bill. The aroma of victory, the spoils of war, have beaten down the soap-fat brood, and the Democratic Party has emerged from the backwoods. It demands soap, foreign soap, perfumed and Frenchified, and instead of raising the duty on this exquisite and deliciously flavored compound de luxe it adds it to the "bath of nature" and admonishes the thrifty farmer's wife to chuck her fat to the pigs. In their abhorrent list of luxuries the Democrats have admitted "china, porcelain, Parian, and crockery ware, painted or decorated," at 15 per cent less duty than the Payne law imposed; and "manufactures of marble, onyx, alabaster, and jet," not used extensively by the "downtrodden," they have admitted at 5 per cent less; and these are but a few of the efforts to relieve the poor and punish the rich. Verily, the Democratic orators are "sure friends" of the "downtrodden" before election, but they like "the trimmings" after.

PUNISHING THE OLD ESTABLISHED HOUSES.

Question. Have you any further comments on the report?

Answer. Yes. The report undertakes to prove, as the gentleman from Alabama did in his argument, that by arresting the woolen and cotton industries—because they have successfully used old machinery and equipment for 50 to 60 years—the men who engage in manufacturing enterprises will be taught to adopt the methods of foreign competitors in equipment and efficiency. It was formerly the rule in certain sections of the country to induce our enterprising citizens to undertake the construction of mills, and they were frequently offered local inducements and free taxes for a period of years. Under the new system, as proposed, this is no longer permissible, for the man who dares to invest his money in a manufacturing enterprise, or who dares to borrow money for that purpose, must understand at the start that he must adopt the foreign methods and that he must employ only those who are willing to work at the foreign wage. This is surely un-American. Moreover, he is told that if he enters into the manufacture of linoleum, for instance—linoleum being a poor man's commodity—that on burlap, which is his raw material and which he acquires from foreign sources, because it can not be made in the United States in competition with the wretched labor of India, he must pay a duty, while there must be a reduction upon the duty on linoleum itself. Or if he undertakes to erect a mill to grind wheat, he must expect to pay a duty upon the Canadian wheat, which is his raw material, while Canadian flour, manufactured by his foreign competitor, may come in free. Or if he undertakes to make carpets, he must stand for a reduction of duty upon his finished product, while he pays duty upon the dyestuffs that are amongst his raw materials.

INCONGRUITIES IN THE BILL.

Among the other incongruities of the Underwood bill is its treatment of umbrella manufacturers. The bill admits finished umbrellas ready for sale at a lower rate than it imposes on the component parts of an umbrella. Hence, the foreigner is enabled to get his umbrellas into the American market cheaper than it costs the American maker for his raw material.

Question. You have referred to burlap, what about bagging?

Answer. It may be pardonable for the gentlemen who come from the cotton States to take care of their own, and without intending to be invidious, it seems they are doing it in this bill. They have taken burlap off the free list, it being the raw material used in the manufacture of linoleum, but they have carried "bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and similar fabrics" to the free list, together with "press cloths of camel's hair." In other words, while taxing the manufacturer of linoleum, umbrellas, and so forth, upon their raw material, the bill removes the duty from the raw material of the cotton planter and the cottonseed-oil manufacturer. Thus, a little bit of "artifice" seems to have been injected into the "laws of nature."

SMALL CHANCE FOR YOUNG AMERICA.

Question. Is there anything in the bill to encourage an ambitious boy?

Answer. There is nothing in the bill or the report to encourage any boy to exercise his brains or ingenuity for the advancement of the industrial welfare of his country. If he undertakes to engage in any enterprise involving employment of labor which is paid higher wages than is paid the cheap labor of Europe he must expect to face a foreign competition that will crush him at the outset of his business career. He is caught between the upper and the nether millstones. And unless he is big enough to establish foreign connections, or can tie up with some trust that is able to defy American regulation, he must go down with the independent "little fellow" whose quietus is established by this bill. There is one way, however, by which an energetic young American may make money temporarily under the new system. He can buy out the stock of manufacturers who are driven to the wall, or of dealers in commodities who have been foolish enough to keep on hand supplies purchased at American prices until the flood gates are let down to foreign cheap goods. He may then do business as an auctioneer, or with the great department stores whose splendid advertising facilities will enable them to draw upon the savings of those who are in quest of bargain sales. Or, if he be clever enough, he may be able to locate in Canada or Europe a market for the machinery of dismantled American mills.

THE ABYSS OF DREAMS AND DOUBT.

Question. Does the bill attempt to regulate the trusts?

Answer. It does not. The Democratic Party has pretended that it would kill the trusts, but this bill will aid rather than hinder them. The Underwood bill stands pat on cotton. It pretends to on tobacco, but gives free trade to the Philippines. It is cruel to the sugar planter and the woolgrower, and is utterly offensive to the independent industries. It proposes to discipline the manufacturers of the country and all their employees by eliminating the profits and reducing the wages. There is no relief to those who look for a continuance of prosperity, but, on the contrary, the bill imposes an additional burden of unnecessary taxation. It is a bill in the interest of the speculator, the juggling importer, and those who control big business. It is an inducement to the business man to move to Canada or to Europe, and is altogether a surrender of the greatest prosperity of the greatest of nations to agitators and theorists, who neither know nor seem to care how great the havoc they invite. Speaking broadly, there is nothing in this bill for the American farmer, nothing for the American workingman, but everything for the foreigner. Recklessly and with deliberation the bill as written plunges the substance of our national progress into the abyss of dreams and doubt. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, as I rise to speak to-day I am reminded vividly of the conditions when I first entered Congress 20 years ago. Then, as now, there was a Democratic President, a Democratic Senate, a Democratic House of Representatives, with a Democratic Speaker, who avowed his belief in free trade. A tariff bill was then, as now, the prime object of the Democratic Party. It was under the charge of a brilliant, cultivated, charming man, with the auspicious and prophetic name of Wilson, a college professor, a native of Virginia, a man undoubtedly of noble aspirations for the good of the whole country, but, as we Republicans thought, with erroneous theories on the tariff and with some sectional prejudices. On the day when the bill passed this House there was the most open exhibition of excited enthusiasm I have ever witnessed here, and that Mr. Wilson was borne about this Hall on the shoulders of some of his younger supporters, among whom I remember the stalwart form of the present dignified Secretary of State, amid the cheering of the Democratic side. But that was the last enthusiasm the Wilson bill ever evoked, and the only cheers it ever occasioned afterwards were the cheers that rang throughout the whole United States for its repeal. It went from this House to the Democratic Senate, where it was mangled and tortured into that form of perfidy and dishonor in which it was finally presented to the world as a bastard, the Democratic President refusing to authenticate it by his name.

I wonder if the analogies which are so striking in the early stages of this bill will continue to the close. That no one will know for months and perhaps years. But I am ready to admit that this bill in its present form, despite its numerous inconsistencies, goes far to carry our Democratic theories and fulfill Democratic pledges and gratify the reliable Democratic States. And if it becomes law I am ready to wait and stake the future of the two parties on its results. If, as they promise, it reduces the cost of living without lowering the scale of wages or exterminating and banishing great industries, I will admit they were right and we were wrong. I am ready for the test. And I am also ready to admit that the former Wilson bill came into the world under most unfavorable circumstances, while present appearances indicate that for this bill the industrial and financial condition of this country and the world will be most auspicious.

And so recognizing that this bill is a fair exponent of the Democratic theory and will test the antagonistic principles of the two parties, we can only await with patience and fortitude its results. Accidents of trade, of crops, of financial stringency, or business depression in Europe, of peace or war may accelerate or retard its natural effects, but they are sure to reveal themselves, and the country is sure to feel and to judge them. For that verdict we Republicans can afford to wait. If they have discovered a magical method of furnishing the consumers cheaper goods while keeping the producers busy at higher wages, we will all join in applauding their success. But if they do not materially cheapen the cost of living, or accomplish it only by such importations of cheap goods as close our mills and drive our workmen into idleness, then all will join in punishing them for their failure.

I do not mean to enter upon any general discussion of the evils of this bill. It would take too long and has been done most satisfactorily by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. I stand upon the broad Republican ground that a tariff should give protection to all the productive enterprises of every section of the country sufficient to enable them to cope successfully with the cheaper labor of other nations. The amount of protection should be measured by the difference of labor cost, so that our high standard of wages may be maintained. I believe that conditions have so changed that the old Republican theory of protection is outworn and obsolete and must be modified, and I think if we had recognized and admitted this earlier the Republican Party would stand better to-day. Formerly the main object was to make sure that the protection was high enough, and if it chanced to be unnecessarily high, so that all foreign competition was absolutely prohibited, no harm was done, for domestic competition could be relied upon to keep down prices and prevent exorbitant profits. But since the development of trusts and large combinations, which annihilate domestic competition, it has been important that the duties should be so scientifically arranged that they would be just high enough to prevent large foreign importations when domestic prices were reasonable, but would encourage foreign importers to be keen competitors of American producers if they attempt to raise prices so as to obtain exorbitant profits.

Because of these changed conditions the Tariff Commission has become valuable and indispensable to study for us thoroughly the industries, both abroad and at home, and give to the framers of tariff laws the exact facts on which they can base the rates and meet the modern necessities. Of course, prices are constantly fluctuating, both here and abroad, and it will be impossible to fix all duties so that they will exactly and permanently equalize the labor costs of different nations; but to approximate that should be the aim of every Republican tariff law, and an impartial, judicial, nonpartisan tariff commission, like the one which the Democratic Party has just abolished, is a necessary step toward that goal. The Democratic Party scorns the assistance or judgment of such a nonpartisan commission. They do not pretend or attempt to fix duties so as to equalize labor conditions or prices. They aim to raise revenue only, regardless of the effect on our producers. And having no universal standard, they naturally fall into favoritism and sectionalism.

The country has come to believe that the Republican tariff was too high; that it unreasonably increased the cost of living; that large interests were unduly instrumental in framing it and reaped undue profits from its protection. It is useless now to discuss the merits of this popular criticism, because the Republicans in Congress have now committed themselves to a course which in the future prevents a repetition of any such suspected abuses. The new Republicanism has pledged itself to a scientific tariff, based upon the report of a nonpartisan tariff board of experts. That raises the simple issue of protection between the two parties. Do the people want a tariff bill like this, which avowedly disregards in fixing duties the difference in labor cost here and abroad and has no rule or standard except revenue tempered by favoritism and sectionalism, or do they want a scientific, impartial, business tariff of protection? I have little doubt which the people of my district will prefer. This bill injures seriously too many local industries to become popular there. Scattered throughout New England are innumerable small factories which will find existence a struggle under this law, and I apprehend danger for even some of the largest.

Close to my home is a striking example of the inconsistency and sectional favoritism of this bill. The Ludlow Co. makes, among other things, bagging, which is used to cover bales of cotton. The duty on it now is only six-tenths of a cent per square yard, which is only 10 per cent ad valorem—an extremely low duty. Its main foreign competitors are in Calcutta, where the jute of which it is made grows, and where laborers are paid from $1 to $3 per month, working 81 hours per week. If there is any industry which needs protection it would seem to be this, which must import its raw material and its machinery and compete with the cheapest labor in the world superintended by Englishmen and equipped with the same machinery. Their protection is now only 10 per cent, so small that Calcutta bagging now comes in and supplies about a quarter of the market and pays a revenue to our Treasury. It would seem there need be no change there. It would seem that both under the Republican theory of protection and the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue this small duty should be maintained. But this bill strikes off all duty in order that the southern planter may hope to save 3 or 4 cents on the covering for each bale of cotton, which is worth from $50 to $75. They take away all protection, they take away all revenue, they annihilate a flourishing industry in order that the southern planter may have the advantage of Calcutta labor and save a few cents, though even that will be short lived, for when the Indian manufacturer has gained a monopoly of the market he will have no consideration for the southern planter, there will be no American competition, and up will go the prices. It seems to me a barefaced and short-sighted attempt to save money for the planter of the South at the expense of the manufacturer of the North.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will permit, does not the gentleman think that the cotton planter of the South ought to have his bagging and ties free as much as for the farmer of the West to get his binding twine free?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, that is not a fair comparison.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why should not they be treated alike?

Mr. GILLETT. There was never any binding twine imported, so free binding twine has never made any difference.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does it not affect the price?

Mr. GILLETT. Not a particle. When binding twine was put on the free list there had not been any importations of binding twine for years. It was apparent that the tariff was prohibitory and it was put on the free list. What was the result? Still there were no importations of binding twine. Apparently there was not any made that could compete with us, even without a duty, and from that day to within a very few years there was no competition on binding twine and it could well afford to have that duty taken off.

Recently there has been a little importation, and from whom? Has it come from countries like India, where labor is employed at 50 cents a week? Why, no. The only place that binding twine has been imported from is the only country that I think we do not need to have any protective tariff against—from Canada. And it was produced there, I presume, simply because the agricultural-implement industry moved over there from the United States, and in that connection they made binding twine and sometimes dumped their surplus into the United States. So that has no analogy at all. It differs from this in the fact that when that was put on there was no importation of binding twine, whereas now in cotton bagging there is an annual importation of 20 per cent of all that is used, and the only nation that ever has made binding twine in competition is a nation where the standards of labor and living are almost like those in the United States, and not, as in the case of cotton bagging, so low and inferior that no one will pretend that there can be equal competition between us.

There is another factory in my district which is likely to be closed by this bill. It manufactures celluloid or fiberloid. That is an invention of American brains. Later it was taken up and our machinery was copied in Europe. It has had a high protective tariff, under which it has prospered. I think the duty has been unreasonably high, but there has been keen competition among the American manufacturers and prices have been much reduced and have steadily trended downward. This bill has lowered the duty from about 75 per cent to 15 per cent, a rate at which we can not compete with German and French labor, and at the same time, as if this was not enough, a duty has been laid on one of its main ingredients, camphor, which is admitted free in the other countries. So you increase the duty on the raw material and take off three-fourths of the duty from the finished product. Moreover, the industry has just been introduced in Japan and a superb plant, costing a million dollars, has been completed there, equipped with the best American machinery, built by American architects, and American mechanics have been taken over there to superintend it and train the cheap Japanese labor to compete with us—with only 15 per cent duty.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman kindly yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman that the chief competition in articles of celluloid comes to-day from France and Germany.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And, leaving out of account this question of the future competition with Japan, the rate of 15 per cent ad valorem in our bill on the moderate kind of celluloid articles represents exactly the difference that the manufacturers here pay for their materials of manufacture as compared with foreigners.

Mr. GILLETT. It represents no difference as to the difference of wages paid.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; we do not take that into account; they have been competing in that respect heretofore, but in material the 15 per cent exactly balances the French and German cost.

Mr. GILLETT. Then the purpose of the committee was to put us on an exact par with them in the cost of materials of which the celluloid is made and not take into account at all the difference in wages.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In other words, to put our manufacturers on a competitive basis with the foreign manufacturers.

Mr. GILLETT. I am very glad to know that is the project—that they shall absolutely have no protection at all, but are simply put on an equal footing. That is what you mean by a competitive basis. That is exactly the theory which I supposed this bill was founded upon; it is the theory of free trade, and with that theory you will, I believe, wipe out this factory of ours, for the cheaper wages of Germany and France can easily undersell us; and with this new plant in Japan it will be but a short time, with their cheap labor, when Germany and France will also be driven out of our market.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman courteously yield again?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is difficult for anyone to foretell what the Japanese may or may not do.

Mr. GILLETT. I recognize that.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think it is fair to say up to the present time their labor has been cheap only in the amount of wages paid, but it has been very expensive labor in the cost of the product they turn out.

Mr. GILLETT. This new plant, which is about ready to start, will test the justice of the gentleman's expectations; and I think this extreme reduction of the duty on fiberloid or celluloid and the avowed purpose to cut off all protection against the different cost of labor in Germany or France or Japan is characteristic of this whole bill and stamps it as a free-trade experiment.

It was expected that this bill would provide an income tax, but I think many of the original supporters of such a tax will be grieved by the use made of it here. It was advocated as a tax to be reserved for cases of great emergency, and yet now $70,000,000 are to be raised by it in a period of profound peace and unexcelled prosperity in order that salutary protection may be taken away from some of our industries. I criticize, too, the provision exempting from tax all incomes under $4,000. The great majority of our people never hope to have $4,000 a year, and they would be glad, if they could be assured of that income, to pay a liberal tax on it to the Government. But by making the limit of exemption much smaller, say $1,000, a most important and desirable result could be attained. Then every one who earned over a thousand dollars a year would have a direct, personal, and keen interest in the expenditures of the Nation. I do not care how small the tax—let it be a half of 1 per cent, which would 50 cents on an income of $1,100 and $5 on an income of $2,000—but let it rise and fall with the expenditures of the administration. If the administration was economical, the tax would be only five on two thousand, but with increasing expenditures the tax would have to be increased. Then for the first time every citizen with an income over $1,000 would have a personal interest in Government expenses. Then would be brought to the notice of each man what kind of housekeeping there was at Washington. To-day the ordinary voter is entirely ignorant and indifferent as to the expensiveness of the administration. The taxes are indirect; he does not feel that he is paying them, and as long as his locality gets what it wants he is regardless of what may be wasted in other localities. A Congressman is praised in proportion to the national money he gets spent in his district, and the more extravagant he is the more popular. An honest zeal for economy means to him only a loss of votes. I recently heard a Congressman say that if he wished to be popular he would vote against every tax and and in favor of every appropriation. Under such conditions you can not expect economical results. The Nation needs sorely some device to excite in the ordinary citizen a study of national expenditures. Nothing would accomplish it so effectively as imposing on him a small income tax, which should vary according to the amount the Nation spent.

There never was a time when such a device was more needed than just now. One of the most marked and obvious developments of recent years has been the enlarged scope of the activities of the National Government, and the subject has been debated as incessantly as such an interesting phenomenon deserves, and I do not intend to add my comments to the general discussion. Being by tendency a Federalist, I see nothing disquieting or alarming in most of the new features of Federal power. But there is one phase of the situation or trend which is seldom mentioned, but which, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, has attracted my attention and concern, and that is its effect upon our national expenditures. I do not mean so much the expense of these new activities—though in some cases that is vast enough—but I mean more the constantly growing and unchecked and endless expense which results and will result from the new attitude of the people toward the National Treasury.

I doubt if there is any phase of the new Federalism where the growth is more prodigious or to me so appalling as here. The people seem of late to be learning to look on the Federal Treasury as a vast reservoir from which they can draw endlessly without exhausting it, and which will be kept full without any burden on them. Consequently, each person's interest and constant endeavor seems to be to get for himself and his neighborhood as large a share as possible of this free and gratuitous outflow.

Such a state of mind on the part of our constituents is dangerous in several ways. It is demoralizing in the same way that gambling is demoralizing to the individual, by inducing the belief that work and industry and self-sacrifice are superfluous, that wants can be gratified without effort, and that it is not honest exertion alone that is rewarded, but that there is an easy way by which the same reward will fall in your lap without struggle or self-denial; that there is a father of boundless wealth who can gratify all your wants without expense to you and that self-denial and economy are as superfluous as they are inconvenient.

Nothing is so fatal to industry and enterprise as such a feeling. It is most unfortunate for man or nation to learn to rely for success on anything except his own steady effort. Yet such a feeling is spreading all over the country.

And the people seem to be learning to believe not only that Federal laws make prosperity but that they keep the Treasury full without expense to them, and that the special occupation of each Congressman should be to decide how that Treasury can be emptied with most direct benefit to his locality. The very immensity of our country makes such a belief and habit dangerous. It is impossible for different sections to understand the comparative needs and claims of each other. Their knowledge of conditions is not accurate enough to give them a sound basis for judgment, and there is not enough mutual sympathy and acquaintance to make them fair-minded in their decisions, so that there is a constant struggle of each to obtain all that it can; and this, of course, leads to combinations, mutual concessions, and shameless logrolling, all of which add expense and outlay to the Nation.

The fact that our national taxation is largely indirect and its burden unfelt by the mass of the people increases this tendency and encourages the desire to enlarge the national activities and divert, as far as possible, burdens from the State and municipality to the Nation.

And so an administration can rush into expenses beyond its income without incurring that severe rebuke which would be sure to follow if the people had to directly open their purses to make good the deficiency. The only check here is the impending disgrace of a bond issue. In England an administration whose expenditures exceeded its income by $20,000,000 would be thrown out of power as incompetent and extravagant, and yet we allow our expenses to exceed our income by $100,000,000 and the people, instead of being disturbed and rebuking us and demanding a stricter economy, clamor loudly for still larger outlays and are heedless of the deficit.

England raises the bulk of her revenue by permanent taxes which require no action by Parliament from year to year; but in order to adjust the income closely to expenses certain taxes are voted only a year at a time, and the rate is raised or lowered according to the necessities of the year. For many years the only taxes so treated were the income tax and the tax on tea, but recently beer, tobacco, and spirits have been included in the same class. These are all taxes which the people feel at once, which they fret under and wish to be relieved of, and will only endure when satisfied of their necessity; and so the popularity of the administration is always concerned in their reduction, and there is a constant stimulus toward economy.

England needs such a stimulus less than we do because she has a tremendous influence for economy in the fact that no appropriation can be made except when recommended by the Crown, which means by the ministers. Parliament can reduce expenditures below the estimates of the ministry but can never increase them. This gives vast power to the ministry and is a prodigious buffer against extravagance.

We see too often in our appropriation bills illustrations of the danger pointed out by Lowell in his work on the Government of England, that "expenditures directly caused by the irresponsible action of private members may originate in personal or local feeling, and then be adopted through heedless good nature or skillful logrolling." I think we should do well to borrow from the longer experience of England and have a purely revenue tax like this which the people would directly and keenly feel, which would move up and down automatically with the condition of the Treasury, and which would act as a constant admonition to the administration and the party in power to be thrifty and economical.

This income tax would fulfill those conditions if it applied to all incomes over $1,000. As provided in this bill, no one with an income less than $4,000 is reached by it, and consequently less than one-half of 1 per cent of the people pay it or feel it, and its effect in awakening an interest in economy among the people is insignificant. For that reason I hope the bill will be amended, and a small tax imposed on incomes between $1,000 and $4,000, and thereby the interest of a great and influential body of citizens will be aroused in national taxation and a wholesome change will be initiated in the attitude of the American people toward national expenses.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me this afternoon I am going to talk to an item in the free list of the proposed tariff bill involving an industry of much importance to the State of Washington.

In passing, however, I wish to observe that to the new Members on the floor of the House there have occurred some interesting incidents that have added just a little zest and interest to the proceedings. We have been highly entertained the past few days by the efforts of the two old parties in their endeavor to parade the legislative inconsistencies of the opposing forces.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, opening the debate last Tuesday on the Republican side, partially stated a fact when he said in effect that the downfall of the Republican Party was due in a large measure to the self-centered egotism of the men in control—men who had become intoxicated with power acquired by long continuance in office, and who, through disregard for the demands of the people generally, had caused an unrest and resentment on the part of the people which resulted in defeat for the Republican forces at the polls in the recent election. He might have gone further, indeed, and said that the same arrogant disposition of the men at the head of affairs in this Nation was supported by a silent and unseen influence which held in its greedy fingers the reins governing political and legislative action.

It was this silent influence which, in some localities in this country, exploited men, women, and children in certain industrial centers that other men and combinations of men might reap unearned and dishonest riches.

It was this silent influence that brought about a condition where one man of vast wealth disregarded the demands of the Congress of the United States and refused to appear before its committee.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in glowing terms of praise, referred to the gentleman from New York as the master American mind in the science of tariff, and probably rightly so, and then proceeded to explain that this man in whom the country had much confidence was outvoted in the Ways and Means Committee and forced to give his name to a bill that he did not wish to father, but which he finally accepted and, out of deference to his confrères "complained not."

The conclusion is that the arrogant mind of powerful forces overrode the judgment of the tariff expert, resulting in dissipation and ruin to the Republican Party.

I take it, sir, that the other side of the House will agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House, demonstrated by the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, are still of the opinion that the tariff problem is a local proposition.

In the district in which he resides he finds it convenient to place the raw material on the free list and a duty on the finished product, inconsistent with the conclusion that in the West the raw material should be taxed and the finished product free. Iron ore to the Bethlehem Steel Co. free; their finished product taxed. Wheat and cattle to the western miller and butcher taxed, but flour and dressed beef free.

The gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have frequently referred to the Progressive forces, here represented, as misled enthusiasts, following the lead of one man. The Progressive forces are aware that in the recent campaign their party was headed by a man who is the greatest constructive genius produced by this or any other country in this generation. The Progressive forces are graced by the men who are recognized leaders in the thought and action of American life.

American history, speaking from its thousands of pages, proclaims that the potential force back of every great movement is not the councils or assemblies of men, but the earnest purpose and dynamic force within the heart and mind of one or a few men.

But, Mr. Chairman, limited time demands consideration of the tariff relative to the shingle industry.

In considering the effect of the tariff bill now presented by the Ways and Means Committee on the red-cedar shingle industry I submit that while the red-cedar shingle industry is a comparatively small factor in the commerce of the United States, it is an industry that means much to the people of the State of Washington, and particularly that portion of the State lying on the Pacific coast west of the Cascade Mountains. About 68 per cent of the entire quantity of shingles manufactured in the United States are manufactured in this territory, and within the next few years the shingle industry of the United States will be pretty largely confined to the Pacific coast, since the white cedar of the Central States and the cypress of the Southern States is being manufactured into lumber products bringing greater returns to the operators. There are 410 shingle mills operated in the State of Washington, having a yearly capacity of 45,000 carloads. You note that I use the word "capacity" and do not mean the output. These mills employ about 15,000 men, over 99 per cent of whom are white men eligible to citizenship in the United States.

The shingle industry is one of the largest industrial factors in western Washington. When the shingle mills are running and employees are kept in steady employment the merchants have no occasion to complain of poor conditions. But when the shingle mills of western Washington are closed down the effect is immediately felt by practically every commercial line in the State. Taking up the features of the independent shingle mill—that is, the mill that is not combined with the lumber-producing mill—the great bulk of raw material used in the manufacture of shingles is composed of short, broken, and refuse cedar. As a matter of fact, many of the mills to-day through the country, built at a cost of a few thousand dollars—and there are many of them—are a large factor in helping to develop logged-off lands of western Washington. The man who owns a few acres of logged-off land and wishes to develop it finds it to his advantage to have a market for his picked-up shingle timber in a local mill, for he not only spends his time in converting this rough stuff into shingle bolts, but at the same time finds that the stumpage price he gets for this material gives him a very good day's wage in connection with his labor, for realizing $1 a cord stumpage, together with $1.50 for labor involved in cutting a cord of shingle bolts, he finds that he can earn better wages than he could get from day labor working in an industrial center and away from his family. And further, every stick of broken and refuse timber that is taken by this method from his land helps to improve the land and put it in a condition where it is less expensive to clear for dairying and agricultural purposes.

The majority of shingle mills in western Washington are mills that take this kind of material. Under the present law we have a 50 cents per thousand duty on shingles. Previous to the Payne-Aldrich bill we had a duty of 30 cents per thousand. At the hearings before the committee it was proved to the satisfaction of the members that 30 cents was not a sufficiently high duty to put the Washington manufacturer on a working basis with the British Columbia manufacturer.

The labor conditions in the shingle mills of western Washington are as wholesome and as satisfactory as are to be found in probably any industry in the country, and the average shingle weaver is an expert in his line, giving the best possible service and demanding a high scale of wage. They demand and receive a high scale of wage, and are entitled to it from the expert workman's standpoint.

The mills while in operation are generally run under high tension and at full capacity, and the shingle weaver who meets the demands of his occupation realizes that he is in hazardous work.

Out of the 15,000 men employed in the shingle industry in the State, there are thousands of men whose hands bear evidence that they are employed in a hazardous industry. There is probably no class of men who have a finer regard for their responsibility to the men who employ them than the employees in the shingle industry.

The amount of money involved in the raw material in a thousand shingles is about 20 cents. Putting shingles on the free list is not only cutting out the entire value of the raw material, but takes 30 cents off of the labor involved in the production of a thousand shingles. So this bill presents the fact that it is neither the intention of those who have framed the bill to make an allowance for the raw material or to give any protection to the men employed in the labor of producing shingles.

I have previously stated that the capacity of the shingle mills in western Washington is about 45,000 carloads per annum. I will say here that the output of shingles is very much less than that amount, because of the fact that on an average the shingle mills of Washington are shut down several months each year, due to an overproduction of shingles in the United States. With that condition obtaining in our own country there is certainly no demand for the importation of shingles from a foreign country. There is probably no manufacturing line that makes a stronger demand for economy of management than the shingle-manufacturing industry, due to the ups and downs and irregularities of the shingle market.

If a shingle operator could make 20 cents a thousand it would be considered a splendid return for the money invested in his plant. Looking at the matter from this angle, if we would allow 20 cents as the average for raw material and 20 cents for the manufacturers' profit, it would mean that $1.50 to $1.75 would go to labor. There are few industries in the United States where the product gives such a large per cent to labor, and it will appear that the Ways and Means Committee have overlooked the necessity of giving proper consideration to this feature of the shingle industry.

If this bill becomes a law we find the shingle manufacturers of Washington confronted by conditions obtaining in British Columbia which will operate greatly to their disadvantage. From the best authority I have been able to get the shingle mills of British Columbia could produce 50 per cent more shingles than they have produced the last two years, and the only reason that the British Columbia mills, with cheap labor and cheap raw material, have not run to full capacity is the fact that the 50 per cent duty has kept them out of our territory. It has been suggested by those who favor taking the duty off of this product that the Canadian mill operators have already, during the past few years, been shipping shingles into the United States. That within itself is an argument showing that labor and stumpage conditions over there are such as to give them a great advantage over the manufacturers of our own country, and this advantage is due to the cheap labor and stumpage of British Columbia. British Columbia has all the advantages of natural timber resources to be found in the State of Washington, and greater advantages, due to the fact that the shingle manufacturers and lumber manufacturers have not operated in that territory for any great length of time. For hundreds of miles along the coast lines of British Columbia and Vancouver Island are to be found fine stands of cedar timber, with the finest kind of transportation facilities, and stumpage on this timber is much less than the stumpage on a like quality of timber in the State of Washington.

There is already a large number of mills in British Columbia, and with the Underwood tariff bill in effect there is much timber there to furnish raw material for a large number of additional mills.

Only a small portion of British Columbia timber is exported to the United States, and on this that is exported from Crown grant lands there is an export duty of from $1 to $3 per thousand feet. In addition to this, there is a transportation expense and towage amounting to about $1 a thousand feet for bringing these logs from Vancouver to the Puget Sound mills. The logger in British Columbia handling cedar logs would prefer to sell his logs in Vancouver on the British Columbia side at a price of from $2 to $4 per thousand less than he would sell the same quality of logs to the American mill operator and assume the risk of transportation.

This gives to the Canadian manufacturer an advantage averaging 30 cents a thousand added to the difference in labor, which makes the present duty a necessity in order to put the Washington manufacturer on a par with his British Columbia competitor.

Seventy-five per cent of the labor employed in the mills of British Columbia at the present time is oriental, Chinese, Hindu, and Japanese labor, whose methods of living would not appeal to the average white laborer. Their wages are very much less than the employees in the American mills, and the wage earner of Washington is not now and never will be in a frame of mind to accept wages on a par with the oriental.

The cheap-labor factor involved in this matter has been thoroughly presented to the Ways and Means Committee in former investigations of this industry, but I again call the attention of the Members of the House to some of the details. It will be conceded that the natives of India, the Hindu, are British subjects and have a right, under the laws of Great Britain, to enter the Dominion of Canada, providing they can pass the proper medical examination and have in their possession sufficient money at the time of entering to insure them a competency until they have had reasonable time to obtain employment. Twenty-five dollars has been fixed by the officials of British Columbia as a sufficient amount to pass an Asiatic immigrant into the Province. The Chinese are permitted to enter into and work in British Columbia upon a head tax of $500 in each case, after having successfully passed the medical examination. From an economic standpoint it costs $500 to introduce a Chinese workman to employment in British Columbia, and that amount, borrowed at 7 per cent, is equivalent to about 12 cents per working day. While $500 per capita might seem to be a barrier to the entry of these people, it does not operate to keep the Chinese out, for in less than three years, 1907 to 1909, 8,000 Chinamen entered Vancouver, British Columbia.

Under the terms of the treaty of Japan and Great Britain, ratified by the Government of the Dominion of Canada, Japanese subjects have the right to freely enter British Columbia for the purpose of employment. It has been suggested that there is an official understanding whereby only 500 Japanese per annum are to be given passports entitling them to work in the Dominion of Canada. This, or a similar agreement, has been in effect for a number of years prior to 1907, and yet since that time many thousands of Japanese have immigrated into British Columbia, so that at the present time about 80 per cent of the labor employed in these mills is oriental, receiving a much less wage than is paid the American workman—in fact, a wage that any self-respecting American workman would refuse to accept.

These are the relative conditions obtaining in Washington and British Columbia at the present time; but if the Underwood bill becomes a law it is very probable that conditions will be greatly altered in the State of Washington as well as in British Columbia; for there are many men now engaged in the manufacture of shingles in the State of Washington who, under the advantages offered in British Columbia in cheaper timber and cheaper labor, would be forced to retire from business, and naturally they would look for locations in British Columbia, which would result in building up the shingle industry in British Columbia to the detriment of that industry in the State of Washington. As a matter of fact, a number of Americans have already purchased tracts of timber in British Columbia, thus fortifying themselves in the event that shingles are placed on the free list. One shingle operator, who is now employing 130 men in the State of Washington, and who is known as one of the oldest and most substantial shingle operators in the State, personally stated that if the duty was removed from shingles that he would immediately proceed to the erection of a mill in British Columbia, where he would manufacture a tract of timber that he recently purchased. His argument was that the Canadian railroads gave 5 cents a hundred pounds better rate to eastern markets than the American rates, which means the benefit of 8 to 10 cents per thousand. He further stated that the fact that the bolt camp men of British Columbia were receiving less money for their labor was one of the factors that made him decide on this change of location.

Further, he took the position that British Columbia, with her unlimited shore line, bestudded with the best quality of cedar, and accessible ocean shipping facilities, offered an excellent opportunity to the enterprising shingle manufacturer when the Panama Canal opens. In foreign ships, with cheaper freight rates than the American, he could, and would, ship his shingles to all Pacific and Atlantic coast cities, with all the advantages of the open market. Hence it would seem that the anticipated improvement in the shingle industry of the Washington mills caused by the opening of the Panama Canal may not materialize, and our manufacturers will find the competition above referred to.

The shingle industry is a distinct industry from the lumber industry. A man of comparatively small capital can engage in the shingle industry and use his capital in connection with his own labor, and in that way get a good living wage; while the combination lumber and shingle mill takes much capital and, as a matter of fact, those plants are in the hands of men of large means. Many of these lumber manufacturers have large tracts of timber land on the Canadian side, and they offer no opposition to free lumber and shingles. They are in a position where it will do them little injury, but the man with just sufficient means to engage in the shingle industry will be forced to stand the brunt of this free-trade experience. While it may seem to those having the making of this bill in hand that the shingle industry is an item of small importance in the general industrial field, yet it would seem that 15,000 workmen, supporting from 50,000 to 75,000 people, is an item worth while and worthy of the consideration of the men who have the affairs of this Government in hand.

From the standpoint of conservation there may be some argument why lumber should be put on the free list, but there is certainly no argument advocating free shingles that can be sustained. In the early history of the lumber and shingle industry in the State of Washington, the finest quality of cedar was manufactured into shingles, as is practically the case now in British Columbia, but of late years the logged-off lands from which the timber was cut years ago and from which the No. 1 timber was removed, to-day furnishes the raw material for the shingle mill. A few years ago this same material was rolled into heaps and burned in the process of land clearing. And, further, the refuse from the lumber mills which was discarded to the slab pile and the refuse burner is to-day manufactured into shingles, a by-product of the lumber business, thus at the present time making use of material that under less favorable conditions was necessarily wasted. A practical millman knows that it costs more to manufacture shingles from second and third grade material than it does from No. 1 material, and with the duty removed from shingles it is a question whether or not much of this material will not again be destroyed rather than compete with mills on the other side of the line that are cutting better grade material. There does not seem to be a single good reason why shingles should be put on the free list, and it appears to one who is familiar with the business that the Ways and Means Committee has overlooked the significance of the shingle industry.

You are removing the duty on shingles, bringing the American manufacturer into competition with the shingle manufacturer of British Columbia. Your action is entirely to the advantage of the foreign manufacturer, and you are asking and receiving nothing in return. You propose to put shingles on the free list, but on practically everything that the shingle manufacturer buys in the equipment and operation of his plant is a heavy duty.

Schedule C of the Underwood bill provides:

SCHEDULE C.—Metals, and manufactures of.

	Per cent ad valorem.
Earthenware, crockery, dishes	40
Boiler iron	15
Bands	12
Bands coated with zinc or tin	20
Mill shafting	10
Nails	10
Wire rope	30
Anvils	15
Blacksmith's hammers, wedges, tools	10
Bolts, butts, washers	15
Spiral nut locks and lock washers	35
Cast-iron pipe	12
Chains	20
Cutlery	25
Files and rasps	25
Rivets, studs, or steel points	20
Crosscut and mill saws	12
Wood screws	25
Locomotive wheels	25
Steam engines and locomotives	15

Foodstuffs that furnish his bolt and logging camps, in the main, are heavily taxed:

SCHEDULE G.—Agricultural products and provisions.

Cattle, 10 per cent ad valorem.
Horses and mules valued at $200 or less, $15 per head.
Horses and mules valued at more than $200, 10 per cent ad valorem.
Sheep, 10 per cent ad valorem.
Barley, 15 cents per bushel of 48 pounds.
Barley, pearled, hulled, or patent, 1 cent per pound.
Macaroni, 1 cent per pound.
Oats, 10 cents per bushel of 32 pounds.
Rice, cleaned, 1 cent per pound.
Wheat, 10 cents per bushel.

Biscuits and bread, 25 per cent ad valorem.
Butter and butter substitutes, 3 cents per pound.
Cheese and substitutes, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Beans, 25 cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
Eggs, 2 cents per dozen.
Hay, $2 per ton.
Peas, green or dried, in bulk, 15 cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
Split peas, 25 cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
Straw, 50 cents per ton.
Vegetables, not heretofore mentioned, 15 per cent ad valorem.
Dried fruits and berries, 1 cent per pound.

SCHEDULE N.—Sundries.

Harness, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Your economics are based on a strange principle, giving everything to the foreigner and receiving nothing in return. It would appear more reasonable to at least keep the duty on American forest products until such time as the Dominion of Canada removes her export duty, for it would be possible to get logs from British Columbia and from the Dominion of Canada to furnish the raw material for our mills; then we could still continue to operate our mills on this side of the line, and by so doing not only give employment to men now located in their respective localities, but give the mill owner an opportunity to receive the benefit of the money already invested in mill construction in our country. In this connection I quote from a letter received to-day:

If you want to put the hundreds of little shingle mills that give employment to thousands out of business take the tariff off of shingles. It is absolutely a question of living with us that we should be protected, and for at least 50 cents a thousand. We use timber that would be a complete waste were it not for this industry.

In conclusion I submit a copy of resolutions adopted by the International Shingle Weavers' Union of America, in convention at Olympia, Wash., January 4, 5, and 6, 1909:

Whereas during the past 10 years there has been a tariff of 30 cents per thousand on shingles imported by the United States;

Whereas during all this time the imports of Canadian shingles into the United States have steadily increased, have doubled in the last few years, and in the years 1907 and 1908 reached the large total of 8,999 carloads, through which the wage loss to the white workmen in the Washington shingle industry amounted to approximately $1,000,000, or practically $40,000 per month;

Whereas the shingle manufacturers in British Columbia are able to inflict this enormous loss on the wage earners in the Washington shingle industry through the employment of Asiatics, who compose 80 per cent of the working forces in the British Columbia shingle mills, and who accept a very much lower wage compensation and a very much lower standard of living than can the all-white labor of the Washington shingle industry;

Whereas the white wageworkers in the Washington shingle industry have better and higher conceptions of the industrial, social, hygienic, and moral well-being and, realizing the ideals of their race and Nation, have trained themselves to conform to a standard of living in accordance with American ideas of American civilization;

Whereas the increasing imports by the United States of Asiatic-made shingles of British Columbia constitute a menace to American institutions by driving white workmen out of the Washington shingle mills, depriving these workmen of the means to maintain themselves and families, thus lessening the amount of money available to farmers, merchants, and other business men in the United States;

Whereas the wage earners in the Washington shingle mills have been enforcedly idle nearly 12 months during the past 24 months;

Whereas they are, to a great extent, engaged in producing shingles from fallen, fire-blackened, and other cedar that would be otherwise wasted and be a dead loss to the State and to the Nation;

Whereas the first consideration of the United States Government should be the welfare of its own citizens; and

Whereas it is understood that some misinformed people now advocate the reduction of the present tariff of 30 cents per thousand, which is even now an inadequate protection against Asiatic shingles made in British Columbia; wherefore, for these reasons we respectfully and firmly protest against any reduction of the present tariff, and we do earnestly and strongly urge all legislatures to save the industry and to protect our necessary wage interest by fixing an adequate protective tariff against Asiatic-made shingles, a tariff of preferably 50 cents per thousand:

Voted, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each member of the Washington State Legislature, with the request that they memorialize Congress to grant the Washington shingle industry an adequate protective tariff of preferably 50 cents per thousand;

Voted, That the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and United States Congressmen from shingle-manufacturing districts covered by the International Shingle Weavers' Union of America be furnished with copies of these general resolutions.

J. C. BROWN,
President International Shingle Weavers' Union of America.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is recognized. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I was very deeply interested in the address of my standpat friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. It was to me a new performance. I have heard that on some former occasion some Member of the House procured another Member to ask him questions in order to emphasize his speech, but this is the first time I have ever observed that a Member of the House was driven to the necessity of obtaining the services of the reading clerk to ask him questions in order to emphasize his speech. After all, it may be a convenient practice, because it seems to me that a man can better answer questions that he himself writes than he could answer questions asked by some one on the outside. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad, however, to see my Republican friend go in partnership with a Democratic reading clerk for any purpose. [Laughter.] There is but one objection I can find to that performance, and that is that, as the boys back in my district would say, I do not think he "toted fair." I believe he ought to have "swapped work" with the reading clerk and permitted him to answer some questions. Knowing the reading clerk (H. Martin Williams), as I do, I believe if he had done that the speech would have been a much better speech. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I have not made any arrangements with anyone to ask me questions, and I presume that there will be none propounded, so I will content myself with making my own speech unaided.

Mr. Chairman, I realize, as everyone must realize, that the Democratic Party is to-day on trial before the American people as judges, and for the present that party must stand or fall by the verdict rendered.

This bill was prepared by a Democratic committee, revised and approved by a Democratic caucus, will be passed by a Democratic Congress, and signed by a Democratic President. It is an honest and a consistent effort of the Democratic Representatives to fulfill the party's pledges made to the people in the platform upon which a Democratic President and this Democratic House were elected. Personally I did not favor some of the rates fixed, but I believe it is a good bill as a whole, and that it will be beneficial to the country at large. It is a party measure, and as a Democrat I shall vote for it, and am willing to politically sink or swim, survive or perish, as the fortunes of my party shall decree.

There is no question but that a great majority of the people of this country have come to realize that the tariff taxes now imposed, especially upon the necessaries of life, are too high, and that the burdens now borne by the consuming masses are too great. All political parties admit that fact, and all of them have promised to give relief.

The Republican Party in its platform of 1908, in response to a growing demand, even in its own ranks, promised, if successful in that contest, a speedy revision of the tariff. True, the words of the platform were not clear as to the character of the promised revision, but Mr. Taft, the candidate for the Presidency upon that platform and the authoritative spokesman of his party, construed this declaration to mean a substantial downward revision. No intelligent man ever believed that the leaders of the Republican Party intended to have the voters of the country believe that an upward revision was contemplated.

President Taft, after his election, in good faith, as I believe, called Congress together in extraordinary session to carry out the promises of his party. That Congress did pass the so-called Payne-Aldrich law, but instead of revising the tariff downward they made the monumental mistake of revising it upward, thereby violating the promises its platform and its leaders had made to the country, deceiving the voters, and betraying the people who trusted them.

In my opinion, if the Republicans in the Sixty-first Congress had been true to the people and faithful to their promises, Mr. Taft would have had no opposition in his own party for renomination, and would have been reelected and in the White House to-day.

The Democratic Party has for many years contended that the tariff taxes were too high, especially upon the necessaries of life, and promised in its platform of last year that, if successful, they would favor a prompt revision and a reduction of import duties, and thereby lessen the burdens of the toiling masses. In obedience to that well-known party principle, and in fulfillment of our promises made to the people in that campaign, we are here in extraordinary session, called by President Wilson, to redeem our pledges. We should be, and we will be, true to our constituencies and true to the promises we made to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has always been, and now is, a difficult problem to revise and to rearrange the tariff duties upon the 4,000 articles embraced within a general tariff law, as each section and each district represented in this House is anxious to be fairly and justly treated in the reductions made. Of course all Democrats agree, as I do, to the time-honored principle of our party, that all tariff taxes should be levied for revenue only, and not for protection.

Speaking for myself, I may say that I believe that this Government has no right, and ought not to be permitted under the Constitution, to use the taxing power for any other purpose than that of raising revenue to pay the necessary expenses of the Government, and I dare say the framers of the organic law never intended that it should be used for any other purpose. This position is and has long been a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic faith. Still, we know that a tax levied, even for revenue only, when placed upon articles from foreign countries that are imported, and that come into competition with similar articles produced here necessarily carries some incidental protection, and, naturally, every section desires, in the readjustment of rates of duty, to get its fair share of the incidental benefits that must follow the imposition of taxes upon competitive articles from abroad. This bill, I believe, to be, as a whole, reasonable and fair and one that will do but little, if any, injustice to any section of the country, but one that will be of great benefit to the country at large, and especially to the toiling millions, whose only investment is the labor of their hands and who must buy all of their food and clothing.

This bill is not as I would have written it, and doubtless no man in this House would have written it exactly as it is. The able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, has frankly stated that it is not as he would have written it, but I think that we who are Democrats recognize that in preparing the bill the committee has made an honest effort to carry out the principle for which our party stands, and an honest endeavor to fulfill our promises to the people.

The Democratic Party has always favored lower taxes upon the necessaries of life that are required for the comfort, the welfare, and the pleasure of the inmates of our American homes, and have contended that the highest taxes should be placed upon the luxuries of life to be borne by the wealthy, who are better able to bear them. That principle has been followed in this bill and I believe will be approved by the country.

I understand that there has been some alarm felt and expressed because of reductions of tariff duties upon some farm products which are largely produced in Missouri and in the district that I represent, and I desire to speak briefly of some of the provisions of the bill, especially from the viewpoint of my constituents.

The people of that district are as intelligent, industrious, and patriotic as any to be found in this Republic, and as their Representative I shall try to now and at all times look at proposed legislation from their standpoint, as well as to consider the general good of the whole country.

Lumber, corn, meat, hogs, and potatoes are by this bill placed upon the free list, but I am convinced that no country can produce any of these, pay the freight, and sell them in any market in which we sell in competition with us. We export more of these commodities than we import, and so long as we are large exporters of these products the home producer need have little fear of injurious competition from abroad.

The lumber interests in my district are fast disappearing, as our forests have been mostly denuded and timber is rapidly disappearing; but even if this bill should cheapen the price the home builder, the home owner, and the farmers who must buy lumber and building materials far outnumber those who manufacture and sell.

Corn and hogs are not imported into this country now and can not be profitably imported and sold here in competition with the home producers. No protection upon them is necessary, and even if a tariff should be imposed it would be without effect.

Potatoes are not grown to any great extent in my district; only about 100,000 bushels are produced annually, which is not enough to supply the demand for home consumption. The price will probably not be materially affected in Missouri; but even if reduced, it will be to my constituents as a whole not an injury but a benefit.

Meat is placed upon the free list, but the farmers and stock raisers of my district do not sell meat but do sell the live stock. The price of meat in recent years has been relatively too high as compared with the price of cattle and hogs by reason of the packers in the United States being in a combination and the prices fixed and controlled by the Beef Trust. It is hoped and believed that by placing meat upon the free list that it will give some relief to the people of the country, who have been compelled to pay exorbitant prices in the past, without any reference to the price paid to the stock raiser for his cattle and without any benefit resulting to him.

A tax of 10 per cent ad valorem is placed upon cattle, which will be a fair protection to the stock raisers of my district and the entire country against competition from Canada, Mexico, or any of the other foreign countries.

When the reciprocity bill was considered two years ago I made a speech in which I gave as my opinion that even with free trade Canada could not produce wheat, pay the freight to our markets, and sell in competition with our farmers. I believed this statement to be true at that time, and I believe it to be true to-day. But this bill does not place wheat upon the free list, but imposes a duty of 10 cents per bushel upon all importations, and certainly no well-informed man will claim that with a tax of 10 cents per bushel upon wheat that the farmers of Canada or of any other nation on earth can pay that tax for the privilege of bringing their wheat into this country, and pay freight charges in addition, and compete with the wheat producers in any section of this country, and especially in an interior State like Missouri, so far from the Canadian border. The tax of 10 cents per bushel carried in this bill is just as much protection to the farmers of Missouri as the present rate of 25 cents per bushel would be.

There is no industry in the district that I represent that will, in my opinion, be perceptibly affected by the enactment of this bill, but even if, as a result of its enactment, a slight reduction should follow in the prices of some of our products—including lumber, corn, wheat, cattle, meat, and potatoes—the answer is, there are many more people, even in that district, who buy and consume lumber, bread, meat, and potatoes than there are who produce them, and the producers of these products will not lament the fact if the toiling masses should get some relief against the present high cost of living. But even if there should prove to be some reduction in the price of some of the products mentioned, there will be a corresponding benefit to the producers of these commodities in the reduced price of things that they must buy that will more than offset any loss sustained.

This bill places upon the free list and will, we believe, reduce the price of all farm implements, salt, sugar, boots, shoes, and clothing that the farmers buy, which I believe will more than compensate them for any reduction in the prices of the commodities that they produce.

The income-tax feature of this bill is one that has been advocated by the Democratic Party for many years, is approved by the country, and is generally conceded to be equitable and just. We are sometimes told that no punishment should be inflicted upon a man for his thrift. This law is not proposed as a punishment, but for the purpose of equitably distributing the burdens of taxation.

I have a profound admiration for a man who by his industry, his intelligence, and his management honestly accumulates great wealth, but I have a genuine sympathy for the more unfortunate man, who is often as honest and industrious as his prosperous brother, but who, without his fault, by mismanagement or otherwise, has utterly failed in a financial way, and who is not only poor and homeless but compelled to toil for his daily bread.

Paying taxes is not a delightful exercise at best, and no man really enjoys that performance. Some writer of doggerel verse has said:

No one gets all he wants,
And none gets what he axes;
But if he did he'd want the earth
And then growl about the taxes.

I once heard a very important lawsuit argued in the supreme court of my State. The purpose of the suit was to break the will of a testator upon the ground of his mental incapacity to make it. As evidence to sustain this contention it was shown that he in his lifetime used every art known in his day to dodge the payment of taxes. Such a judicial finding as that would reflect seriously upon the sanity of many of our wealthy men and so-called captains of finance of this age of the world.

Taxes are a burden that must be borne by the public in some way. The theory of paying taxes is that we pay for the protection to life and property furnished and guaranteed by the law. Therefore the more property we have to protect the more benefit we get from the law and the more taxes we should pay. This principle is recognized and followed in school districts, cities, counties, and States. In all of these smaller subdivisions of government we pay taxes in proportion to the assessed value of our property; but under the present system no man pays taxes upon his wealth, his lands, his bonds, or his income for the support of the Government, but all taxes for that purpose have been paid by the consumers of the country when they purchased the taxed articles. We have paid taxes, not upon what we had, not according to the benefits received, not according to our ability to pay, but the wealthy have paid taxes according to the amount and value of the taxed goods they elected to buy, and the poor have paid taxes according to the value of the necessaries of life they were compelled to buy. Hence it may be logically asserted that the poor man with a large family has paid more taxes to support the Government than the wealthy man with a small family.

The Democratic Party has long contended that the present system of taxation, standing alone, is neither equitable nor just, and has advocated the enactment of an income-tax law. Such a law was passed by Congress during Cleveland's administration, but was declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. Since that time a constitutional amendment has been submitted by Congress and ratified by three-fourths of the States authorizing the enactment of such a law, and now at the first opportunity offered this Democratic Congress proposes to enact this bill to carry out the policy that the Democratic Party has long favored and advocated.

The proposed law exempts $4,000 to every individual or family and provides for a tax of 1 per cent upon all incomes in excess of $4,000 per annum up to $20,000, with an increasing rate of tax upon incomes up to $100,000 per annum, and upon incomes in excess of that amount the rate is to be 4 per cent.

This tax is, to my mind, the fairest tax ever levied against mortal man, as it places a small part of the expenses of the Government upon the wealth of the country that is best able to pay it and who enjoy the greatest benefits under it. Under this law it is estimated that $70,000,000 per annum in revenue will be realized annually, which will to that extent lessen the taxes now being paid upon other commodities and has made it possible for this Congress in this bill to reduce the tariff taxes upon the necessaries of life that are now used in every home of the land.

This is a good bill and one that I believe to be for the benefit of the whole country and especially for the toiling masses. It is a Democratic bill prepared by Democratic hands proposing to carry out Democratic policies and attempting in good faith to fulfill our promises to our Democratic constituencies. It should and will be promptly passed by this Democratic House. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee and the Democratic Party that we have before us a measure which lifts some of the burdens off of the shoulders of the masses and lets the wealth of the Nation carry a part of its legitimate load—a bill which lifts the tax from the breakfast and dinner table of the unfortunate poor and places it upon the plethoric income of the more fortunate rich.

And right here I want to emphasize what is a fact. I am in favor of this bill not because I am bound by any caucus but for the reason that in the main it represents the sentiment of the people of my State and of my district. My people are dependent upon the products of the soil. Moderate competencies are with them the rule, while swollen fortunes are practically unknown, and they have never been here knocking upon the doors of Congress asking for special favors. For years they have been carrying an unjust portion of the burden of taxation in that everything they had to buy was purchased in a restricted market and at enhanced prices, while everything they had to sell was regulated by the prices in the world's market, and I am here to use my vote and my voice to the end that this burden shall now be more equitably distributed.

Last year I went before my people and advocated free sugar; also announced my full approval of the terms of the Farmers' Free-List Bill passed by the lower House of the Sixty-second Congress. I explained why I was for free meats, free sugar, free farming implements, lumber, and other products. My position was indorsed, and therefore I feel that when my voice is raised in favor of this bill I am but voicing the sentiments of my people.

My State raises sugar beets, and we also have a beet-sugar factory. But when I learned that sugar was shipped from California and Colorado points, the freight rate absorbed by the manufacturer and the product sold in the eastern market at a price lower than that charged the consumer at the point where the sugar was manufactured, it was clear to my mind that an unjust tribute was being exacted. Furthermore, when the testimony was given that the Union Sugar Co. of California, last year paid 100 per cent profit and that on January 6 Colorado beet sugar sold in New York for 4.60 and in Denver for 5.20, I could not help but feel that the Denver consumer was not getting a fair deal.

After evidence had been brought out to show that Colorado beet sugar had been shipped as far east as Pittsburgh, freight to the amount of 80 cents per hundred paid upon it, and then was sold cheaper than it was sold to the Colorado consumer, Mr. F. B. Case, of California, a beet-sugar manufacturer, explained this process, and his explanation is of such interest that I quote it. You will find it on page 2431 of the Tariff Hearings. Mr. Case said:

> Our surplus product must find its market in some consuming community. We therefore ship the sugar which is not consumed at home to the Missouri River, the Mississippi River, Chicago, and as far east as Cincinnati and Pittsburgh. To ship our sugar this long distance requires payment of an excessive freight rate. Were we not permitted to receive more for our sugars at home than we receive in Cincinnati and Pittsburgh we would go out of business entirely.

A more indefensible proposition than this was never advanced. The admission that the home consumer, adjacent to the factory, has no advantage in the facility with which the product is delivered to him and has to pay more than has the consumer 2,000 miles away is a frank confession of pernicious looting, which I believe will be made impossible by this new tariff law.

No one for one moment believes that Colorado or California sugar is sold in the East at a loss. Therefore it inevitably follows that there is a margin of profit in the freight paid and in the difference in price at which the product is sold at home and in the East which would provide ample margin for reduction in selling price to meet new tariff conditions without affecting the price paid the farmer for his beets. Swollen profits would be diminished, but no honest industry would be injured.

A few months ago there came to my desk a circular issued by a banking and brokerage firm of classic Boston, in which a plea was made for a "safe and sane" revision of the tariff. It was pointed out that wonderful prosperity had followed in the wake of the protective policy, and while here and there might be rates which needed a slight adjustment, nevertheless it would be well to not make any radical reductions—it would be better to "let well enough alone."

Naturally I was interested in learning who were the parties who did not want to be disturbed, and in turning over the pages of the literature sent to me I find that the brokerage firm has listed a number of stocks for sale, and the statistics which I propose to give are those quoted by this firm of bankers and brokers.

First, let us take the Draper Co., of Hopedale, Mass., manufacturers of cotton machinery. And in passing I would like to call the attention of our Massachusetts friend, who so much dreads the effect of the new tariff rates, to the fact that even in these prosperous times of Payne-Aldrichism there are serious labor troubles at the Draper plant at Hopedale, just as there were in Lawrence but a short time ago.

And speaking of the situation at Hopedale, I want to call your attention to the following item from the Washington Herald of this morning, which would go to show that the operator who seeks a part of the benefit of Payne-Aldrichism receives bullets as his dole:

> STRIKER KILLED IN FIGHT WITH POLICE.
> HOPEDALE, MASS., April 24, 1913.
> Emilo Dacchiocchia, strike picket, was shot and killed to-day during a battle between the police and the Industrial Workers of the World strikers, a half mile from the Draper mills. The strikers claimed that Dacchiocchia was shot by a policeman. The police refused to discuss the shooting.

The operatives fail to see how any of the blessings of high protection find their way into their dinner buckets.

The Draper Co.—

Says the circular—

> has had a remarkable record. Its distribution during the past 12 years—not including a stock dividend of 50 per cent in 1902—has ranged from 8 to 30 per cent. In the 12 years from 1901 to 1912, inclusive, the company has paid a total of 184 per cent per share, or the equivalent of 15.33 per cent per annum, not including the 50 per cent stock dividend.

No wonder they want "safe and sane" revision which will not disturb their opportunity to make unjust earnings.

Next we have the Queensbury Mills, of Worcester, Mass., manufacturing mohairs, alpaca luster yarn, mohair serges, and alpaca linings. The company has only been in business for 13 years, but, the brokers inform us, the shares of par value of $100 have an actual value of $343, and—we again quote literally—

The Greenwood Mills, which was taken over by the Queensbury in 1907, has, since its merger, averaged an annual income of 12 per cent on its capitalization. During this same period the average annual net earnings of the old Queensbury Mills alone have exceeded by several times the dividend requirements of the preferred stock of the new corporation.

Then we have the Bates Manufacturing Co., of Lewiston, Me. It is capitalized at $1,200,000 and has a surplus of $2,514,831. Annual dividend rate, 10 per cent with occasional extras. Last year its net earnings were 33 per cent of the outstanding stock, and the average dividend for the last eight years was 18.37 per cent. They manufacture quilts, ginghams, damask tablecloths, seersuckers, and dress goods.

The Farr Alpaca Co., of Holyoke, Mass., has paid 24 per cent per annum during the last three years. In 1909 it paid 40 per cent in cash and 100 per cent in stock.

And while we have all been bombarded in the past few months by the makers of hats, who implored us to keep on a heavy duty for protection needed, we find that the John B. Stetson Co. is doing quite well. Here is the dividend record: 1902, 17 per cent; 1903, 20 per cent; 1904, 20 per cent; 1905, 25 per cent; 1906, 25 per cent; 1907, 25 per cent; 1908, 50 per cent; 1909, 25 per cent; 1910, 50 per cent; 1911, 25 per cent; 1912, 50 per cent. An average of 30.2 per cent for the last 11 years, or for every dollar originally invested the plant has paid back $3.32 in the past 11 years.

As to the Dartmouth Manufacturing Co., of New Bedford, Mass., the brokers inform us that "the dividends for the past three years have been 16 per cent per annum. In 1909 the company paid 13 per cent, together with a stock dividend of 100 per cent, and in the two preceding years the distribution has been 66 per cent for each year." This company makes fine cotton goods.

The Berkshire Cotton Manufacturing Co. averaged 20 per cent per annum during the past three years.

The Singer Manufacturing Co., handling over 80 per cent of the world's output of sewing machines, is to be affected by the new tariff legislation, but it probably will survive the shock, as we find that it has declared two stock dividends since 1900, one of 200 per cent and one of 100 per cent, and the cash dividends range from 7 to 40 per cent.

It is no wonder that these beneficiaries of an unjust system desire to be left alone.

I remember in one of my reading books in school in the old days that there was a poem in regard to a vindictive beggar who sat at the roadside and threw a stick or a stone at each passer-by who did not contribute to his earnings. When remonstrated with he assumed an air of injured innocence and asserted that "all he asked was to be left alone." So it seems to be with these beneficiaries of special privilege. They have swatted us right and left for lo, these many years, and now, when it happens that we are in a position to demand fair play, they assure us that "they are quite content, and all they ask is to be left alone."

And now I want to say a few words to our friends on the other side. If you were one-half as solicitous of the farmer when in power as you are when out of it, we would have been much better off. For 44 years you had the power, and during that time what has been done for the farmers whose votes you are seeking now? You have seen where the farmers produced crops which cost the consumers $13,000,000,000, and yet the farmers received but $6,000,000,000 of that amount. It was not until the last session of Congress that any effective action was taken to remedy this condition, and with the coming of the new division of marketing we can see a ray of hope.

Again, you have seen the farmer paying 7, 8, and even 10 per cent for the money needed to develop his little property while his French competitor paid but 4.3 per cent and the other Continental farmers faring equally well, and what have you done about it? It remained for us to reach this day before a start was made to the end that we can establish a system of agricultural credits and secure needed relief. Under a fake system of benefits accruing from protection you have occasionally taken a few sheets of paper from off of the burden carried by the agricultural interests, and at the same time you have dumped into the farmers' load a few leaden weights in the form of swollen profits to accrue to the manufacturers on the things that the farmers had to buy.

I have known what it is to farm, and speaking as the representative of an agricultural district I say to you that what we want is performance and not promise. We have seen immense fortunes built up for the few, but we have also seen the many toiling in order to secure even a bare living, and while we begrudge to no one the benefits gained by thrift and industry, we do protest against a system which concentrates these benefits instead of distributing them.

Again, on that side I have heard occasional reference made to the "bread lines" and the "soup houses," which are predicted by you to result as a consequence of the passage of this legislation. Let me tell you, gentlemen, that but once in Kansas have I seen the "soup house" and the "bread line," and that was on the 19th day of January, 1912, when a Democratic mayor of the Republican capital city had to dig down in his jeans to pay for food to relieve the hunger of the poor unfortunates who had failed to find a full dinner pail under the Payne-Aldrich tariff.

In conclusion I wish to state that I am for this bill because I believe it carries out our platform pledges—it is an unquestioned revision downward.

I am for it because it will ultimately lead to lower prices to the consumer and cheapen the cost of living.

I am for it because it will impel our manufacturers to become more efficient and progressive, and will thus open up to us the markets of the world.

And I am for it because it is a real step toward fair trade, and with it in operation the doors of opportunity will be thrown open to the many while special privilege is curtailed of power and is compelled to carry a due share of the national burden which it has so long avoided. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN].

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in the concluding chapter of the ninth or last volume of Dr. Ridpath's great History of the World the author, after reviewing the struggles and achievements of men and the rise and fall of nations, with the poise and justice of the historian, lays at the doorway of the human race a most terrible indictment, as touching the greed and the avarice of man. Says Dr. Ridpath:

The first and most general truth in history is that men ought to be free. If happiness is the end of the human race, then freedom is its condition. And this freedom is not to be a kind of half escape from thralldom and tyranny, but ample and absolute. The emancipation in order to be emancipation at all must be complete. To the historian it must ever appear strange that men have been so distrustful of this central principle in the philosophy of human history. It is an astonishing fact that the major part of the energies of mankind have been expended in precisely the opposite way—in the enslavement rather than the liberation of the race. Every generation has sat like a stupid image of Buddha on the breast of its own aspirations, and they who have struggled to break their own and the fetters of their fellow men have been regarded and treated as the common enemies of human peace and happiness. On the contrary, they have been saviors and benefactors of whom the world has not been worthy. The greatest fallacy with which the human intellect has ever been beguiled is that the present—whatever age may be called the present—has conceded to men all the freedom which they are fit to enjoy. On the contrary, no age has done so. Every age has been a Czar, and every reformer is threatened with Siberia.

Thus we see that the progress, the evolution, and the partial liberation of the human race from the bondage and the enslavement of those in authority have been accomplished not by the will but over the protest of those who would keep their fellows in servitude.

Typical of this repression of the ambitions and of the aspirations of men has been the smothering of the people in their effort to lift themselves from the slough of ignorance to the table-lands of education and enlightenment, but no more so than the system of heavy taxation that ever stifles and thwarts them in their upward strivings.

It will be impossible, Mr. Chairman, within the short time allotted to me in this discussion to more than hurriedly review the history of American tariff enactments, or to even discuss in detail the various schedules of the pending bill. Therefore, I content myself with reviewing merely isolated contentions of tariff barons in exacting from the masses of the people the heavy toll imposed upon them and the dire consequenses that follow such exactions upon the individuals who pay the toll, as well as arresting the development of a nation's greatness.

In all probability it is well within the memory of the youngest Member upon this floor when the Republican Party claimed first that the tariff was not a tax, but when driven to the wall upon this absurd contention they finally admitted that while it was a tax, yet as an excuse for its imposition they said that the foreigner and not the American paid the tax.

Now, let us analyze the first contention, absurd even as that is. If the tariff is not a tax, it can neither benefit the manufacturer nor hurt the consumer. Therefore, if no one is affected by the tax, why impose it? Why legislate tariff acts if the tariff is not a tax? Why encumber the books with tariff enactments? Why keep a lobby constantly in Washington at great expense if the tariff is not a tax and no one is to profit thereby?

But the high protectionists finally admitting that the tariff is a tax, and asserting that the foreigner pays the tax as a justification for its existence, let us analyze in the second place that absurdity.

Surely, if a tax and the foreigner pays it, this should not affect the American consumer, as the foreigner is not only benevolent, but becomes a philanthropist and lifts the tax from the American consumer and pays it, that the American manufacturer may thrive and prosper.

The late James G. Blaine, as I now recall, was one of the first high priests of protection to admit that the American consumer paid the tax. Upon his return to the United States from Florence, Italy, where he had been sojourning for several months in quest of health, he entered vigorously into the presidential campaign of 1888 in behalf of Mr. Harrison, and gave utterance to this strange and paradoxical statement: That while the tariff was a tax and the American and not the foreigner paid it, yet the tax was so deftly collected that the American consumer did not feel it; thus giving evidence that the Republican Party was not only the greatest aggregation of confidence men in the country, but by a system of shoplifting and legerdemain had become the most successful freebooters and kleptomaniacs that ever infested a civilized community. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, ordinarily, we might not advert and give time to such an absurd and staggering statement as this, were it not for the fact that Mr. Blaine at that time and for years had been the most stupendous figure and the popular idol of his party. But let us analyze even this statement, and see if it will bear the light of reason.

A tax paid by the American, and yet so deftly collected that the American could not feel it when paid. How strange! How utterly strange!

Suppose that Mr. Blaine, upon leaving his hotel in Italy, had on his person $500 in money, which amount was only sufficient to liquidate his hotel bill and to buy his passage upon the boat to his American home, and yet before the payment of his hotel bill and the purchase of his ticket, some pickpocket chanced along and lifted the purse of the Plumed Knight so deftly that this great Republican did not feel it at the time; but I venture to assert that when the time came to pay his bill and to buy his ticket he would have been short of the wherewithal to meet his obligation, whether the pickpocket was either deft or crude in filching from him the coin of the realm.

But another great Republican statesman later gave utterance to a similar and no less anomalous statement. Mr. McKenna, a Republican Representative from California, and now a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, and at page 4992 of the RECORD, while discussing the McKinley bill, used this language:

> The important thing is not that the tariff is a burden on the individual.

And, consistent with all high protectionists, the tariff has never been a burden to the individual nor to the poor. Continuing, Mr. McKenna says:

> It is not a burden on him, not because it is indirect, but because he does not feel it, or if so, he feels it as the horse feels his rider, not burdened by him, but encouraged by him and animated to swifter flight and to victory in the race.

This great statesman and jurist, whom we all honor for his much learning, says that the important thing about the tariff is not that it is a burden upon the unfortunate man who has the tax to pay, and affirms that it is not a burden on him not because he says it is indirect in its collection, but because the Government employs its subtle hands as a kleptomaniac and takes the money not openly and fairly and squarely by presenting a bill of particulars, nor collects it even as decently as the highwayman who lies in ambush in the dark of the night, sandbags the wayfarer, and robs him of his purse.

The Democratic Party maintains, sir, that no duties levied upon importations are warranted by the Constitution, except for the purpose of carrying on the functions of government economically administered. Mr. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says:

> A tax on imports, the purpose of which is not to raise revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacture, may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles.

But once the thin edge of the wedge of high protectionism having entered into the body of taxation, it has been constantly driven to its very head by those who sought and who have become its beneficiaries.

The heavy expenses growing out of the Civil War made it necessary—

> For the establishment of heavy internal-revenue taxation, and along with it the imposition of correspondingly heavy customs duties, primarily designed to place domestic producers upon a basis of equality with foreign producers, who would otherwise have had the advantage owing to the burden of domestic taxation under which the home producers were laboring—

Says the report on the present bill.

So this was the excuse, and justifiably so under the peculiar circumstances, for the imposition of tariff duties. But the Civil War closed nearly a half century ago and the burdens of taxation have been increasing with the years, while American energy and American opportunity which, would otherwise conquer the world commercially, have been stifled and repressed with the resultant that the consumers have paid exorbitant prices for manufactured articles and American employment has been limited and restricted. Surely it is now high time that the war taxes of 50 years ago should be lopped off and that the handcuffs that bind American prowess should be broken.

> The land was doubly taxed we thought,
> To carry on the war;
> Now war to a period has been brought,
> Still more the taxes are.
> Strange conduct this, all must allow;
> Hush! Let your murmurs cease,
> We pay the double taxes now
> To carry on the peace.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Perhaps the tyranny of unnecessary taxation has never been more concretely expressed than in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch against State of Maryland (Wheaton's Reports IV, p. 327), when he said:

> An unlimited power to tax involves necessarily a power to destroy, because there is a limit beyond which no institution and no property can bear taxation.

And again this maxim of the law is made as tersely, perhaps, by Justice Miller (U. S. Sup. Ct. in Loan Assn. v. Topeka, 20 Wallace, 657). This distinguished jurist says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms.

So we have, Mr. Chairman, these two startling indictments made by the Supreme Court of the United States and laid at the very doorway of the Republican Party, and yet in the face of this indictment and with the protests that have been raised by an impatient and groaning tax-burdened people the Republican Party would continue to raise all taxes, perpetuating under the guise of law a system of robbery by exploiting the people's substance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

> In vain we call old notions fudge,
> And bend our conscience to our dealing,
> The Ten Commandments will not budge,
> And stealing will continue stealing.

Perhaps there has never been a greater protectionist than the late Charles Henry Carey, who upon one occasion said that he verily wished that the ocean were a flame of fire, in order, I suppose, that the ships which sail from this land to that, and which act as it were like the "shuttles of the loom, weaving the web of concord among the nations," might be consumed upon a sea of conflagration. And yet we have in this House today not a few Members who in a measure indorse the sentiments of Mr. Carey. The venerable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], during the tariff debate two years ago, said from his place upon this floor that the tariff could never get too high for him.

The present system is not only archaic and obsolete, if we are to set our faces toward the rising and not toward the setting sun, but is out of harmony with all true progress of the day.

One of the greatest fights that was ever witnessed in the British Parliament was the struggle to overcome and repeal the corn laws, which were made especially for British aristocratic landlords, and with the repeal of the corn laws English tariff restrictions were generally modified and England at once leaped forward, and by a system of freer trade relations conquered the world commercially.

The recent efforts of the Chamberlains, the Bonar Laws, and the Arthur Balfours, backed by the wealth and the aristocracy of England, for the past 10 years have failed to turn back the hands of the clock of progress. The recent contest in behalf of tariff reform in England—tariff reform there meaning the opposite of what it does here and a return to higher tariff protection instead of reduction of tariff duties—has been unavailing, though led by some of the most resourceful and astute statesmen of the British Parliament. England has perhaps never been so much agitated concerning her trade relations, and especially concerned about her safety from sanguinary and hostile attacks of her neighbor across the North Sea, as she is to-day. The tariff on imports with preferential duties to her over-sea dominions has been the watchword and slogan of the Unionist Party for quite a dozen years.

England has succeeded in linking her daughter lands to her as though with hoops of steel, and with all the clamor and the protestations on the part of the Unionist Party for a still closer attachment in the way of preferential and discriminating tariff duties between the mother country and her over-sea lands the English people will not forsake their one great principle that has made their country not only the invincible mistress of the high seas but carries her commerce triumphant into every port and makes the seas white with British sails.

So, Mr. Chairman, we must not be content with the markets we have, but we must break the shackles and manumit American commerce, and with American skill, American ingenuity, and American activity conquer the world commercially.

We are living in a strange and in an unusual time. There is no place for the laggard, and there must be no place for the pampered favorite who is clothed and hothoused by American protection. The world to-day thinks and speaks in continents and not in sections or segments. There are to-day but 8 great nations and less than 20 great surviving tongues of the many hundreds that murmur their babble here and there.

The sensory arteries of commerce and of trade are so acute, girdled by rail and circumventing the earth by electrical wires, that the smallest incident affecting a single community may be felt and grow into transcendent importance in the remotest part of the world. We can not afford to let slip the opportunity to be in the vanguard of the great struggle that lies in the immediate beyond. Blessed by a country remote from the antagonisms and jealousies of European lands, already burdened beyond endurance with military and naval armaments, overcrowded populations, restricted opportunities, and narrowed states—isolated as we are, I say, with no neighboring jealousies or bickerings to confront and embarrass us, we should stand first in commercial supremacy upon the completion of the first half of the twentieth century.

Our great neighbor to our north, a field promising with the outlook of opportunity, is anxious to receive the products of our factories in the making of the Canadian Government pregnant with the possibilities of the years to come, while the Central and South American States, an empire infinitely larger than our own, yet await the magic touch of America's hand to open the door of hope and progress there. The great Panama Canal, the product of American money and American genius, at a cost to us of nearly $500,000,000, is yet to prove a short cut and a gateway not only to the continent lying south of us, with illimitable opportunities, but affording us a quicker route to the Orient and to the industrial and commercial development of both Japan and China.

Our protective duties are many times higher than they were a century ago, while this country was yet an infant and in its swaddling clothes, for we have excluded imports, restricted competition, lessened efficiency, dulled our wits, and have produced monopolies, combinations, and trusts. If high protectionism is a panacea for our ills, its beneficence should be generally diffused and widespread; otherwise it can not justifiably have any place in our economic life.

Any great American system should stand for the virtues and not for the vices; for the extension of the horizon and not for the circumscribing of our visions; for the uplift and not the depression of the people, giving equality to all men alike and special privilege to no men; for the breaking of the shackles that bind the feet of progress; in short, that man himself, free, unhampered, with his face to the rising and not to the setting sun, may have as his conquest the wages of his energy and the fruit of his legitimate skill. This must have been the vision of the early patriots of this Republic in their dreams and concepts of a nation's greatness.

But has the present system produced such opportunity or given equality to all alike? Do not our industrial centers bear evidence of the pauperized myriads of human beings wrecked in health, depleted in stature, hopes blasted, ambitions thwarted, and over whose heads hang the lowering clouds instead of the sunlight of opportunity and equality? And what is the resultant? For every Dives, wrapped in luxury, living in his palace of marble and of gold, there lies at the rich man's gate a Lazarus, aye, hundreds of paupers who have been denied the crumbs that fall from the protectionist's table. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Nothing but our richness of natural resources has prevented or delayed even worse conditions. It is not protected largess which the people want; they want only justice—simply free and exact justice. The American laborer, both man and woman, has been used up by the highly protected "mill." They and their offspring have gone in the dividends, while their wrecked bodies have been thrown as so much refuse upon the culm bank or junk heap of American industry.

We have allowed our factories, after using up a generation of Americans, to swallow up the incoming immigrant "as if he were the soulless raw material of manufacture," while our hillsides and valleys are untilled and the price of food products empties the market basket.

Our industrial system is out of joint; the premium on factory work must be taken off; the proper economic relation between manufacturing and other lines must be restored. We must encourage agriculture, let efficiency have a chance, break up the controlled relations of our systems of transportation with large manufacturing interests, and maintain the "open door" of industrial success.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, any great system of right should stand the test when the straightedge of justice is applied thereto. Somebody must suffer as a result of high discriminating duties. That the manufacturer prospers by it will not be denied; that the general public has its coffers depleted may not successfully be gainsaid. But the excuse has been that the wage earner, that the factory hand, if you please, has become the beneficiary of high protectionism and that he as well as the manufacturer must not enter into competition with the foreign manufacturer or with the foreign laboring man. The highest schedule in the Payne-Aldrich bill is the woolen schelule, known as Schedule K, of an average protection of 97 per cent upon the various grades of woolen manufactures.

Who shares this profit? How much is given to the man who labors for the woolen mills? The investigation held by a special committee of the last Congress reflects this fact: That at Lawrence, Mass., one of the great woolen centers of this country, where a jargon of 17 languages is heard, the average wage is $7.30 per week, in this age of the high cost of living. And, moreover, sir, in this same community seven people and more were compelled to occupy and sleep in the same little room.

Who is receiving the immense profits arising from the tariff duties on woolen manufactures? The wearers of woolen clothes certainly pay the freight, and I deny that those who labor in the mills share a just proportion of the profits.

What was once a considerable part of our virile citizenship has passed through the "mill"; the result is manifest in the diminished birth rate, in the spread of tuberculosis, deformed bodies, child slavery, overcrowded, disease-breeding factory tenements, and many more of the untoward elements, Mr. Chairman, that should find no place in the growth and life of American citizenship.

The preservation of the race and of our institutions calls for heroic treatment in the amelioration of American factory conditions.

We have, sir, bondholders and masters who have kept in servitude from time to time the sons and daughters of Adam's race. We are reliably informed in a certain Great Book, which I commend to gentlemen on that side of the aisle, that for 40 years a great people seeking their liberty wandered in the Egyptian wilderness, but all this while were the slaves of the Pharaohs, who would not let the people go. This great Egyptian ruler was one of the most pronounced standpatters in all the history of the world. Plague and devastation too numerous to mention here were from time to time visited upon this monarch, but his heart was hard, his neck was stiff, and still he would not let the people go.

The Lord, patient and sometimes angry, continued to accompany the visitations of His wrath by physical evidence of His displeasure, but still Pharaoh would not let the people go. And for more than 40 years the American people have been wandering in the morass of Republican misrule and Republican maladministration. Pride of the past blinded the party, greed led it astray, and unholy alliance with special privilege encompassed its defeat.

Promise after promise had been made that our economic life would be changed; that the door of hope would be opened; that the shackles would be broken and liberty and opportunity again given to those who toil and to those who spin, whose yoke is always heavy and whose burden is never light. But this party and those privileged interests that held the first mortgage upon the sponsors of that party were likewise stubborn, their necks were stiff, and they, too, would not let the people go. And I here declare that the greatest standpatters in the world's history, in my opinion, have been the Egyptian Pharaohs and the Republican priests of high protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The facts of yesteryear are not to determine our course. The glories of Democracy in times past will not settle the economic questions of the present, for as so admirably stated by our great President in his official message before the joint session of the Congress:

We are to deal with the facts of our own day, with the facts of no other, and to make laws which square with those facts.

The American voter has recorded his clear verdict between privilege and the people. Democracy is triumphant. Our plain duty is to record that verdict in the laws of the land by the prompt passage of this bill. Our President, standing, as it were, upon a mountain top viewing with impartial and patriotic eye the mistakes of the past, sounds the clarion note that a change must come if America and her institutions are to keep abreast with these stirring times, and with his face resolute to duty he bids us to follow. Shall there be one on the Democratic side who will not buckle on his armor, who will not gird about him the sword of truth, challenging the forces of privilege, the ramparts of protectionism, and the fortifications that have successfully baffled the patriots of the past? Our duty is clear. We will take the fort. We will rout the minions of privilege and of pelf and with courage undaunted we will not falter, but will restore this Government to the people, who will preserve its flag in time of war and whose "stricken love and confidence we can not survive." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and other members of that committee familiar with every detail of this bill have presented to us in their discussion an able and clear analysis thereof. I shall therefore not presume to discuss the bill as a whole. In the time which the Democratic leader has assigned to me I purpose to consider some of the objects sought to be attained by this legislation which extend far beyond the mere making of a reduction in tariff rates and to notice some of the criticisms which have been directed against Members of the majority, especially the new Members, for having reached an agreement to support the bill by a compromise of their differences. Finally I shall consider criticisms directed against those features of the bill which affect the agricultural classes and shall speak of the remarkable solicitude for the laboring class shown at this late hour by the Republican Party. The fact that I am a new Member and one of the Representatives of the greatest agricultural State in the Nation gives me warrant, I trust, for occupying for a brief space the time of the House.

As I understand the responsibility of the Democratic Party at this hour, it is not merely to reduce the tariff and at the same time produce the needed revenue for the Government. The people demand, and the highest interests of the Nation require, that, as far as is consistent with existing conditions, a tariff bill be passed which will permit the industrial development of the Nation along the lines of its natural adaptation. In no other way can we attain to enduring strength and maintain our present position when our natural resources shall have been reduced to a parity with those of older nations with which we are industrial competitors.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House complain of alleged inconsistencies in the bill. The Democratic Party is not building the tariff policy of the Nation; it is reconstructing that policy which the Republican Party fashioned. The country does not expect, and certainly gentlemen of the opposition should not demand, that with one effort the Democratic Party bring perfect symmetry and beauty to that monstrosity of which the opposition were the architects and builders. As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], no individual agrees with all the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] undertook on the opening day of this discussion to criticize individual Members, who were opposed to some feature of the bill drawn by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, for not having combined and defeated it. The Republicans would have liked very much to have had us do that. The reason why we did not do it is because we believe this bill as a whole is a compliance with the preelection pledges of the Democratic Party, and if enacted into law will give to the people of the Nation substantial relief from the injustices of the tariff which the Republicans made. We had sense enough to know that agreement could be reached in no other way than by individuals making concessions for their constituents in behalf of the common good, in the benefits of which common good their constituents would participate and thereby receive compensation for that which they had surrendered. This tariff bill, like every tariff bill, is a matter of compromise, a matter of give and receive.

We were told by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that some substantial provisions of the present law—Schedule K, for instance—did not accord with the views of that distinguished gentleman [Mr. PAYNE] whose name is attached to that law. This gentleman is commended in extravagant terms not only for having supported but for having fathered this offspring of the Republican Party. Greater love hath no man shown than this, that during all the years Schedule K has played the rôle of highwayman for the woolen manufacturer this gentleman, out of consideration for the good name of the Republican family, has held back any denial of its paternity. Yet Democrats are criticized for having surrendered minor differences to make certain the passage of this piece of great reconstructive legislation. If we would only get into a row among ourselves, if every Member would stand out stubbornly for everything he wants, we would be doing just what the Republican Party wants us to do and just what the country does not want us to do.

Our Republican friends, in their efforts to dissatisfy the country with this bill, take each business separately and dwell upon what this bill compels it to give up, but they make no mention of what benefits each business receives from the bill. To state what any class gives up does not state the effect of the bill on that class unless you state what it receives in return.

Great solicitude for the interests of the American farmer has been shown by the gentlemen on the other side of the House in their discussions, and grave apprehensions are expressed as to the effect of this bill on him. Protect the American farmer, they insist. Protect him how? How have they sought to serve him when they had the power to serve? They put the shadow of a duty on his products, but left on his back the burden of an exorbitant tariff on the things he must buy. They gave him the shadow while they took away from him the substance—substance which he has gathered from the markets of the world. By his industry and genius he produces more than the Nation consumes. Whatever tariff wall you put around his products, he must go over it to seek a market for his surplus, and the price at home and the price abroad are fixed in the markets of the world in open competition with the earth.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If it is not going to hurt the farmer to take the tariff off, how is it going to benefit the consumer?

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman mean by taking the tariff off agricultural products?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes. How can it benefit one without hurting the other?

Mr. SUMNERS. We say it will not hurt the farmer for the reason that what the farmer gives up he will get back under the benefits of this bill and more besides.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It will cheapen his commodity, will it not?

Mr. SUMNERS. It will cheapen some of his commodities, not the staple crops. I think nobody would deny that. You are going back to the great industrial sections of this country, may I say—and I mean it in no offensive sense—undertaking to make the men who work in the great factories believe that they get no benefit by the reduction. I am going back to Texas and tell my people that it will cheapen some of their minor products; then I am going to show them some of the benefits which this bill gives them in exchange for that which they are compelled to surrender.

The Republican Party is quite willing to give the farmer a tariff on those products the price of which is fixed in the markets of the world and therefore could not be increased by the tariff. In addition, it would gladly foster rural industries here and there in the hope, I dare say, of drawing recruits to strengthen its decimated ranks entrenched around the great tariff-favored industries of the city.

This is not all surmise. On the opening day of this discussion, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], representing one of the greatest manufacturing districts, used this significant language:

Yet we know in our hearts that duties on manufactures and duties on farm products must go hand in hand. How long did the protective system in England last after the repeal of the corn laws? Just about as long as it took the indignant British farmer to join with the free trader and wipe the whole slate clean.

Is it not fair to suspect, in view of this language and of Republican discriminations against the agricultural interests, that this is the fountain from which springs the concern for the American farmer? Well can the manufacturer afford to give the farmer 16.75 per cent tariff on corn, for instance, as the law now provides, when the whole Nation imports a negligible quantity and the corn grower, after supplying the entire home demand at a price fixed in the free markets of the world, exports $29,000,000 worth annually. The manufacturer can well afford this concession, which concedes nothing, if the farmer will pay him at least 50 per cent more for his clothes than he could have bought them for in the markets to which he sent his corn for sale. This represents the sort of reciprocity which the Republican, representing the highly protected manufacturing interests, is offering to the farmers of the Nation as a basis for a political alliance with them.

While this bill removes this sort of pretended protection for the farmer, it gives him plows, harrows, reapers, drills, planters, mowers, cultivators, thrashing machines, cotton gins, and all other agricultural implements free of duty. On these he now pays an import duty of 15 per cent ad valorem. Bagging for his cotton is free of duty under this bill, as are also boots and shoes, sewing machines, leather, harness, saddles, saddlery, hoops and bands of iron for baling cotton, nails and spikes, horse and mule shoes, salt, lumber, fencing wire, and other important articles. In addition to the free list, the following are some of the important reductions in tariff duties carried by this bill.

Woolen dress goods, from 99.70 to 35 per cent.
Ready-made woolen clothing, from 79.56 to 35 per cent.
Flannels for underwear, from 93.29 to 25 and 35 per cent.
Woolen blankets, from 72.69 to 25 per cent.
Cotton underwear, from 60.27 to 25 per cent.
Stockings, hose, and half hose, from 75.38 to 50 per cent.
Shirts, collars, and cuffs, from 64.03 to 25 per cent.
Ready-made wearing apparel, from 50 to 30 per cent.
Handkerchiefs and mufflers, from 59.27 to 30 per cent.
Cotton thread, from 31.54 to 19.29 per cent.
Gloves, from 44.15 to 31.77 per cent.
Anvils of iron and steel, from 32.11 to 15 per cent.
Bolts, from 20.59 to 15 per cent.
Chains of all kinds, from 46.59 to 20 per cent.
Pocketknives, from 77.68 to 40 per cent.
Scissors and shears, from 53.77 to 30 per cent.
Table and butcher knives, forks, etc., from 41.98 to 27 per cent.
Files, etc., from 60.47 to 25 per cent.
Tinwares, from 45 to 25 per cent.
House or cabinet furniture of wood, from 35 to 15 per cent.
Sugar, from 48.54 to 36.25 per cent.
Red lead, from 60.35 to 25 per cent.
White lead, from 38.01 to 25 per cent.
Castile soap, from 16.20 to 10 per cent.
All bricks, from 30.23 to 10.28 per cent.
China, crockery ware, from 55 per cent to 35 or 50 per cent.
Wire rope and strand, from 49.84 to 30 per cent.
Common window glass, from 46.38 to 28.20 per cent.

There are something more than 4,000 items affected by this bill. The result is a reduction from the average rate under the present law of 40.12 per cent ad valorem to an average of 29.60 per cent ad valorem. Thus it will be seen that most of the articles which constitute the farmer's necessities have been put on the free list or a most material reduction made in the present tariff rate. This he has received in exchange for the surrender of the shadow of protective benefit with which the Republican Party has sought to deceive him into supporting its fallacies.

Of course the benefits which the farmer receives through this bill in the reduction of the tariff on clothing, furniture, and so forth, are shared by all the people. However, I have given especial consideration to the effect of this bill on the agricultural classes because of the desperate efforts which the high protectionists are making to establish an alliance with a part of the farming classes by magnifying the effects of the reductions of the tariff on farm products and undertaking to hide the substantial benefits which the bill gives them.

Nevertheless, I can not conclude without reference to the deep concern which the high protectionists are manifesting in another most important class of American citizens—that class known as the American workingman. Oh, the fathomless depths and sublime heights of that love—generous, full, and complete—finding, however, its only manifestation in Republican protection of industries per se.

"Shield the American laborer from the pauper laborer of Europe," you cry, while you fill your factories with thousands upon thousands of these pauper laborers, brought here to compete with the American workingman on his own soil, and to beat down his standard of living, in order that dividends may be greater and that you may be in a better position to starve him into submission when desperation drives him to strike for a living wage. The fact is that the whole burden of the tariff-created and tariff-supported industries, in their final transmission, rests on the laboring man and on those industries of the Nation which sell their products in competition with the world. The industry which can not sustain itself without help from the Government has no strength to yield for the sustenance of another.

But the Democratic Party is not an enemy to the manufacturing interests. The tariff-protected manufacturers bless the Republican Party for its bounty and are condemning in unmeasured terms the insistence of the Democratic Party that they relieve the industry of the country from a part of the burden of their weight. The future will prove the wisdom of the Democratic course; will prove the wisdom, in so far as the welfare of the now protected manufacturing interest itself is concerned. That interest had better begin to put a little weight on its own legs. The time may come when it will need the strength to stand alone even. This thing is certain: The longer you postpone granting substantial relief to the American consumers the more radical their demands will be and the stronger their forces will grow.

I submit that that party is not a true friend of the manufacturing interest which advises that interest to disregard the will of a determined people, asking only for that which they have a right to demand. I ask you, and the Nation asks you: Will you ever grow brave enough and strong enough to bear the flag of commerce to victory in the industrial conflict of the world if you are forever to be held in the lap of the Nation and fed from a bottle?

I am sure I have no sectional prejudice. I would not consciously do injury to any man; certainly I would not want to embarrass those Democrats who have come here from the manufacturing section. It is nothing to be a Democrat down in my country, with a normal majority of 200,000, but those whom I admire most are the brave men who, during the long night of Republican misrule, have kept the watch fires of Democracy burning brightly on the hilltops of old New England.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House make sport of the Underwood competitive tariff policy. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama, in the announcement of that policy, made a lasting and momentous contribution to the practical political philosophy of this time.

Competition will take the antiquated machinery from the woolen mills of this country and substitute therefor equipment capable of the most economic production. Competition will stop waste, conserve energy, and give permanent strength to all industries. How will we ever get for this Nation its share of the commerce of the world unless, with far less protection than we now have, we become able successfully to meet the competition of those who must bring their goods from beyond the seas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the sugar schedule of this bill. I intend to vote for that schedule as it has been reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

I come from Colorado, which is the most important beet-sugar producing State in the Union. I was elected on a platform which specifically declared for the removal of the tariff on sugar, but the President of the United States has urged that the sugar manufacturers of this country be given three years in which to put their house in order, and he suggests an immediate cut of 25 per cent on the tariff with free trade at the end of three years. I believe my constituents have such faith in the judgment of Woodrow Wilson that they will accept this compromise, and, believing that, I propose to vote for the bill, and think I can do so with a clear conscience.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. What district did the gentleman say he represented?

Mr. KEATING. I represent the entire State of Colorado, having been elected as Congressman at Large.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the people of Colorado, particularly the farmers, had any understanding or any knowledge when they voted for Mr. Wilson that he would in a certain sense be sponsor for such a bill as is introduced at this time?

THE FARMERS AND MR. WILSON.

Mr. KEATING. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that when the farmers of Colorado voted for Woodrow Wilson they believed he was a Democrat. They had no reason to believe that he disapproved of the action of the Democratic majority of this House in the last Congress, and I believe the men and women who voted for Mr. Wilson voted for him because they believed he would insist upon a downward revision of the tariff, and that, in order to attain that end, they were perfectly willing to accept free sugar and, if necessary, free wool.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Just one other interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not a fact that President Wilson in all his speeches reassured the business interests of the country that they had absolutely nothing to fear of radical revision by the Democratic Party?

Mr. KEATING. Yes, sir; that is exactly true; and it is true that the business interests of this country have nothing to fear from this tariff bill [applause on the Democratic side]; and, so far as the beet-sugar industry of the State of Colorado is concerned, it has nothing to fear from this tariff bill, because I want to tell you, sir, that in the State of Colorado we can raise sugar beets and we can make sugar in competition with the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The proposition Woodrow Wilson made to the people of this country was that he would not disturb any legitimate industry, and sugar making is a legitimate industry in the State of Colorado and will not be disturbed. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question. Is that the gentleman's personal view? Is that what the gentleman desires the people of Colorado to understand—that the sugar growers of that State have absolutely nothing to fear?

Mr. KEATING. It is not necessary for me to state my views on the floor of this House for the information of the sugar growers of Colorado. Everyone at home knows where I stand on this question. I was a candidate before the people of Colorado last fall. I went into practically every county in that State, and I distributed copies of my platform, in which I specifically declared that I wanted no man to vote for me unless he was willing to have me come down here and vote to remove the tariff on sugar. After the primaries and before the election I canvassed the State, under the auspices of the Democratic State committee, sometimes speaking once and sometimes eight times a day, and in every speech I delivered—in sugar camps and out of sugar camps—I declared that if elected I would vote for free sugar, and that I did not want to be elected under any other circumstances. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that he was very much more candid in his statement to his constituents than many other Democratic candidates throughout the country.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the gentleman for the compliment.

EFFECT ON COLORADO.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me it is impossible to go into a thorough discussion of this sugar question. I expect, therefore, to make only a brief reference to the broader aspects of this problem and to confine myself largely to a consideration of the effects upon my home State of Colorado. We have heard a great deal on the sugar question in the last 12 or 15 years, especially here in Congress. And out of these debates and the library of reports which have been made upon this subject, I think one fact stands out so clearly that no intelligent man can question its accuracy, and that fact is that the sugar tariff adds from 1½ to 2 cents to the price of every pound of sugar consumed in this country. If that be true—and so far as I know no attempt has been made to controvert that proposition—then the American consumer who, according to reports, consumes something like 80 pounds of sugar per year, is taxed from $1.20 to $1.50 a year for the purpose of sustaining the Sugar Trust. As we have something like 90,000,000 consumers in this country, approximately $115,000,000 per year is added to the sugar bill of the consumers of the country. And the proposition we have before us to-day, when we get right down to bedrock, as we say out in the West, is, Shall we remove from the shoulders of the consumers in this country this burden of $115,000,000 a year, or shall we not?

THE COST OF THE SUGAR TARIFF.

The Democratic Party takes the position that we shall, and the Republican Party—or, at least, that portion of the Republican Party which is able to agree—takes the position that if you remove the tariff you will destroy a great and prosperous industry. I insist that instead of destroying the beet-sugar industry free sugar will save it. But before proceeding to that phase of the matter I want to call the attention of the House to what it costs the people of the West to maintain this sugar tariff.

The State of Colorado has a population of approximately 800,000 people, and in common with all the other citizens of this country the people of that State pay this flat tax of $1.20 per head to sustain the Sugar Trust. Every man, woman, and child pays it. But in addition to that the sugar company charges us another tax. They charge us for the privilege of living in the shadow of a sugar factory, and on every hundred pounds of sugar sold in Colorado they add 55 cents for freight. Now, as a matter of fact, the sugar is made in Colorado, but they charge us freight from the seaboard to the point of consumption. As I said, this freight rate is 55 cents a hundred, so that our per capita contribution to the sugar company is $1.75, and on the basis of a population of 800,000 that makes an annual contribution of about $1,400,000, or more money than the people of Colorado contribute to sustain their State government.

But while the situation in Colorado so far as sugar is concerned is rather bad, we are fortunate compared with the people of Idaho and Montana. They raise sugar beets in those States and they have a great number of sugar factories there. But the Sugar Trust adds an additional penalty to the cost of sugar used in those States, and they charge the Idaho and Montana consumer 45 cents per hundred more than they do the consumer in Colorado and $1 a hundred more than they do the consumer of beet sugar in New York. In other words, they will take Idaho beet sugar and carry it across the continent to the city of New York and sell it for $1 a hundred less than they will sell it at the doors of the sugar factory in Montana and Idaho, and, on the basis of Idaho's population, the consumers of that State are contributing $715,000 a year to support the Sugar Trust. The consumers of Montana—Montana having a larger population—contribute $827,200 a year.

ARIZONA THE UNFORTUNATE.

But while we may sympathize with the consumer in Colorado, and sympathize still more with the consumer in Idaho and Montana, it is only when we come to Arizona that our hearts bleed. Down in Arizona the Federal Government has expended many millions of dollars in constructing reclamation projects in order that the farmers there may grow sugar beets and other things. And they are growing sugar beets there. As a sugar-beet State Arizona is almost the equal of Colorado, but when you come to purchase sugar in Arizona from an Arizona beet-sugar factory you find that the Sugar Trust has tacked 34 cents a hundred onto the price that it charges in Idaho and 79 cents to the price it charges in Colorado and $1.34 a hundred more than it charges in the city of New York. In other words, the unfortunate sugar consumer who lives at the doors of an Arizona beet-sugar factory must pay $1.34 a hundred more for his beet sugar than the more fortunate citizen of this country who lives in New York. Arizona contributes something like $500,000 a year to the upkeep of the Sugar Trust.

Gentlemen from other States may figure out this problem for themselves. I wish my good friend from Kansas here [Mr. MURDOCK] would take the trouble to find out how much it costs his people to maintain the sugar factory at Garden City, which is capitalized for ten times the amount it cost to construct. He will find the bill is a staggering one.

Viewed in the light of the best interests of all the people of this country, there would be no question of what we should do with this measure. It should be passed through this House by a unanimous vote, the Progressives and Republicans vieing with Democrats to give the people of this country relief from this burden.

NO COMPETITION IN SUGAR.

But, my friends, the press agent of the Sugar Trust tells us that if we take this tariff off sugar we will destroy the beet-sugar industry, and that the farmers——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. What does the gentleman mean by "the trust"?

Mr. KEATING. I mean by "the trust" the American Sugar Refining Co. and its friends in the beet-sugar business, because, I will say for the information of the gentleman, that the American Sugar Refining Co. controls every beet-sugar factory in the United States.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Oh, pshaw!

Mr. KEATING. Absolutely; if not by stock holdings then by trade arrangements or selling arrangements—every one of them. There is not an independent beet-sugar company in the United States when it comes to selling sugar to the consumer.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What is the gentleman's evidence for that? I think the House is entitled to some proof of that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I represent in part the State of Michigan, where we have many beet-sugar factories.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. He said he would. I would like to know if that is true.

Mr. KEATING. The evidence is to be found in the conditions that prevail in the sugar trade in this country.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is that the gentleman's answer?

Mr. KEATING. That is my answer; and if I had the time I could go into the figures with the gentleman from Michigan, and I think I could demonstrate to his satisfaction that there is a selling arrangement by which the price is fixed for consumers. I am perfectly sure of that proposition in my own State of Colorado, and it is never denied out there.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I have only 20 minutes in which to say all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that in most of the States the people are much interested in this subject, especially so far as the farming communities are concerned, representing the great majority of the country, and if the gentleman has any figures to carry out the statement he has just made that there is a trust which fixes the price of sugar of all kinds, I would like very much to hear from him on that point. Is there genuine competition between cane-sugar refiners and beet-sugar manufacturers? I represent a district where we buy sugar and do not make it, and if the gentleman has in his possession any facts along that line to the effect that there is one trust in this country that controls all the sugar industries, both cane and beet, that is something that the people ought to know and a thing which I would like to know.

OVERWHELMING EVIDENCE OF COMBINE.

Mr. KEATING. I think the people should know it, Mr. Chairman, and that is one of the purposes I have in making this speech. So far as the State of Colorado is concerned, there is no question about that; and so far as any other Western State is concerned, there is no question about it. You read the testimony that was submitted in the suit of the United States against the American Sugar Refining Co., and you will find that you can not reach any other conclusion.

After the representatives of the trust had squirmed and sought to evade the issue as much as they could the fact was wrung from them that so far as these western factories were concerned they were controlled by Mr. Havemeyer, and there was an absolute understanding as to the price at which sugar was to be sold. And to-day, in every city in Colorado, in every city in Utah, in every city in Idaho and Montana, the price of sugar is the price at San Francisco, plus the freight from San Francisco to the city where you are selling the sugar. In the case of Denver this freight charge is 55 cents a hundred.

In this connection the case of Grand Junction, Colo., is very interesting. Until a short time ago the Sugar Trust charged the people of Grand Junction not only the freight from San Francisco to Denver but they also charged the freight from Denver back to Grand Junction, although if they had shipped the sugar from San Francisco, which they did not, they would have had to pass through Grand Junction to reach Denver. As a matter of fact they never shipped the sugar from San Francisco. The sugar is made in Grand Junction, and when a grocer wants sugar he sends his boy down to the sugar factory and the sugar is loaded on a wagon and taken to the grocery store.

In the face of this fact the trust tacked a freight charge of 80 cents on every sack of sugar sold in Grand Junction.

The local factory, while styling itself independent, was a party to the holdup. Eventually public sentiment became so strong that the trust graciously agreed to waive the freight charge from Denver to Grand Junction—25 cents—but insisted that the people must continue to pay the mythical freight charge from San Francisco to Denver.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to finally convince my skeptical friend from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] that there is no relation between the selling price and the cost of production of American-made sugar, and that the people of this country are paying the price fixed by the Sugar Trust, I will submit the following table, showing the price of sugar in various cities on March 15, 1913:

Prices quoted on beet and cane sugar at various western points on Mar. 15, 1913.

	Beet.	Cane.
	Cents.	Cents.
Guthrie, Okla.	4.56	4.76
Omaha, Nebr.	4.48	4.58
Denver, Colo.	4.80	5.00
Kansas City, Mo.	4.48	4.58
Salt Lake City, Utah	4.95	5.15
Seattle, Wash.	4.61½	4.81½
Tacoma, Wash.	4.61½	4.81½
Helena, Mont.	5.25	5.45
Boise City, Idaho.	5.25	5.45
Carson City, Nev.	5.25	5.45
Los Angeles, Cal.	4.61½	4.81½
Phoenix, Ariz.	5.59	5.79
St. Paul, Minn.	4.47½	4.57½
Chicago, Ill.	4.38½	4.48½
Milwaukee, Wis.	4.38½	4.48½
Topeka, Kans.	4.56	4.66
Atchison, Kans.	4.48	4.58
Louisville, Ky.	4.38½	4.43½
Cleveland, Ohio.	4.37½	4.42½
Bay City, Mich.	4.43½	4.48½

Pittsburgh, Pa.	4.35	4.40
Buffalo, N. Y.	4.35	4.40
New York, N. Y.	4.25	4.30

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the closer you live to a sugar factory the higher the price you pay for sugar.

TOTAL COST TO COUNTRY.

Now let us consider what this robber sugar tariff has cost the consumers of this country.

It is estimated by experts that in the years from 1898 to 1911, inclusive, the consumers of this country paid in increased prices for sugar the staggering sum of $1,368,774,202.

This would be sufficient to construct three Panama canals; it would gridiron this country with asphalted roads; or it would construct a navy which would satisfy even the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. But the most impressive fact is that it represents three times the total value of all the beet sugar produced in this country during the period mentioned.

Such economic folly must end.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having counted the cost of a sugar tariff, suppose we consider the claims of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that the removal of the tariff on sugar will destroy the sugar industry in this country.

WILL STIMULATE, NOT DESTROY.

I do not presume to speak for the sugar industry of Louisiana—I am not an expert on exotics—but so far as Colorado and the other Western States are concerned, free sugar will, in my judgment, prove a tremendous stimulus to the beet-sugar industry and will lead to the establishment of extensive and most important auxiliary industries, such as packing, preserving, and so forth. Free sugar will injure just one class—the owners of the watered stock of the beet-sugar companies. Unfortunately, the men who are responsible for the water will not suffer alone. They have in many cases unloaded the watered or common stock on the gullible American investor.

One of the men most active in the sugar lobby in this city boasted to me a short time ago that he did not own a dollar of common stock. He had sold all his holdings to the widows and orphans whom he is now parading before the sympathetic eyes of Congress in an attempt to have the tariff on sugar retained.

The 76 beet-sugar factories in this country are capitalized for $141,000,000. Their real value is less than $60,000,000. Eighty millions of water must be removed, and then the patient will be able to sit up and take a little nourishment.

Can the western beet-sugar factories pay the farmers the prevailing price for beets—$5.50 for 15 per cent beets—and produce granulated sugar in competition with the world? Without a moment's hesitation, I answer "Yes."

How do I arrive at that conclusion? Let me show you.

COST OF MAKING BEET SUGAR.

Germany is the world's foremost producer of beet sugar. German sugar enters the English market and competes with the sugars of the world. We have not heard anything about the pauper labor of the Tropics driving German sugar out of England. In fact, there is some complaint that this so-called pauper labor needs "protection" against the vigorous German sugar maker.

This being the fact, it stands to reason that if we can produce sugar as cheaply as Germany we, too, can compete with the world.

That brings us to the question, What does it cost to produce 100 pounds of sugar in Germany and what should it cost in this country?

The problem is not so complicated as our friends on the other side of the Chamber would have us believe.

The principal item in the cost of producing beet sugar is the price paid the farmer for his beets.

In this country the standard price is $5.50 per ton for 15 per cent beets. The factories in Colorado pay that price, not because their owners are philanthropists, as some gentlemen would have us believe, but because our farmers will not raise beets for less. They do not have to. They can raise other crops of as great money value. I wish the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] would bear that fact in mind when he is shedding crocodile tears over the impending impoverishment of Colorado's farmers.

Thank God, the prosperity of the farmers of my State is not dependent on the generosity of the Sugar Trust.

I have been to some trouble to ascertain the price paid the German farmer for his beets. I find that many of the German factories are run on the cooperative basis. The farmer is guaranteed a certain sum for his beets and then in addition receives a share of the dividends paid by the factories.

The Sugar Trust's press agents have taken advantage of this fact to circulate many misleading statements concerning the compensation received by the German farmer. They give the guaranteed sum, but make no mention of the additional dividend.

My inquiries show that the average price received by the German farmer is $5.45 per ton for 15 per cent beets. In addition he receives free seed and from 40 to 60 per cent of the pulp.

So, on the whole, he receives a higher price than his American brother.

Thus, on the principal item of cost we find the American factory has a slight advantage over its German rival.

LABOR COST IN FACTORIES.

"But," our protectionist friends exclaim, "the German factories are run by pauper labor." Well, I never heard a workman in an American sugar factory complain that he experienced any difficulty in carrying home his week's wages on Saturday night.

The fact is that, according to the sugar men's own statement, the labor cost of producing 100 pounds of sugar is only 14 cents. The German cost may be a little less than that, but not much.

The next item in importance is fuel, and we have more coal in the State of Colorado and more water power in our mountains than you can find in the entire German Empire. Why, sir, if you will promise to establish an enterprise of importance in my town of Pueblo I will guarantee to furnish you with the cheapest power in the world.

Now, let us summarize. The German factory pays more for its beets and its fuel and a little less for its labor than the American factory. In other words, it is about an "even break." And do gentlemen contend that Yankee brains and Yankee brawn require more than that to win in any of life's contests?

Of course, in all fairness, I should admit that the German factory owner has one decided advantage over us. He is not staggering under a mountain of watered stock. He is satisfied with a reasonable return on the capital actually invested, and our sugar magnates will come to that after this bill is placed on the statute books.

The factory pays the American farmer about 1.9 cents per pound for the sugar in his beets. It costs about six-tenths of a cent per pound to extract the sugar. That makes the factory cost about 2.5 cents per pound.

The average price for sugar in London—and that is the world price, and will not be changed materially by anything we may do here—is 3.6 cents per pound.

There is an ample margin there to attract capital to beet-sugar factories efficiently managed and capitalized at their real value.

ARE OUR FACTORIES UP TO DATE?

Just a word on this question of the efficiency of American factories. I have in my hand the annual report of the American Beet Sugar Co. for 1911. I might say that, as I understand these figures, they show the company earned more than 40 per cent that year on the capital actually invested.

That is not the point I wanted to make, however. This report shows that this company owns six factories, and that at least three of them—those located at Rocky Ford and Lamar, Colo., and Grand Island, Nebr.—are equipped with machinery which is out of date and costly to operate.

The description of the Lamar factory will answer for all the others. This report says of the Lamar plant:

> Its machinery is of an old French pattern, removed from the company's abandoned Norfolk factory, and therefore far out of date and comparatively expensive to operate.

I will admit that that kind of a collection of old junk can not be expected to compete with the world, but I contend the American people should not be taxed to keep it and other antiquated plants like it in operation.

Give us new, up-to-the-minute plants and we will not require a tariff.

SELLING OUT TO THE SUGAR TRUST.

I wish I had the time, Mr. Chairman, to go into another very interesting phase of this sugar question. I should like to tell the story of how the men who are now directing the sugar lobby in this city betrayed the beet-sugar interests of the West to the Sugar Trust and became the paid agents of Havemeyer and his associates.

I have before me three bulky volumes of the evidence taken in the case of the United States against The American Sugar Refining Co. and others in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

One of the witnesses in that case was Chester S. Morey, president of the Great Western Sugar Co., and a leading business man of Denver.

Mr. Morey testified that he went into the beet-sugar business in 1901. At that time all the beet-sugar factories in the West were independent concerns, promoted in large part by local capital. The industry was developing by leaps and bounds. Tests had shown that vast areas in the West were adapted to the growth of the sugar beet, and scores of towns were planning to erect factories.

Mr. Morey swears that in less than a year after he secured an interest in a factory in northern Colorado he conceived the idea of selling out to the Sugar Trust. He tells in detail how he went down to New York, met Havemeyer, got a big price for his holdings, and then became the paid secret agent of the head of the Sugar Trust.

This evidence shows that it was Morey's business to hamper and harass the beet-sugar business of the West. Acting under directions from Havemeyer he first sought to prevent the erection of new factories, and failing in that endeavored to secure a controlling interest in the new enterprises.

These volumes show that the trust and its representatives did not hesitate to threaten to ruin men if they dared go into the sugar business in defiance of Havemeyer's wishes.

Morey was not alone in this work. Havemeyer had his representatives in Utah, Idaho, Montana, and California—wherever the industry promised to become established.

COMBINED TO OPPRESS FARMERS.

These agents of the trust not only discouraged the establishment of new plants, but they banded together to keep down the price paid the farmers for their beets. The farmers organized and succeeded by a series of struggles in forcing the price of beets from $4.50 to $5.50 per ton, but capital was effectually discouraged from investing in independent sugar plants.

Did the time permit I could read the testimony to prove how these agents of the trust succeeded in preventing the erection of sugar factories at Brighton and Durango, in my State, and at various points in other States.

I can not refrain from reading just one letter from Morey to his employer—Havemeyer. Some Colorado Springs capitalists planned to erect a sugar factory at Sheridan, Wyo. Morey sent his friend Boettcher to them and endeavored to discourage them. He even used the old tariff bugaboo to frighten them, but they were evidently familiar with that time-worn fake and maintained their position. Then Morey wrote the following plaintive wail to Havemeyer, and it shows just how much he was interested in developing the beet-sugar industry in the West:

THE GREAT WESTERN SUGAR CO.,
Denver, Colo., June 8, 1906.

Mr. H. O. HAVEMEYER, New York.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter from Mr. Boettcher explains itself. Would like to know if you see any way to check this kind of competition. I sometimes think it is a mistake not listing our stock and offering it for sale; if people want to buy common stock we ought to give them a chance to come in. This is simply a suggestion. We are doing everything we can to discourage the building of any more factories until the matter of tariff legislation is more settled than it is at present. We are using that as a basis of argument against the building of any more factories.

Promoters like the Garden City and the Sheridan people are claiming that trusts have made great profits out of the business, and in that way selling their stock.

Respectfully, yours, C. S. MOREY.

This letter was written six years ago when our Republican friends were in control of the Government, and there was not one chance in a thousand that there would be any "tinkering with the tariff."

EARNINGS OF THE FACTORIES.

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to read just one more letter from Mr. Morey. This time to demonstrate the enormous profits earned by the beet-sugar companies. This letter was written by Morey to Washington B. Thomas, president of the Sugar Trust, on March 19, 1910:

> You will notice that this year, in addition to the regular 2½ per cent depreciation which we have been deducting for the last three years, we have set up $1,000,000 in depreciation reserve. I do not want this year's earnings to appear as large as they would if we had not made this entry. Of course, this can be changed if the board of directors does not approve of it.
> You will note that our total surplus is shown by these statements as a little over $5,000,000. This does not include any surplus from the Billings Co., the Great Western Railway Co., and other corporations, which really add nearly $2,000,000.
> Our sugar is invoiced at 4 cents, and judging from present market indications there is at least $1,000,000 profit that will show up in next year's business. The value of our real estate and railroads over and above the amount at which they are carried is at least $5,000,000, so that the actual surplus is nearer $9,000,000 than $5,000,000.

The Great Western Sugar Co. had been in existence about five years; had paid yearly dividends and accumulated a surplus of $9,000,000. No wonder Mr. Morey did not want the public to know the facts.

WILL PUT INDUSTRY ON ITS FEET.

I prefaced my remarks with the statement that I believed free sugar would stimulate the sugar industry of Colorado, not destroy it.

Why? Because I believe free sugar will demonstrate that Colorado's sugar industry is a legitimate industry—that we can raise beets and make sugar in competition with the world.

Once we have proven that fact to the satisfaction of the thinking business men, capital will flow into our State for the establishment of sugar factories. It will be impossible for the trust's agents to frighten it away. They can not use the possibility of tariff legislation as a bugaboo, for the industry will be standing erect on its own legs.

That investors have already sensed this truth is shown by an advertisement which I received this morning announcing the formation of an independent sugar company in Colorado. The organizer, Ward Darley, is a man who has felt the fangs of the Sugar Trust, and he rejoices that we are about to strike the shackles from the limbs of this great industry.

WILL AID COLORADO'S FRUIT RAISERS.

But that will be only one of the many benefits which will inure to the people of Colorado from this legislation.

Under free sugar the consumers will save $1,400,000 a year, which now goes to swell the dividends of the Sugar Trust.

When I began my campaign last year the sugar consumers of Colorado were paying $1 for 14 pounds of sugar. Under this bill they will receive from 20 to 25 pounds for a dollar.

Colorado is one of the great fruit-raising States of the Union. Last year tens of thousands of dollars' worth of fruit perished in our orchards. If this industry is to be saved Colorado must be dotted with preserving and packing plants. To secure these plants we must have cheap sugar.

To-day we produce ten times the sugar we consume, and we pay 2 cents a pound more for sugar than the same sugar is sold for on the docks of New York for export to England.

If we could buy our sugar at the cost of production, plus a reasonable interest on the capital actually invested in our sugar factories, we could build up in Colorado a packing and preserving industry which would be the pride of this Nation.

Exhaustive study has convinced me of the truth of what I have said this afternoon. I would not knowingly do anything to retard the material prosperity of my State. I have lived there all my life. Every dollar I have in the world is invested there. I trust when my eyes are closing for my last long sleep they will be permitted to glimpse the snow-capped glory of her peaks. I believe I am a loving, loyal son of the Commonwealth, and I am convinced that in voting for this bill I am rendering a distinct service to my State and its people.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Texas). The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. At the request of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR].

Mr. MURDOCK. I was going to suggest that inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was absent and I knew that he intended to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR], I would yield him the time, out of the time of the gentleman from Alabama, however. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR] is recognized.

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Chairman, the courtesy of the distinguished Progressive leader from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] recalls very forcibly to my mind the generosity displayed by some of our friends on the minority side last fall.

I trust that during the course of my remarks there will be no disturbance by loud and tumultuous applause. [Laughter and applause.]

The tariff question during the last 50 years has presented a subject for radical dispute among the American people, and probably on no other question of public debate has there been such unanimous disagreement.

If after all these years of discussion and public education the per cent of the people who know something about the tariff were as great as the per cent who never have been able to understand it, we might then hope at some future time to arrive at a true solution of this great public problem.

After reading and listening to a great number of speeches presenting the tariff issue from an academic standpoint and after an honest attempt to try to understand the different theories of a harmonious tariff schedule as an entity, my brain feels very much as if it had been subjected to an electric buzzer or an attempt to read and understand the printed rules governing this House.

I know this, however, and there seems to be no one with any reputation for good sense who contradicts the proposition, that the tariff is a tax and that the ultimate consumer has to pay the tax. With this much clear in my mind and uncontradicted I want to say that if a protective tariff tax produces prosperity it is the first instance among men, either savage or civilized, since the beginning of time that a tax has been regarded as an evidence of prosperity and a thing altogether to be desired.

The good people of the district which I have the honor of representing do not seem to be disturbed by the prospects of the enactment of this bill into law. I have not received one letter nor one telegram of protest from any of my friends or constituents, but I have received many communications in which congratulations were extended to the Democratic Party for the faithful manner in which it was proceeding to carry out to the letter the pledges of our platform.

I am not worried nor bothered very much over the theory of tariff making, because I am a believer in freedom of all kinds under proper conditions—freedom of conscience, freedom of speech, freedom of action, and freedom of trade relations when that time shall have arrived.

I believe that the fewest laws of a restrictive nature with which it is possible to govern a civilized country are the most consistent with peace and prosperity.

Of course everyone realizes that the unnatural and artificial conditions in some business interests, founded and built up by subsidies in the form of a protective tariff, must be let down to a common level and to their natural condition gradually.

It takes about as long to walk down a hill as it did to walk to the top on the other side. It takes nearly as long to cure a chronic disease as the disease was in maturing. So it may take a considerable time to regulate these unnatural business concerns and to establish an understanding with them that they must do business without expecting the Government to protect them. To administer medicine enough at one dose to cure an aggravated disease would result in death to the patient. So to attempt to right the evils which have grown up under the protective system at once might result injuriously.

The Underwood bill, now before us for consideration, is based on a splendid theory for lowering the tariff bars, and, as I see it, its different parts are in harmony one with the other.

Of course under our present system we all recognize that funds must be raised with which to conduct the affairs of this Government. That being true, the only theory that appeals to me is the one that places the burden of taxation most heavily upon the shoulders of those most able to bear it and who are least accustomed to bearing it under the system heretofore adopted by the Republican Party.

I believe that there should be the least tariff on the necessaries of life and the highest tariff on the luxuries of life. And right here is a line not clearly marked nor defined as to what are necessaries and what are luxuries.

A luxury is something that nobody needs, but which rich people buy because poor people can not.

A necessary of life is something that everyone must have in order to live out his full allotment of time.

In reading this bill I have found a few things that I would change. Most of us would revise the Scriptures, no doubt, if we were given an opportunity. I would revise this bill by putting a tax of 100 per cent on diamonds of all kinds, as well as on pearls and jewelry. I believe that diamonds are of absolutely no use on earth to mankind. The human race would live just as long and would be just as happy and healthy without them as with them. I would rather have a crumb of bread and a drop of water with which to sustain life and enable me to live out my allotted time than a bushel of the finest diamonds and pearls in the world; and that is the reason I would put a high tax on diamonds. [Applause.]

I do not think I should be accused of entertaining a prejudice against diamonds, or people who own diamonds or who expect to own them, because I also would raise the tariff on silks; and, if I am not mistaken, we have one silk dress in our family. Silk is partly a luxury and partly a necessity. A silk dress will warm the body. Silk will serve as wearing apparel, and to that extent is possessed of the elements of a necessary of life; but a large part of its value is made up of what might be termed useless, ornamental, and luxurious qualities, and to that extent I would tax silk very high. Those who can afford silks and diamonds as luxuries would have to pay more dearly if I were making this bill than they will be compelled to pay under its provisions as it now stands.

This bill could not possibly suit all Democrats. It probably is true that it does not in its entirety suit any Democrat, but I believe that it comes nearest being the composite belief and opinion of what is right in this matter of any bill that could have been presented to this House. It possesses sufficient harmony to slide down from the top of the protective system to the common level of equal justice and the harbor of equal rights and privileges.

I will not say as, four years ago, did the man who occupied the great office of President of the United States that this is the best tariff bill that ever was written. That speech got that President into more trouble than everything else that he ever said while he was President. I would not use such an exaggerated expression about this bill, but I will say this about it, that it has the fewest faults of any bill that I have had an opportunity to read.

Mr. Chairman, this law, if enacted, may disturb some business interests; there are some business interests in this country that ought to be disturbed. Any business that has been fertilized by a protective tariff of personal favor and pampered privilege ought to be destroyed, but all of those business affairs that have been created by the brawn and brain of American industry, that are fostered and fertilized by the honest endeavor of progressive manhood, I do not believe need fear for one moment that their interests will be disturbed nor their trade relations disastrously affected by the enactment of this tariff law. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how the time stands between the two sides of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has used 8 hours and 2 minutes and the gentleman from New York 9 hours and 34 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of the bill now under consideration with some reluctance because of the great number of able and distinguished gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber who have eloquently and learnedly contributed of their vast store of knowledge on tariff legislation and legislative experience to the analysis of the pending bill, and the comparison of it with preceeding tariff measures, to the enlightenment of the House and the general information of the country.

I realize also that what I shall say here is uttered in the presence of master minds and of men who have devoted the best years of their lives to the service of the public, and who bring to the debate on the pending measure not only the ripe experience of many years, but also that confidence which comes alone from long-continued service and devotion to the public weal.

If I were to be guided by my personal feelings in the premises, I would content myself with simply voting as my judgment and political convictions bid me, and spare myself the labor of preparing what I am about to submit as well as spare the House the discomfort of listening to my feeble contribution to a much discussed and now thoroughly analyzed tariff measure.

But, Mr. Chairman, my own feelings and my regard for the feeling of the Members of this body can not control me. I have been chosen to represent a congressional district in the great Commonwealth of Illinois, whose population, according to the last census, was more than 250,000 souls, and whose inhabitants are engaged in every conceivable avenue of legitimate human endeavor. The farmer, the school-teacher, the banker, the laborer, the mechanic, the merchant, and the clergyman are all enumerated in the census of the third congressional district of Illinois, and the high order of that district's intelligence demands of its Representative in Congress something more than the mere announcement of his vote on a measure which is designed to levy taxes on the people of the country amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, whether my action here be right or wrong, my guide in that regard shall be my conscience and my duty as I see it to those who have by their votes cast honor and responsibility upon me far beyond the measure of my worth, and in the discharge of that duty my first obligation is to give expression to those convictions which prompt my action, so that when my vote and act are submitted for scrutiny to those who have the right to scrutinize, they will know as well and be in a position to judge not only the act, but the motive which prompted it.

The bill now under consideration is called a tariff bill, and all bills of like character, I find, from the beginning of the Government have been called tariff bills.

I am prompted to inquire why such measures are called tariff bills. My limited knowledge of the science of legislation is my only excuse for suggesting the question, but I confess to a belief that the bill now under consideration and all other similar measures would be better entitled if they were called bills "to tax the American people for the maintenance of the Government," for such, in truth, every tariff bill is.

The legislative legerdemain practiced by the Republicans and their outcry for "protection to American industries" and "the foreigner pays the tax" have led to a false impression that a tariff bill is not a taxation measure, and I believe that a plain designation of the bill by a title that truthfully expresses its purpose would help materially to destroy the illusions as to who pays the tax and what is being "protected."

Our Republican brethren in presenting tariff measures have reveled in the high-sounding phraseology of a bill "to provide revenue, to protect American industries, and for other purposes," whereas if no disguise were resorted to such bills should have been entitled in contrast to the measure now under consideration, bills "to overtax the American people, to increase our crop of millionaires, and incidentally provide some revenue."

There was a time when the Republicans boasted in justification of their alleged protective measures that "the foreigner paid the tax," but I venture to assert that no gentleman on the other side of this Chamber will now assert that exploded and threadbare theory. They must confess that whatever revenue is derived from the pending tariff measure as well as any preceding tariff measure that was enacted into the law must be paid by the ultimate American consumer, except such revenue alone as is provided by the income-tax feature of the bill now under consideration.

Dismissing all theory for the time being and looking squarely at the facts, we are confronted with this situation:

The Government needs for its economic management for the coming year, according to the Treasury estimates, more than $800,000,000. This revenue can be derived only in the following ways: Either by a direct tax on the American people or an indirect tax levied in the first instance on commodities shipped to our shores from abroad and eventually through the sale and distribution of those commodities to the ultimate consumer, who takes the commodity charged with its proportion of the tariff tax, which is included in its price and which proportion of the tax the ultimate consumer has to pay; or this revenue may be derived by a combination of the direct and indirect tax, as is proposed by the pending measure.

The objections which have been urged against this bill by those who sit on the other side of the Chamber are that the indirect taxes provided by the bill are not sufficient to produce the requisite revenue, and therefore it is not a revenue measure; that the income-tax clause of the bill is objectionable because it is new and untried; it is inquisitorial and will prove expensive and objectionable in its enforcement. Without conceding any force or merit to these objections, they are entirely beside the issue.

Taxes are necessary to the maintenance of the Government, and the levying of taxes is the highest function which government can exercise. In the exercise of that great function the Government must be guided by a spirit of absolute and independent justice to all its people—men, women, and children.

Any system of taxation which is levied on the taxpayer without regard to his proportion or his ability to pay is wrong. The indirect system of taxation, coupled with the doctrine of extreme protection, as advocated by the Republicans, has proven vicious in its application. To determine whether protection is right or wrong as a system of taxation, its effect upon the great masses of the people, when applied to one of the great necessities of life, it strikes me is a fair way to test the question, and as the Payne-Aldrich law is the last expression by the Republican Party on the subject of protective-tariff legislation, and as Schedule K of that law, which deals with wool and woolen manufactures, is the most pronounced application of the protection principle, and as wool is a great, if not the greatest, necessity to the consuming masses of the people, I shall direct the attention of the House briefly to the famous Schedule K.

Under the provisions of the Payne-Aldrich law wool yarns used in knitting and mending socks and stockings are taxed 79.44 per cent, woolen underwear is taxed 93.29 per cent, woolen dress goods 99.70 per cent, and ready-made woolen suits are taxed 79.29 per cent. The items which I have here enumerated are absolute necessities to the farmer and workingman. I maintain that when the American workingman, whose wealth usually consists of his wife, his children, his daily wage, and his ability to earn a living, is obliged to pay 79 per cent of the price of the yarn used in knitting and mending socks and stockings, 93 per cent of the cost of the woolen underwear used by his family, 99 per cent of the price of their woolen dress goods, and 79 per cent of the price of their ready-made suits of clothes in taxes for the support of his Government he is paying far more than his just share and is being taxed far beyond his ability to pay, as the family of the average American workingman is five children, while the millionaire's family is usually less in number than that of the workingman. They buy no yarn for knitting or mending socks, their suits are not ready-made, the raiment of the millionaire's family is usually silk or satin, and it is not unusual, I am told, for them to go across the water to make such purchases as they require.

The Republican Party regards Schedule K in the Payne-Aldrich bill a necessary measure to protect American industry, and insists that it is for the benefit of the American workingman.

Tallyrand once said: "Language is used chiefly to conceal thought." Our Republican friends have developed into past masters of the art of using language according to Tallyrand's conception of its use. But the American people have a different idea about the use of language, and they demand that all language—and especially that which is used in our statutes—shall be designed not to conceal but to express thought. The language of Schedule K, while it is said to be intended for the protection of American industry and American labor, in fact permits the plunder of the public by the Wool Trust.

It might be interesting to observe that the total number of people engaged in woolen-manufacturing industries in the United States, according to the census of 1905, was 179,976, and of this number 12,913 were children under the age of 16 years. Is it justifiable on any ground, let me ask—economic, patriotic, humanitarian, or any other conceivable ground—that 92,000,000 people should be taxed from 79 per cent to 99 per cent on all the woolen goods they buy in order that the wool-manufacturing industry in America should live?

Is such a tax necessary in order to protect the woolen industry? And from what is it to be protected? Will your answer be the "pauper labor of Europe"? If so, I must ask that you be more specific. Please designate the country from which this "pauper labor" comes. You can not mean Germany, because Germany has a tariff as prohibitive as our own, and according to your philosophy pauper labor can not exist where a protective tariff obtains. The same may be said of France and Italy and, in fact, of every country of Europe with the exception of England. But there is another reason why you can not designate the country from which this so-called "pauper labor" comes, and that is that you dare not stand upon the public platform in your congressional districts and specify the pauper labor of Germany, because every son of the fatherland knows as well as you know that there is no pauper labor in Germany that the American workingman need fear; and to designate Italy, France, or Great Britain as the country from which pauper labor emanates would be to insult the intelligence of the German, French, Italian, or British American citizen, and would doubtless result in the loss of his vote to the Republican Party. The "pauper labor" of Europe argument is becoming as hollow sounding and insincere as the timeworn argument, "the foreigner pays the tax."

But let us take another view of this tariff proposition as it applies to the woolen industry. That being the best protected industry in America, according to the Payne-Aldrich bill, it would be logical to suppose, if protection affected wages, that the wages of the woolen-mill employees would be the highest in America. But such is not the fact. The disclosures resulting from the investigation that grew out of the Lawrence strike exposed the horrible conditions under which the employees of the woolen mills live, and the fact was there established that they are among the poorest-paid employees in America. On the other hand, if we look for the best-paid employees in America, we must go to an industry that is in no way connected with tariff bills or schedules. The men employed in the building trades are among the highest-paid employees in the United States, and their wages are not due to a protective tariff, but to their intelligence, their experience, their efficiency, and the strength of the trades-unions.

Yet, under the guise of protection to American industries, the American farmer and workingman is taxed from 79 per cent to 99 per cent on all the woolen yarn, woolen underwear, woolen dress goods, and ready-made suits he buys to protect an industry that employs nearly 13,000 little boys and girls under the age of 16 years. Thirteen thousand little boys and girls are being sacrificed on the altar of corporation greed, are being exploited by woolen manufacturers, are being—

> Made to lose the freedom of the sod,
> And, like a colt, for work be shod.
> And made to tread the mills of toil
> Up and down in ceaseless moil.

And all this in order that the wool manufacturer might worship his golden calf.

I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] say that there were many good features in the Underwood bill for which he would like very much to vote, but that there were some features to which he had objections and for which he would not vote. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there are some features in this bill which are not exactly as they might be. There are schedules in this bill which, in my judgment, are still too high; but I want to say to my Progressive friends that when they compare the good features of the bill with what they are pleased to consider objectionable features they will find that the good points far outweigh the objectionable ones, and that is more than can be said for any Republican tariff bill that was ever passed. They were all bad, but some parts were worse than others. You gentlemen of the Progressive Party must not expect us to present a perfect bill; you exact too much of us when you ask us to correct all the wrongs of 50 years of Republican misrule in a single legislative act.

It has been frequently asserted by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that the tariff is not the cause of our high cost of living, but that the increased cost of distribution is responsible for the high cost of living. I concede that the cost of distribution has materially increased in recent years and that it has manifested itself upon the cost of all the necessities of life, but this increased cost of distribution is directly traceable to the high protective tariff. All prices under the protective system are artificial—the price of distribution as well as the price of the commodity.

Protection is nothing more than a promise to secure for the manufacturer of a commodity a price for his product that the consumer would not otherwise pay, and every dollar added to the price of a commodity in tariff taxes causes just so much more capital to be tied up in the great work of distribution. If the price of a commodity is increased 50 per cent by reason of a tariff tax, then the amount of capital required of every wholesaler and retailer handling that commodity must be increased in proportion.

The tariff does not protect the distributor; he pays the increased price, and this increase of price enters into every transaction in which that commodity enters. Like watered stock, which adds nothing to the tangible assets of a corporation yet is required to earn dividends, that part of the price of a commodity which is artificial imposes its proportion of burden upon the ultimate consumer just as the watered stock imposes upon the public who must pay the dividends its unnecessary public burden, and the artificial proportion of the price of a commodity is passed from the wholesaler through all the processes of distribution to its last victim, the ultimate consumer. This artificial price, which requires the use of more capital, does not increase the amount of labor performed, does not increase the number of employees in a given industry, and accomplishes nothing by virtue of its increase of cost which could not be as well accomplished, and perhaps better so, if the price were determined by competition and not be arbitrarily fixed by a prohibitive tariff.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another feature of the protective system that is worthy of our attention at this time—in connection with the wool schedule in particular. I have heard it said, and doubtless others in this House have heard it stated also, that very little, if any, of the goods now on the market labeled "wool" is, in fact, all wool. Shoddy, noils, and vegetable fibers are said to be large constituents in what now passes for pure wool and is charged for as such. This is another of the many evils of a prohibitive tariff. It enables the manufacturer to foist upon the consumer a cheap, inferior article, and the consumer must accept it and pay the price asked, since there is no competition.

Mr. Chairman, this bill carries with it a feature that no patriotic citizen can well refuse to support. Under our direct system of taxation the surplus wealth of the country was escaping its just burden for the support of the Government, which lay heavily upon the great consuming masses of our people.

The income-tax clause of the pending tariff bill marks a new era in our fiscal system.

It may be true, as some on the other side of the aisle assert, that the income tax will prove obnoxious, but if it does it will be obnoxious only to those who have for years been escaping their just burden of taxation and are still unwilling to accept the new order; it may be an expensive way to collect taxes, but if it is it will be because those who ought to pay throw obstacles in the way of its collection; it may be inquisitorial, but if it is it will be because those who have for years been enjoying the sheltering shade of the protective-tariff wall are now unwilling to come out into the open and contribute their just share to the support of that Government which for years has lavished its favors upon them.

The enactment of the income tax and a reduction in tariff duties is but responsive to an awakened public sentiment and an aroused public conscience.

Never again will any political party have the hardihood to perpetrate upon the American people the outrages that were inflicted upon them by the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich tariff bills. The false theories of protection are gradually being exploded. That the foreigner pays the tax; that a protective tariff produces revenue; that protection, so called, protects the American workingman against pauper labor of Europe are gradually being thrown into the dust heap of oblivion with all the other follies and hobgoblins that progress, truth, and education have turned their searchlight upon and made to vanish.

I would not have anyone infer from what I have said here that I am an advocate of low prices, but when the cost of living increases out of all proportion to the increase in wages the system which permits such conditions to exist must be changed.

According to the bulletins of the Department of Labor, the wholesale prices of farm products had increased in 1907 over the prices of 1896, 75.01 per cent. Food had increased in price during the same period 40.06 per cent. Clothing had increased in price during that period 38.08 per cent, while wages had increased only 29.02 per cent. Farm products had increased in 1912, 118.08 per cent; food, 66.05 per cent; clothing, 32.02 per cent over the price of the same commodities in 1896.

This lack of proportion is due in large measure, if not entirely, to the evils resulting from the protective system and the extremes to which it has been carried.

In delivering his message to Congress on April 7, the President said:

> We have seen tariff legislation wander very far afield in our day—very far indeed from the field in which our prosperity might have had a normal growth and stimulation. No one who looks the facts squarely in the face or knows anything that lies beneath the surface of action can fail to perceive the principles upon which recent tariff legislation have been based. We long ago passed beyond the modest notion of "protecting" the industries of the country and moved boldly forward to the idea that they were entitled to the direct patronage of the Government.

This language has no weight with our Republican friends, I know; but I will quote to them the words of one who once had weight with them, and if his words have no weight with Republicans now it is because the Republicans of to-day have wandered far afield from the principles that actuated their great leaders of the past.

The words I am about to quote were uttered by one who graced these Halls with his presence, and many a time did these corridors ring with his eloquence and might. He lives to-day, and will forever, in the loving, patriotic memory of his countrymen. He was the second of our three martyred Presidents, James A. Garfield.

On April 1, 1870, the House being in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration a bill to provide revenue, Mr. Garfield said:

> I hold that a properly adjusted competition between home and foreign products is the best gauge by which to regulate international trade. Duties should be so high that our manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign products, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy a monopoly of the trade, and regulate the price as they please.
> This is my doctrine of protection. If Congress pursues this line of policy we shall, year by year, approach more nearly to the basis of free trade, because we shall be more nearly able to compete with other nations on equal terms. I am for a protection which leads to ultimate free trade. I am for free trade which can only be achieved through a reasonable protection.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have wandered far afield in tariff legislation in recent years, and an aroused public conscience has summoned those who are charged with the responsibility of legislation to lead the way back to the trail that was blazed by the founders of the Republic. We must make the Government be the servant of all the people; in the levying of taxes we must have regard to proportion and the ability of the taxpayer to pay; we must permit no man who enjoys the benefits of our Government to escape his just share of its responsibilities. We must assess taxes with a view to maintaining the Government and not with a view to giving any class of our population undue advantages over any other class. Class legislation must be avoided if the Republic is to endure.

I have heard much talk from the Republican side these last few days about a tariff board, and their loud protestations have prompted me to inquire as to how long our Republican friends have favored a tariff board. I find that in their national platform of 1904 they say no one but the Republican Party is competent to deal with the tariff. In 1908 they are silent on the proposition of a tariff board, and in 1912 the tariff board is mention for the first time in a Republican platform. In 1904, when they were in full power and possessed of much conceit, they would not notice a tariff board, but after they were driven out of power in the House of Representatives in 1910, and with defeat staring them in the face in 1912, in a last desperate effort to win back that public confidence which they had abused and to try to stem the tide of popularity which Mr. Roosevelt and the Progressive Party were developing they went on record in their national platform of 1912 as being in favor of a tariff board, to be appointed by the President or Congress. The American people went on record also in 1912 in favor of a tariff commission of their own choosing. That commission, chosen by the people and responsible to the people, consisting of a Democratic House of Representatives, a Democratic United States Senate, and a Democratic President of the United States, have presented their bill for the revision of the tariff downward; that bill has been received by this House and the country with approval, and the people eagerly await its enactment into law. The Democratic Party was commissioned by the people to do what the Republicans promised to do and failed of doing. We propose to redeem our pledges to the people. Under the pending bill, when enacted into law, the entire American people will prosper, American industries will thrive, and the croaking of the pessimist will be silenced by the hum of industry and the whirling wheels of commerce. We are about to enter upon the greatest period of peace, prosperity, and plenty that our country has ever known.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY].

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that, with the exception of some question which involves the honor of this Nation and its people, no problem can come before this Congress which more vitally affects the welfare and the well-being of the people of our country than the tariff, the fiscal policy of the Government, in so far as it makes for the prosperity of all our people. I find most eminent authority for this opinion. In the last number of a prominent American magazine the distinguished President of the United States himself expresses the idea that it is absolutely essential for the general welfare of all peoples that they should be well fed, well clothed, and adequately housed. In other words, that it is the prime function of government to legislate in such manner, if possible, that the great body of citizens shall prosper.

UNSCIENTIFIC ARRANGEMENT OF DUTIES.

I will not take your time in an extended survey of the history of tariff legislation in this and other countries, nor am I going to impose upon your patience by attempting to review, item by item, House bill No. 3321. I frankly confess my inability to do this, and I marvel at the mental grasp of a committee of my colleagues who, giving but a few hours a day for a comparatively brief period, have been able to satisfy themselves that the duties levied by this measure are fixed at such a figure as promotes industry and prosperity in this country to the highest degree.

All the more I marvel when I consider that these same men have the same routine, time-consuming, nerve-devouring tasks to perform for the benefit of the people of their respective districts which my own constituents ask of me. But even this wonder vanishes and blends into a much greater one when I consider how a caucus of a great party meets and reads over this bill, item by item, probably the first time that one out of ten of you had ever seen it, and after each man has presented the needs for some modification in behalf of the particular industries of his district, you all finally agree that it was just right as it was presented to you and join unanimously in handing this bill on to the House of Representatives as your party's panacea for all the ills from which the good people of this country are suffering.

As a patriotic American I share with you in your hopes that this bill will be followed by general prosperity, although my business training and a lifetime study of industrial conditions raise in my mind a very grave and considerable doubt. I would feel more confidence, and I think this would be shared generally by the people of this country, if we knew the facts from which your conclusions are drawn. So far as I am able to see, the majority party in caucus finally expresses its confidence in the judgment of their colleagues who make up a majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and that committee, to the best of my knowledge and belief, in turn expresses its confidence in the distinguished chairman.

Now, gentlemen, I am ready for the test. If my theories of a lifetime have been wrong I shall be only too glad to acknowledge it, but believing in them, as I do, and knowing that they are shared by more than 80 per cent of the people of my district, I should feel recreant to my trust did I not register a protest against this or any other bill on a subject so vital to the welfare of all of them, which was prepared by a few men, in hearings which were practically secret, and without the aid of unprejudiced, nonpartisan experts of the highest character and ability, who had access to all the resources of this Government and had in their employ engineers, agriculturists, and accountants of ability and established reputations for fairness; in short, if the bill were based on information provided by a tariff commission, similar to the one legislated out of existence by the Democratic majority of this House last year, and for no other reason than that its findings disproved all the preconceived theories which your party has maintained practically ever since its foundation, findings that, in my judgment, will again be reaffirmed by the effect of this tariff bill on the industrial prosperity of this country.

EFFECT OF BILL VITAL.

I am sure that each Member of Congress recognizes just as fully as I do the fact that this bill itself is vital, and on its success or failure rests the future of the political party now in power. At this point my wonder merges into admiration for your courage. You are certainly staking the future of your party on this bill. I do not know that you could really help it. You were ordered to do it by your party platform. This was indorsed by a doubtful 42 per cent of the voters of this country, while the platforms of the Progressive and Republican Parties, demanding the principle of protection on exact and scientific information, based on the findings of a tariff commission, was indorsed by over 52 per cent of all the voters of this country. Your imperative orders find their source from a political party hopelessly in the minority among the voters of the country.

REAL PROBLEM.

The problem which confronts you is a delicate one at best—to increase the purchasing power of a dollar when measured by the necessities of life and at the same time not to proportionately increase the purchasing power of that same dollar when measured by human labor and human endeavor; in other words, to reduce the cost of necessities without reducing the wages paid to labor at the same time and in the same proportion—to maintain the purchasing power of the worker.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in his opening speech, while expressing some doubt about the immediate fulfillment of this much-desired condition, seems to assume that the increased cost of living has been made up in great part by the tariff. Another distinguished member of the committee last year, who, unfortunately for the country, is not with us at this time, in a speech on the last day of the last session, cited several instances where the cost of distribution entered much more materially into the cost of these necessities to the consumer than did the tariff.

There are two great divisions of this subject—decreasing the cost of necessities, and maintaining the wages paid to the 85 per cent of our people who must rely on the returns from their labor for their ability to pay for these necessities.

I shall first address myself briefly to the influence of the tariff on the prices of necessities.

RELATION OF TARIFF TO COST OF DISTRIBUTION—ON WOOL.

The report of the Tariff Commission created in 1909 shows conclusively that on woolen clothes the increased cost due to the tariff on raw wool and the tariff on woolen cloths amounted to less than 10 per cent of the price which the ultimate consumer paid for his clothing, whereas the cost of distribution, or the handling from the time it left the manufacturer's hands, including the retailer's profit, amounted to an average of more than 35 per cent of the selling price of a finished suit of clothes. This report is open to you. It is complete, and if you study it you can arrive at no other conclusion. This bill is not going to entirely remove the tariff on a suit of clothes. In effect it will reduce the selling cost between 4 and 5 per cent, providing the entire saving is given to the ultimate consumer—a conclusion involved in very serious doubt.

I take pride in the belief that the district which I have the honor to represent is one of the best and most typical in this entire country. It contains 28 cities, towns, and villages above 1,000 population, and all but 3 of these are less than 5,000. In these 25 I am pretty well acquainted, knowing most of the merchants by name and face, and I am equally well acquainted in at least 30 more villages smaller than these. I am prepared to make this statement, that at this enormous apparent margin of profit on ready-made clothing, amounting to more than 50 per cent of the price at which they purchased it, or more than 35 per cent of the price at which they sell it, not one single merchant for the last 20 years has made anything more than fair wages over and above the interest on the investment in his stock of goods. And in the three larger cities not more than one or two firms in each has made more than a modest competence during that same period of time, and with that same apparent margin of profit. But the ready-made clothing departments of the great stores in Chicago, less than 50 miles distant from any one of these communities, have handed in hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars a year profit, and in some instances it runs into the millions.

It is clearly a problem of distribution and not a question of the tariff materially increasing the cost to the consumer.

I am unable to see any way in which this bill is going to make it possible for these small merchants in the smaller communities to handle woolen clothing on any less margin than the present, which affords them merely a living, unless this entire tariff scheme of yours is followed by a beating down of the standard of living of the small merchant and his family, as well as the artisan, in this country to a point where it more nearly corresponds to that in vogue in the principal countries of Europe.

The Tariff Commission's report on cotton shows exactly the same conditions. In the case of cotton cloth we have in this country a specially cumbersome, expensive, and, I think, unnecessary system of distribution, and yet I can not find any one item in this bill that will tend to reduce the cost of distribution under the cotton schedule, unless again the merchants handling that commodity are beaten down to the standard which satisfies men engaged in similar lines in England and in Germany. The merchants in the small towns in this country are able-bodied men. They have tried to follow the merchants in larger cities in fitting up attractive little stores. They give their entire attention to their business, whereas the same line of goods in the European countries are handled in much smaller, much less pretentious shops, kept by the wives and children—the nonwage-earning members of the family.

RELATION OF TARIFF TO COST OF DISTRIBUTION—ON MILK.

Take the item of milk. The splendid little city of Elgin is located in the district which I have the honor to represent. Elgin gives its name to the great dairy interests of the Middle West. Only the first of this month the milk producers of that territory were in a contest with the milk buyers as to the price which they should receive for milk on the farm. The buyers offered the price of last year—$1.40½ per 100 pounds. The producers demanded $1.50. The price which the buyers offered would average a fraction under 3 cents per quart; the price which the producers asked would average a little less than 3¼ cents per quart. And yet this same milk is retailing at 8 cents per quart in Chicago, less than 50 miles distant. If the buyers' price had prevailed, it meant that they would add 166 per cent to their cost on the farm to cover the costs of their distribution and their profits for the same, or 62½ per cent of the selling price would be used for that purpose, representing the cost of handling after it had been delivered from the farm. The duty on milk under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, now prevailing, is one-half cent per quart. I doubt if any of that duty is added to the cost of milk anywhere; yet if it is all represented it would mean only 6 per cent of the ultimate cost to the consumer, while the cost of distribution amounts to 62½ per cent of that cost.

When I was a boy in all the small towns a considerable percentage of the people of the neighborhood kept one or more cows. The father of the family usually did the milking after his day's work was done, unless, perhaps, he had a boy old enough to be drafted for this purpose and not old enough to organize a successful rebellion. The neighbors sent their children for the milk. They took it home in tin pails and pitchers, which had not been previously sterilized. The milker himself did not have a cement floor in his barn, as is now demanded, and he did not take the time to have his hands manicured before sitting down to milk. The milk was not kept at a low temperature and was not put into separate bottles previously sterilized and sealed with germ-proof caps.

The manager of one of the great milk-distributing firms told me only a few weeks ago that their average breakage in bottles alone cost them more than one-fourth of a cent on each quart of milk sold.

The system of milk distribution in the great cities is also unnecessarily expensive. The general manager of the firm making the largest amount of machinery designed for the purpose of handling milk and cream told me last January that as he left the building in which his apartment was located that morning there were six milk wagons standing in front and the driver of each was scurrying through the building carrying only one or two bottles. This is manifestly a most wasteful system of distribution, but it is the legitimate working out of an economic competition—the battle of wits.

I venture the statement that 1 cent per quart could be cut from the price of milk delivered in every large city in this country if the system of distribution were arranged so that there was not an unnecessary duplication of capital and labor.

Take the question of dressed beef. The present tariff is 1½ cents per pound, and yet beef went up the equivalent of more than 3 cents per pound in the Chicago markets inside of 60 days last year. This must show conclusively that the tariff has little, if anything, to do with the cost of beef; otherwise, foreign dressed beef would have come into this country the minute the increase in price had passed the 1½ cents per pound. The reason for the high cost of beef is entirely another story and has little to do with the present discussion.

The fact is that the cost of milk, butter, eggs, poultry, beef, mutton, pork, potatoes, carrots, onions, beans, cabbages, and other vegetables are less on the farm in this country than in any civilized country with which we compete industrially; and yet when they reach our homes they cost very much more. It is a problem of distribution. No tariff commission will be doing its full duty to the country unless it follows the lines laid down by the last one, and traces every single item from its very beginning to the ultimate consumer and shows the cost at every stage.

RELATION OF TARIFF TO COST OF DISTRIBUTION—ON CHINA.

Let us take some of the articles that are not in such general use and see what per cent of difference the tariff makes in the selling price of those articles. I have in my hands two plates. I know that a dozen plates exactly like this I have here were sold by one of the principal dealers in Chicago less than three years ago for $44. I know that a dozen of exactly these same plates are sold by the American commissary in Colon to the employees of the Government there for $14.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are those the identical plates?

Mr. COPLEY. The identical plates. But there is no duty paid on them on the zone. The commissary pays $11 per dozen for these plates in England. The dealer in Chicago can buy them just as cheap. The duty of 60 per cent adds $6.60. He can lay them down in Chicago for less than $18 per dozen and yet he sells them at $44 per dozen, an apparent profit of $26, or an increase of 144 per cent over the entire cost, including the duty, or 60 per cent of the entire selling price goes to pay the cost of distribution. The duty of $6.60 is only 15 per cent of the selling cost of these plates. The cost of distribution in this instance adds four times as much to the selling price as does the tariff.

Here is another plate which cost the American commissary $12 per dozen, or $1 apiece. The duty on this grade is $7.20 per dozen. They can be laid down in Colon for the American commissary at less than 80 cents additional per dozen, or they can be laid down in New York City at less than $20 per dozen, including duty. I have a letter from a very prominent dealer in New York offering to replace these plates at $60 per dozen. He figures his cost of distribution to be $40 per dozen on these plates, or 200 per cent added to their total cost to him laid down in New York, or exactly 66⅔ per cent of the entire selling price is represented by his cost of distribution. The distribution in this instance adds five and one-half times more to the cost to the ultimate consumer than does the tariff. These articles are not produced in this country and consequently the entire duty is added to their cost. In the case of milk, as I have shown, there is probably nothing added for the tariff. In the case of clothing and cotton goods, and other things in which there is local competition in this country, some percentage of the tariff is added to the cost to the ultimate consumer, and it is worth our while to have figured out for us by a competent and disinterested board just exactly what percentage this amounts to in the various articles of common use by the masses of the people.

Fifty-two per cent of all the men who went to the polls and voted last November indorsed that principle; yet you gentlemen are overlooking that fact and are following a doubtful 42 per cent. When I call them doubtful it is for the reason that many of the Democrats of the North are protectionists at heart. In addition to this, the President undoubtedly received a very substantial number of votes from men who always want the highest kind of a tariff irrespective of the facts, because they were actuated by a fear lest a certain distinguished gentleman, whose methods have not always pleased them, might possibly be elected to the Presidency. Many of these voters are well meaning, but nearsighted. They thought that the specter over their shoulder was the evil one himself. Instead, he is actually offering them and all the rest of the people of this country industrial prosperity on the basis of a square deal for everybody. [Applause.]

Briefly, this shows the difficulty of materially increasing the purchasing power of a dollar unless you remove the duty from those articles which are not produced in this country.

EFFECT OF H. R. 3321 ON WAGES—ON STEEL.

Now, let us look at the other side of the question, the probability of maintaining wages; in other words, at the same time holding up the purchasing power of that dollar when measured by human labor.

Take the question of steel: I submit herewith a statement of the comparative wages paid in this country and in England and Germany, showing that the labor cost of the finished product in Pennsylvania and Ohio exceeds the labor cost in England by approximately 44 per cent and exceeds that in Germany by more than 60 per cent.

Let me here quote from the President's address, on page 132 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 8, 1913:

The object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

It must be apparent to each of you that while we are whetting our wits the rest of the world is also whetting its wits, and if the iron founders of the competing countries have the same intelligence, if they have whetted their wits against ours, if they use the same type of machinery which we have, either they must increase their labor cost to equal ours—an inconceivable hypothesis—or we must decrease our labor cost to equal theirs, not only if we are going to compete in the markets of the world, but if we are going to hold the American market itself against outside invasion. Everything else being equal, matching wits and finding equal intelligence, we must match the prices paid for labor if we are going to continue to compete in the general cost of the finished product.

ON WATCHES.

Take the item of watches: The American watchmaker receives on an average just about two and one-fourth times as much as the watchmaker of Switzerland. Now, if we match only our wits against the wits of the watchmaker in that country, and he uses the same type of machinery as we do, with the lesser wages which he would have to pay, there can be no question as to the fate of that industry in America.

ON TYPEWRITERS.

Typewriters—another industry which uses highly skilled mechanics. The Remington Typewriter Co. maintains plants in the United States, England, Germany, and France, and in the United States averages paying just about twice as much in wages. In this case it does not become a battle of executive wits. These plants are owned by the same people, managed by the same minds, and must necessarily produce the typewriters that are sold in America in whatever country that will put them down in the distributing centers of this country at the lowest figure.

REAL EFFECT ON LABOR.

I will not weary you by going into the balance of the schedules. Some men who are now making boots and shoes in America will find themselves out of employment; so will some men who are manufacturing woolen goods and cotton goods, who are manufacturing steel and watches and typewriters. These men whose occupations in this country are gone will be unable to follow the industry to the other countries. They and their families can not possibly obliterate themselves from the face of the earth. They must live, and the only avenue left is to try to get the job of some other man. The most natural thing would be to attempt to get a place in the same line of industry in which they are trained. That makes two men bidding for one job. There can be but one result. The law of supply and demand, to which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee referred in his speech, governs labor in our present scheme of society just as relentlessly as it does any other department of trade. Prices will be reduced and will be followed by some men being driven from employment in that particular line. Then they will attempt to secure work in some other line, and again wages will be reduced and the purchasing power of all these men will be very much lessened. The farmer and the producer will find his prices reduced. You gentlemen of the majority are going to find the cost of living cut, and you are going to find the purchasing power cut to an equal and probably a very much greater degree.

EFFECT OF H. R. 3321 ON COST OF LIVING.

The cost of living is a relative expression. It makes no difference whatever to a man what he has to pay for the necessities of life when viewed from that standpoint alone, and equally it makes no difference to him what the remuneration for his labor amounts to when viewed from that standpoint alone.

The relation between these two makes all the difference in the world to him. In other words, it is his balance sheet at the end of the day, the month, or the year. Are his wages sufficient to properly nourish and clothe his family and himself? Have they been adequately sheltered, have the children been kept in school, and is some balance left over for the savings account at the end of the year? This is the true measure of success or failure of the tariff, and this is the yardstick which the people of this country are going to apply to House bill 3321.

There are approximately 7,000,000 men in this country who derive their principal income from the farm. Excluding the comparatively small percentage engaged in garden and truck farming the balance of them are producing articles which must either find a market in this country or else they must be thrown onto the markets of the world. Each country has its own particular market place for the various kinds of commodities. For instance, Chicago is the American market for wheat. Liverpool is the world's market for the same commodity. Whenever all the wheat that is produced in this country is consumed by our own people the farmer gets the Liverpool price at Chicago, and 7,000,000 men and their families in this country, or practically 35 per cent of all our people, are made more prosperous by the difference in freight rates between Chicago and Liverpool, which has been saved to them by the home market. When they are prosperous they buy more freely of the wares fashioned by the artisan as he works at his bench, and he has in consequence more hours of work and a pay envelope bringing in every week more money and more ability to buy the products which come from the farm and which tend to keep his family and himself in the best possible condition.

H. R. 3321 FAVORS COTTON GROWERS.

May I refer to the agricultural economic condition as it affects the Democratic Party, or rather as it is affected by the Democratic Party? You represent more than a century of specializing in a certain agricultural line in which you practically have no competition with the rest of the world, and it is true it makes very little difference to you where your cotton is spun into fabrics. You practically control the world's market for raw cotton. You and your constituents may be individually benefited by the removal of all tariff duties, thus enabling you to buy all your supplies cheaper without materially reducing the value of your principal agricultural product, but the value of your product is less than one-seventh of the value of the total agricultural products of this country, and the benefits which you receive by the reduction in the cost of other necessary articles probably would not be materially offset by a reduction in value of your cotton on the farm.

But how about the Democrat who represents Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, Colorado, Illinois, and all the other States where sheep are produced when the duty is removed from wool? How about the Democratic Members of Congress from States where they grow cane sugar—Louisiana, Georgia, and Texas—and where they grow beet sugar—Colorado, California, and Michigan? Can the same thing be said with equal truth of them? Why, 40 per cent of all the cotton cloth manufactured in this world is manufactured in Great Britain, about 20 per cent in the United States, and 10 per cent in Germany. A reduction in the tariff that would affect the prosperity of 60,000,000 or 65,000,000 of the people in the Northern and Western States would, to a small degree only, curtail the buying power of cotton goods in the world, probably not more than 2 per cent, and such a trifling decrease in the value of the entire world's demand would be met by a decrease in the production of raw cotton at the points where it costs most to produce it—India and Egypt. I want to compliment the gentleman from Alabama, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. He is certainly providing for his own in this bill, and so far as it has worked its passage he has engineered it through the House with apparently the same delicate tact which overcame all obstacles in the committee of which he is the head and also in caucus. House bill 3321 clearly reestablishes not only in America but in the entire world the old kingdom of cotton. There would be no Democratic Party but for the cotton-producing States. You have more than enough sure electoral votes to furnish a majority of the number necessary to elect a President. You dominate every Democratic national convention and you dominate every caucus of the Democratic Members of Congress. You are the only reliable Democrats, and the economic value of your natural, world-wide monopoly in the growth of raw cotton has made you free traders. Why, when the great leader of the Progressive movement sought to break into your "solid South" he made only one mistake. You gentlemen are not Democrats because of sentiment; the reason is economic. Your raw cotton will bring as much and will not cost as much for labor and certainly not for jute and steel bands with which to cover and bind your bales. You will save a little something on your woolen clothes and a little something on your finished cotton cloth. You will save some more on sugar, for sure, unless the trust swallows it up. You will be able to buy your agricultural implements a little cheaper, and your mechanical cotton pickers—if they ever do come—will be made in Germany or England, and your labor will also be under much better control.

INCOME TAX.

This bill is really a freak of the intellect. It carries two ideas on the same trunk—one almost a free-trade tariff, the other a graduated-income tax. You Democratic gentlemen have been very clever in this. You are putting men who do not agree with you on the tariff, but who do agree with you on the principle of a graduated-income tax, in a serious dilemma. I have always believed in such a tax; the principle is correct. It places the burden of taxation on the shoulders of the people who are best able to bear it. All governments are established for the purpose of guaranteeing security to life and security in the enjoyment of property or an income. The graduated principle is absolutely sound, because, in addition to placing the burden on the shoulders that can best bear up such a tax, it also places it on the shoulders of the people who enjoy most that stability which our Government guarantees to property. Take the humblest workman and the richest man: The Government guarantees to each his life, and it is of equal value to the two egos. It guarantees to each the enjoyment of his property and his income, but I do not think any man in this Chamber will tell me that such a guaranty is enjoyed by both men in equal part. This bill is by no means as radical as I would wish, and I shall take the opportunity to attempt to amend it when we come to that section under the five-minute rule. However, this beginning is in the right direction, and I shall not vote against it. Like everyone else here, I have always thought it cowardly to dodge a vote; but I will not vote against that income tax, nor any other. It is the only way we can get a start. Nor will I vote for that tariff bill nor any other like it; and I am going to choose that which appears on the surface as a coward's position. I am going to refuse to vote one way or the other on that bill combining those two principles; and I will say to you that whether or not it takes courage for a man to be a coward, I am going to leave that to the individual judgment of each Member of this Congress. However you decide on this question, I myself am thoroughly resolved that if I am alive and well I will be in my seat when this bill is voted on and will vote "present," as being the only way in which I can conscientiously express my sentiments on a double-headed bill of this sort, one half of which meets with my entire approval and the other half of such a nature that I could never vote for it.

GRADUATED INCOME TAX THE REAL SOLUTION.

My own opinion is that a protective tariff is absolutely necessary for the industrial prosperity of the 85 per cent of the people of this country who work for a living, and if it could not be exactly equitable I would rather have it too high than too low. With the income-tax amendment read into the Constitution of this country you have in your hands the greatest equalizer of the inequities that have followed the tariff or any special privilege that has been put into the hands of a legislative body. I agree with you that the present tariff law brings in many inequities, but I do not believe you are curing them with this bill, for I think it is the poison of industry. But I do believe that you could cure them by a properly adjusted graduated income tax. I believe it to be a remedy that could be used in conjunction with a protective tariff, but I do not believe that it will prove an antidote to the industrial poison of free trade. It is absolutely necessary to gather in this country wealth if we are going to distribute wealth equitably among our people; and that the tariff has assisted in the gathering of wealth is perfectly evident from a study of the census decade by decade since the system of protection has been the guiding principle of our fiscal law. That it has been equitably divided I do not claim. I do not believe it has. The only civilized country that now adheres to a free-trade doctrine is England, and there is more hardship and want and suffering and pauperism in free-trade England than in any other country on the face of the globe. They have tried the income tax, but it does not remedy the trouble. The fact is no adequate remedy will ever be found that does not provide prosperity for the great mass of the people. President Wilson was right—a people must be prosperous if they are well governed—and if House bill 3321, carrying his sanction, makes for the general prosperity of the masses of our people, he ought to have the unanimous indorsement of all political parties; and if it fails, he and you know the penalty. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'HAIR). The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I shall use all of the time which the leader of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee has so generously assigned to me; but in the time that I shall speak I want to say something about some of the provisions of this bill and something about the general policies that are involved in its consideration. In the first place, I want to say that with much that my friend from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY] has said I agree. I agree with him in what he has just said in favor of a protective tariff. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the industrial history of this country has demonstrated beyond question that that system of tariff that we call the protective system is necessary for the maintenance of the continued welfare and prosperity of the Republic, so that in that regard I am in entire accord with the gentleman from Illinois who has just spoken. I agree with him that we ought to have a protective tariff. I agree with him, secondly, that that tariff ought to have such rates as will equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. I agree with him in the third proposition, that that difference in the cost of production at home and abroad should be ascertained not by the quasi investigations that may be carried on behind the locked and closed doors of a caucus room but upon the findings of a tariff board or a tariff commission. [Applause on the Republican side.] I agree with him in another thing—and I think the great majority of the American people are in agreement upon that proposition—and that is that the time has passed when successfully any political party in this country can legislate in secret caucus by dark-lantern methods. [Applause.]

I am in agreement with my friend upon that proposition. I agree with him upon another proposition. For many years I have been in favor of an income tax. I am now in favor of an income tax; but here is where I part with my friend. I would be glad to vote for a reasonable income tax; and in saying that I think I am announcing good Republican doctrine, because there could not have been and would not have been any opportunity to vote in this House for an income-tax law had it not been for the action of a Republican Congress. Therefore, I do not think I am guilty of political heresy in saying that I am in favor of an income tax; but here is where I part company with my friend. It seems to me that the tariff provisions of this bill are so unfair, so unjust, so unwarranted, so unreasonable, that I can not bring myself to the point where I think I would be serving my constituents simply by sitting quietly by and voting "present" when this bill is put upon its passage. I feel that I can not discharge that duty other than by registering, as I shall do, my vote, and, so far as I am able to do so, my voice against any such legislation as this. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY] referred to another very important proposition which I hope to discuss a little later in my remarks, and that is the influence of local custom in the retail trade, so far as prices are concerned. We talk here and upon the hustings a great deal about the tariff. We say much about its influence upon prices—and it has an influence—but the fact is, Mr. Chairman, that there are other forces at work that perhaps have as much to do in shaping prices in this country as does the tariff. I refer to the peculiar custom of local trade.

Complaint is registered against the American farmer, and in this bill the things he produces are upon the free list, or rates greatly reduced, upon the theory that because of the fact that in the past few years he has received fairly remunerative prices that the expense of the product to the consumer is thereby increased. Complaint was made here the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama because, as he said, the price that the farmer was getting for his product had increased some 93 per cent since 1897. The farmer was and is entitled to this increase. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the increase in price, the high cost of living, so-called, does not come to any considerable extent from the increase that has come in the price that the farmer gets for his product. The fact is that the big increase in price comes from the time that the products leave the hands of the farmer until they reach the hands of the consumer. Just an illustration, and I will come to that more fully a little later, but as an illustration of that proposition I live in a section of the country where we have great onion fields, perhaps the greatest in the country, 5,000 acres in a single county. I happen to know that this is true—and I got the facts from a careful investigation made by the Department of Agriculture—I happen to know that of the price the consumer of onions pays in New York or Philadelphia or Boston when he buys them by the peck, the farmer back in the eighth district in Ohio, who owns the land or rents it, who buys the seed, who hires the labor, who contributes his own efforts, who runs the risk, the farmer who plants the crop and tills the crop and finally harvests the crop, pulls the onions and sorts them and crates them and puts them on the car, the man who does all that work gets out of every dollar that is paid for onions in the markets of New York, Boston, or Philadelphia only 28 cents; somebody else between the farmer and the market gets the 72 cents. The framers of this bill, presuming to say that they are going to benefit the consumers of this country, are cutting the duty upon onions in half, i. e., from 40 cents per bushel under the present law to 20 cents per bushel under the Underwood bill.

I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this bill shall be enacted into law—as I very much fear it may be—if it should become the law the price that the consumer has to pay is not going to be changed materially. The price that the farmer gets for his onions will be lowered a great deal, but the change that comes about through the reduction in the tariff of one-half, as is proposed by this bill, is going to be eaten up by the middleman, not by the man who goes into the field and tills and raises the crop, but by the jobbers and the wholesalers—the people who are producing nothing. On the subject of the tariff on onions a prominent Democratic farmer of Hardin County, Ohio, comments as follows in a letter addressed to me:

> The proposed tariff bill would destroy our business, and as much soil is only adapted to onions, it would be a great hardship, owing to the cheap labor in the Bermuda Islands. We, of course, could not compete with them. Besides the freight rate from our section is 24 cents per hundred pounds, 30 cents from Indiana points, 30 cents from Michigan points, and 16 cents from the Bermuda Islands to New York, and correspondingly low to all the Atlantic points.
> In our product, in fact, nearly all those articles under Schedule G require large outlay for labor and to let those articles to our shores free would entirely destroy the demand for this help, as these articles would come to our shore in the form of finished product, and it would be a loss to our Nation.
> Counting the use of an acre of land worth $12; preparing the ground for seed bed and drilling the seed, $5; hand cultivating and hand weeding, $30; fertilizers, $10; pulling onions, $4; topping, say, 300 bushels at 3 cents a bushel, $9; screening and sacking 300 bushels at 2 cents a bushel, $6; hauling to the cars, at 3 cents per bushel, $9; use of 300 crates at 3 cents per crate, $6; moving crates from sheds to field and return, $2; 5 pounds of seed, at $1.60 per pound, $8. This gives us $101. Our annual crop report gives us 300 bushels per acre as an average yield per acre in all the onion fields. This is about what our section produces. You will notice this gives us nothing for our own labor, and as the man who superintends an onion farm can do little other than watch the detail of his business, one can not grow an acre of onions and support his own family for less than $120 per acre. The average fall price here in the last 10 years has been 40 cents per bushel. You will note that the cost of producing onions is mainly labor: Cultivating, weeding, pulling, screening, sacking is all hand labor, besides preparing seed bed and hauling away crop. At this very time we are selling onions from 20 to 30 cents per bushel. We are delivering onions in our cities, freight paid, from 30 to 40 cents per bushel. And at this time these same onions go to the city trade at $1 per bushel and 20 cents for one-half peck. The high cost of living is blamed to the farmer. The fact remains that nearly all vegetables are delivered at the cities at 25 per cent of the prices paid by the ultimate consumer.

And that leads me to inquire, Mr. Chairman, whether the policy that was laid down here by the distinguished and courteous and able gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is the correct one in this respect. The gentleman said in his opening remarks in this debate that this bill marked a new era. I think that is true if it shall become the law, a different era, anyhow, and then he went on to say, with his usual eloquence and lucidity, that the time had come when we should cease to consider producers and should consider consumers. Mr. Chairman, that is a very serious proposition. Is this country to take the position that from now on legislation in State and Nation shall be had not for the benefit of the men who toil but for the benefit simply of those who consume? Of course everybody recognizes that these classes are overlapping all the time, but I insist, Mr. Chairman, that if we shall legislate in this country that producers have work, if we shall legislate that the laboring man have a chance to earn an honest dollar by honest toil, if the farmer has a market for his products, if the miner has a chance to dispose of the product of his toil, if we shall so legislate and shape affairs in this country that all the producers are prosperous, that all producers have work, then it seems to me that the question of consumption of goods can be left very largely to take care of itself [applause on the Republican side], and, so far as I am concerned, I totally disagree with the proposition that we are to ignore the producers.

I have stood, and the party to which I belong has stood, and now stands, for a policy that says it is better to have men working here, our own men, beneath our own flag, in our own country, than to have goods produced elsewhere. [Applause on the Republican side.] It may seem high political heresy to some of my good friends on the other side that we should say such a thing as that, but, Mr. Chairman, I can not get that idea out of my mind that somehow it is the duty of the American Congress when it is levying taxes—as it was admitted in a number of eloquent addresses on that side this afternoon that we must levy—that it is wise and desirable and statesmanlike so to levy those taxes as to discriminate in favor of our own people. I believe in American industry, in the American farmer, and the American laboring man. I do not care very much about the industries of Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.] To me it is a matter of shame and regret that at this very moment the highest encomiums that are being pronounced upon this proposed legislation come from the trade journals of Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They are in high glee. They say the good old times are coming back when they were supplying the American market. The trade journals of France and Germany and England are pointing with pride to the probable action of this House. But somehow, Mr. Chairman, I have an idea that it would be wiser if we were proposing so to legislate as to secure the favorable comment of our own trade journals, of our own people, and to merit the acclaim of our own workingmen and our own farmers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have before me an interesting though weird political document. It is the platform that was adopted at the convention of the Democratic Party in the city of Baltimore. One plank of that platform reads as follows:

We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation—

Now, note this—

we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

That is a very careful, conservative, comforting, and reassuring sort of a pronouncement. And then, to make the people of this country feel perfectly confident that the Democratic Party could be trusted on the tariff question, President Wilson felt called upon to say, at Pittsburgh, on October 18 last, the following:

I welcome the opportunity of stating what I believe to be the well-considered position of the Democratic Party with regard to the tariff. It is absolutely essential that we should be entirely frank with one another in the discussion of this fundamental question.

Now, note this, brethren:

The Democratic Party—

Now, this is the official announcement by the head of the party, interpreting the plank in the platform which I have just read:

The Democratic Party does not propose free trade or anything approaching free trade.

I desire to use those two interesting statements as a text for a little bit of exegesis, first, from the platform, where it says:

We favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

And then, secondly, what the President says:

The Democratic Party does not propose free trade or anything approaching free trade.

And then to make us trebly assured that it was all perfectly safe and pleasant and harmonious and happy the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said, in his eloquent opening address, something about lowering the duty not with an ax but with a jackscrew. And while I can not quote just his language the implication was that by this bill we would be lowering the tariff carefully and slowly, not knocking the tariff all to pieces, not using the ax but letting things down gradually with a jackscrew. Was it not upon that theory that this same Democratic Party told us only 12 months ago that the last word on the subject of tariff on wool was 20 per cent ad valorem, that it was needed as a matter of revenue? That was the proposition then, and yet in view of this proposition that no legitimate industry is to be interfered with, in view of the statement that the tariff is to be gradually reduced and let down with a jackscrew, in view of those two statements a bill is brought in here, I honestly believe, contrary to the judgment of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, providing that the woolgrowing industry of this country is to be destroyed at one fell swoop on the theory, is it not, that the raising of sheep, the growing of wool, is not a legitimate industry; or is it upon the theory that this statement in the platform and this quotation from the speech of President Wilson were intended, as a good many planks in Democratic platforms are intended, as something not to stand upon but to get in on?

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is not in compliance even with the terms of the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore. If it had complied with it, it would have been bad enough, but it is even worse than that. Without any notice, in the face of implied promises to the contrary, wool is put on the free list, and so is practically everything else that the farmer produces, on the theory that we are to have a gradual, harmless reduction of the tariff.

That leads me to discuss why it is not wise, in my humble opinion, to put wool on the free list, as is proposed in this bill, at the behest, I think, of the President of the United States, and contrary, I believe, to the judgment of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, although I am not informed as to that. Nobody is informed as to that. The country is not informed about that. The country is left in the dark. We are left to implication and rumors as to what occurred in the dim secrecy of the Democratic caucus chamber.

Here is the first reason why it is not wise to put wool on the free list: I start with the assumption that it is not desirable to wipe out sheep raising and woolgrowing in this country. I think it means much to this Nation to be able to produce a large proportion of the clothing wool which it uses, and I call attention to this important fact that every time our Democratic friends have undertaken to tinker with the tariff, or every time anybody has undertaken to tinker with the tariff by reducing the rate, the sheep industry and the woolgrowing industry have very seriously fallen off. For example, it seems that somehow, according to the laws of Nature, there is a rate, a natural rate, and if we reduce the tariff below that rate, the sheep-raising and woolgrowing industries will suffer, and unless the rate is changed those industries will probably be destroyed.

Effect upon the number of sheep of 5 experiments during the past 42 years with revision of the wool tariff.

[Whenever the duties have been below 11 cents per pound on wool of the first class, flocks have always decreased, and, on the other hand, when the duties have been as at present (11 cents per pound or higher) they have always increased.]

Year of enactment.	Term of existence.	Rate of duty per pound.	Per cent of increase (+) or decrease (−).
		Cents.
1867	Last 4 years of it	12½	+25
1883	About 6 years	10	−16
1890	Less than 4 years	11	+10
1894	do	Free.	−21
1897	12 years	11	+46

Under the act of 1867, during the last four years of it, the tariff rate was 12½ cents a pound on wool. In those four years woolgrowing and sheep raising in this country increased 25 per cent. Then, under the law of 1883, for about six years of that law, the rate was only 10 per cent. The industry fell off in those six years 16 per cent, whereas it had increased in the preceding four years 25 per cent. Under the four years of the McKinley law of 1890, with a rate on raw wool of the first class of 11 cents per grease pound, there was an increase in the woolgrowing and sheep-raising industry of this country of 10 per cent; and then under the Wilson law, in effect only a comparatively short time, something like three years, with free wool, which you are proposing in this bill, that industry fell off 21 per cent. And yet gentlemen affect to believe, or, at any rate, to say that they believe, that the enactment of this bill into law will not injure any legitimate industry!

Well, if that is so, it simply means this: That the teachings of history amount to nothing; that when we come to make a tariff law we ought to reject our experience and consult simply our imagination and our invention. The teaching of history is exactly the reverse of the contentions of the gentlemen who are favoring free wool.

Then under the act of 1897, with the rate the same as it had been under the McKinley law, there was an increase of 46 per cent in the product.

History will repeat itself. If this law goes into effect, mark you, gentlemen, and particularly my friends on that side of the aisle who happen to come from sections particularly interested in woolgrowing, as some of you do, I warn you that the same thing will occur that occurred under the Wilson law.

The sheep-raising industry will be practically destroyed. The farmers who are now engaged in that industry will have to seek other lines of employment, and the question is whether, in the long run, this country is going to be benefited any by that proposition. And I wonder what my friends on that side of the aisle who come from States that do have some interest in the woolgrowing industry are going to say to their people when they get back home and undertake to tell their people about the vote they have cast on this tariff bill when inquiry is made as to why, contrary to every law that we have had for many years, they separated in this bill wool and goat hair. There are other jokers and funny things in this bill, quite a good many of them. I do not know whether attention has been called to this by anyone or not.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. For a brief question. I have only a short time.

Mr. SLOAN. Will it be a sufficient answer to those constituents for them to say that marvelous juicy patronage was exchanged for their votes, and that until their votes were cast attractive and desirable committeeships were held in abeyance?

Mr. WILLIS. I could not really answer that question, but the suggestion might be very apropos.

Relative to this tariff on goat hair, I wish that every Member of the House would get the tariff hearings on Schedule K, No.

20, January 28, and turn to page 4049, and read there some of the most interesting material that I have ever found anywhere:

EXTRACTS FROM HEARINGS.

The CHAIRMAN. If we separate mohair from wool, we must follow that policy all the way down the line, in the finished products as well——

Mr. ROBERTSON (interposing). That is what we want you to do, Mr. Chairman, and that is what you ought to do.

The CHAIRMAN. If we do that, we have a difficult proposition, although I understand that wool and mohair are never mixed, and that mohair in some respects is a luxury. But it is every day becoming a necessity. There is really no better summer suit in a hot country for a man to wear than a mohair suit. You recognize that?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes; it is cheap.

The CHAIRMAN. It is cheap and it is cool.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is becoming more and more a necessity. I realize that, but at the present time it is a luxury and it ought to be taxed. The rich ought to be made to pay for these things, and the Government must be sustained.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KITCHIN. Most of the Angora goats are in Texas, are they not?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes; most of them in the United States are in Texas.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, I meant in the United States. How large is your flock?

Mr. ROBERTSON. We have about 3,000 goats; about two flocks.

Mr. KITCHIN. How much have you increased your flocks in the last five years?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Five years ago we had 5,000 goats; to-day we have only about 3,000 goats.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. You are one of the Democrats who believe in protection?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree with you.

Mr. ROBERTSON. And I believe we will get it. I believe this Ways and Means Committee will consider our cause. I believe that they will give us a specific duty of 12 cents a pound, and I believe that we can present to the Ways and Means Committee, if not just at the present time, later on, facts and figures that will demonstrate and prove to you beyond the shadow of a doubt that you have no idea and can get no idea under your present law of how much mohair is produced——

Mr. KITCHIN (interposing). Twelve cents per pound is about 40 per cent ad valorem?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. You are cognizant of the fact that the 16 Texas Representatives and the two Texas Senators voted for this reduction last year on mohair?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir; I am.

Mr. KITCHIN. Were they acquainted with the facts relative to your industry?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think not. Even if they were—grant that they—we people are in too small a minority; we are very small.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KITCHIN. I think you are consistent, Mr. Robertson.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I believe that the Representatives from Texas and the Senators did right, because, as I say, we are a small minority up yonder in the hills. They did not know that we were in existence. Some of them, perhaps, have never seen an Angora goat. They are among the farming class and the cotton-raising class. If I should cut off a lock of this Angora hair, some of them would think it was cotton. If I should put it in a boll they would say, "That is beautiful cotton; it must be Egyptian cotton."

Mr. FORDNEY. You are now speaking of your Texas neighbors?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am speaking of our Representatives from Texas. I realize, gentlemen, that we are a small minority out yonder in the hills, away out yonder on the bleak hills, where we can not water our stock. We do water our stock when the wind blows and the windmills are in good condition.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, you believe in having a protection of 12 cents a pound on your raw material, which is leaving it the same as it is in the Payne-Aldrich Act, and that the manufacturers who buy your raw material and produce goods from them ought to have some protection?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Certainly I do; they must have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. You are not like some of these men who want their stuff protected and the other fellow's stuff not protected?

Mr. ROBERTSON. No; it is necessary if they are to prosper.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think you ought to move up to Michigan.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No; if I moved up to Michigan I could not raise Angora goats.

Mr. FORDNEY. But you would be a Republican, all right.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am viewing the proposition from a Republican standpoint somewhat now, and yet I am a Democrat, and I am pleading for revenue.

Mr. KITCHIN. You are a Democrat from habit and not from principle.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir.

The first thing is an admission by the distinguished chairman of the committee that mohair is not a luxury but a necessity. Then later on in the hearings, which I will not take the time to read, but which I shall place in the RECORD, this gentleman who is arguing for his industry, a gentleman from Texas, by the name of Robertson, goes on to explain how it is that his industry has not received proper consideration heretofore at the hands of the Representatives from that State. Why, he even says in one place that they are unacquainted with the location of his industry. He says here on page 4052:

They did not know that we were in existence. Some of them, perhaps, had never seen an Angora goat. They are among the farming class and cotton-raising class.

Now, listen to this:

If I should cut off a lock of this Angora hair, some of them would think it was cotton. If I should put it in a boll, they would say: "This is beautiful cotton. It must be Egyptian cotton."

That is the opinion that he expressed—I think quite unfairly and wrongfully—concerning the Representatives from his State, because they are all of them of distinguished ability, and one of them—I wish he were here now—is of special alertness and eloquence, always on the job, looking after the interests of his constituents. He is a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

In the laws that we have had heretofore wool and Angora goat hair were in the same schedule, and they ought to be now; but this distinguished, eloquent, and able Representative from the Lone Star State, Mr. GARNER, a member of the committee, always is alert in looking after the interests of his constituents.

I speak of this not by way of complaint; I compliment him for his activity. He saw to it that when this tariff bill was written wool and Angora goat hair for the first time went into separate schedules. I want to refer to that particularly just now. I have before me H. R. 3321, the pending tariff bill. For example, now, let us take the raw material first. The wool that is produced upon the farms of the North is put upon the free list, but if you will turn over to page 77 of the bill, paragraph 314, you will find this interesting item, which separates wool and Angora goat hair. Wool goes on the free list. It was not desirable that the product of the great State of Texas should be thus placed upon the free list, and consequently the gentleman, with his distinguished ability, prevailed upon the committee to make a new arrangement. Consequently on page 77 of the bill you will see this interesting item. While the wool of the sheep is on the free list, this item reads:

314. Hair of the Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and all hair on the skin of such animals, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Do you see the point of that? Then we will go on a little further. Under section 295 we read:

Combed wool or tops, 15 per cent ad valorem.

That is the product of the sheep of the northern farms. But, lo and behold, tops made from the hair of the Angora goat, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Oh, I tell you there is nothing like having a Representative on the committee who takes an interest in his constituents. I do not say that offensively, now, but rather by way of compliment. It is a great thing to have somebody to look after things. The unfortunate thing about it was that the 600,000 woolgrowers of the United States from the northern farms had no one to speak for them amongst the Democratic members of that committee. If there had been a Representative as active in their behalf as was the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in behalf of the raisers of Angora goats, no doubt there would have been a different story to tell.

And so it runs all through the schedule. It is wonderfully interesting.

296. Yarns made wholly or in chief value of wool, 20 per cent ad valorem.

But in paragraph 316 you see:

Yarns made of the hair of the Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, 30 per cent ad valorem.

So it runs all the way through. It is, according to the philosophy of these gentlemen, necessary and desirable that wool should be put upon the free list, but when it comes to the product of the Angora goat of the State of Texas, even though this gentleman did testify in the hearing that the gentlemen from his State did not know anything about Angora goats and could not tell Angora goat hair from cotton, could not tell a goat from a boll weevil [laughter], yet when it came down to arranging the rate it was shown that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] did know about the Angora goat, and he did look after the interests of those who raised the Angora goats. You gentlemen over there from the wool-growing States of the North and from the wool-growing States of the West and Southwest propose to vote for this bill to put wool on the free list and yet to protect the Angora goats that have the good fortune to live in the district so ably represented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. For a brief question.

Mr. NORTON. Does it not look, from the arrangement of the schedule, as if these Democrats from Northern States and from Western States were sent here to Congress to look after the Texas goat rather than their own sheep industry at home?

Mr. WILLIS. It looks to me as if the southern Members had got the "goat" of the northern Members. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Can not the gentleman see that this is an infant industry that needs protection?

Mr. WILLIS. That may be so; I had not thought of that phase of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed to another phase of this tariff on wool. Another matter I wish to refer to is why we can not have and ought not to have free wool in this country. The fact is, as shown by a carefully prepared report of the Tariff Board, that the wool of our greatest competitors, namely, Australia, South Africa, and South America, figuring the cost of production of that wool on exactly the same basis upon which they figure the cost of the production of wool in this country, the wool of Australia, our chief competitor, and the wool of South Africa is going to the market with no charge against it at all. If you have any doubt about that you can find it fully elucidated in volume 2 of the report of the Tariff Board.

This is, on page 350, where they use the following language:

There remains, therefore, only the simple operation of subtracting from the flock expenses the receipts from other sources than wool, to reveal the fact that as against a clearly demonstrated net charge against the western American wool of from 10 to 11 cents, there is probably not more than 4 to 5 cents per pound against the South American clip, and if the season is normal and the sheep market steady, little, if any, charge against the Australian. Indeed, well-managed stations in many parts of Australia are showing at the present time a profit before any wools are sold.

This qualification is generally applicable to the stock trade in all of the larger sheep districts of Australia. Statements similar to the above are made by two other prominent owners with regard to returns from surplus stock in Queensland and Western Australia. But both say that in good years, and on well-managed runs, the sales of sheep yield enough to pay working expenses. One of these anticipates that, in view of the increasing exports of Australian mutton and lamb, the surplus station stock will in future years give an annual return considerably in excess of the amount of the working expenses—assuming that no large addition is made to the cost of labor in the meantime.

In the light, therefore, of the best information to be obtained, the board believes that at the present time the entire Australian output of merino and crossbred wool (interest being left out of account, as in the case of the United States) is moving to market, under present receipts from sales of sheep, with a net average charge of but a few cents per pound; and this estimate apparently holds good of New Zealand and the African Cape as well.

Now, on page 514 of this same volume, it is shown that in South Africa the same condition obtains. The statement is as follows:

Sale of surplus stock and mutton: In the Cape Province fat ewes are reported as selling for $4.50 per head and fat lambs 5 months old at $4. Old ewes are readily sold for local slaughter at from $2.50 to $3 per head, according to their flesh.

At the present time the demand for mutton is so strong that there is a good profit in breeding the woolless sheep for mutton alone. Where the sheep combine both wool and mutton the profits must naturally be much greater.

Cost of production: The average shearing per head is estimated at 6 pounds, with an average price received by the growers of 13½ cents per pound.

With an average valuation on breeding sheep of $2.50 per head and an investment, excluding lands in improvements and equipment per head of not over 40 cents per year, and taking into account the low cost of wages and provisions, the moderate leasing values of their grazing lands, the mild winters which do not demand other food for the animals than that found on the ranges, the strong demand for mutton of all classes, it is evident that the African woolgrower is able to meet all his expenses from the sale of his surplus stock and mutton, leaving the wool as a clear profit on his investment.

One flock owner in Rhodesia reports he can sell his wool at 12 cents per pound and make money.

That is to say, put it this way: The sheep men of Australia or South Africa, if they chose to do so, could absolutely give their wool away, realize nothing for it, and still continue in the sheep business. That must be perfectly apparent; that where there is an average charge against wool products of this country of 9.6 cents per pound we can not compete with a country that produces wool that has no charge against it.

Now, there is another reason connected with that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. For a brief question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. From the protection standpoint, what is the gentleman's idea as to the duty on wool, the highest duty and the lowest duty that would be just?

Mr. WILLIS. I think my friend knows that I try to be conservative about it. The fact is that you take the fine merino wools of Ohio, as shown by the report of the Tariff Board, and by the report of the committee on the wool bill of the last Congress, in order to afford full protection to these merino sheep there would have to be a duty on the scoured content of about 24 cents. But I recognize the fact that that proposition must be looked at in a reasonable way. We have got to take something like the average cost of production of wool, and therefore my opinion, based on the report of the Tariff Board, is that the duty on the basis of the scoured content should be 18 cents. Of course, although I have no personal interest in the sheep business, I come from a section that has, and I would be glad to have it 19 or 20 cents, but I am personally of the opinion that 18 cents on scoured wool would give a reasonable protection to the woolgrowers of this country. This opinion is concurred in by the National Woolgrowers' Association and by the farmers and sheepmen of the country generally.

Now, there is another reason why we can not compete successfully with the countries I have named. Of course, I recognize the fact that these men who think it does not make any difference whether we have anything in this country, whether we raise any sheep or not, or whether we build up any industry, will not agree with me, but I think the American people take a contrary view to that of gentlemen who so think, and therefore I want to call attention to these facts taken from the report of the Tariff Board.

Take the average labor cost per sheep in the United States and it is 82 cents. In South America it is 23 cents. In Australia it is 7 cents, or about one-twelfth of what it is in this country. Why, in South Africa there are instances, and many of them, where men are hired at a rate of $1.70 to $3 per month to take care of sheep—men that are clothed in a happy smile and a G string. That is the kind of labor with which we are to compete if this bill goes through. The labor cost is higher, and it ought to be, because the people that are getting the wages are American laborers that receive and ought to receive the highest wage of anybody in the world. [Applause.] Anybody that has investigated beyond the most superficial inquiry knows the wages here are two or three times what they are in foreign countries.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course I am not going to challenge the gentleman's statement about men being clothed in sunshine and a G string.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, it was a sunny smile. I must insist upon the gentleman keeping my metaphor correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A sunny smile and a G string. If the weather be such that men can dress in that fashion, does not the gentleman think that it is pretty hard on the sheep that grows the wool?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not quite catch the point of the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How is it possible for the woolgrowing sheep to live in a climate where men can dress themselves in a sunny smile and a G string?

Mr. WILLIS. I want to say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that that is a question that is not up to me. It is a question that is up to the sheep. As a matter of fact, they do so live by the million. That is a fact. How they do it I do not pretend to know. The conditions to which I refer, in so far as habits of dress are concerned, do not apply to Australia. As the gentleman well knows, Australia is hot and dry, and yet the sheep producing that beautiful fleece of heavy wool thrive there. I do not know how it is, but it is a fact of nature, and we can not argue with that fact.

There is another thing to which I wish to refer, and that is the cost of shearing. The average cost in this country is 9½ cents per head. In Australia it is 7 cents, and in South America 6 cents, and in Africa 2 cents. The labor cost again is vastly higher here. Then, too, take the question of freight. Do gentlemen stop to think that it is cheaper to ship wool from Australia to Boston than it is to ship wool from Idaho to Boston? Here are the facts: The freight rate to the wool market of Boston from the West of the United States is 6 cents on the scoured pound. From Australia it is half of that, 3 cents; from South America, 1 cent and a fraction; and from London, two-tenths of 1 cent. In other words, the producer of Australia, of South America, and of South Africa has a large advantage on the labor cost, and he has an immense advantage in the freight cost; and the result of these things is the unquestioned fact that we can not compete with those countries in the production of wool. As I said, if gentlemen say, "Very well; destroy the sheep industry; wipe it out," then this argument has no effect; but I think the great mass of the American people do not take that view.

There is another question to which I wish to refer very briefly. Some one will ask himself, perhaps, why it is that woolgrowing has not increased in this country. It has not increased rapidly. In fact, it has decreased in some years, and that is a perfectly legitimate question. How does it come, since we have had a tariff, that woolgrowing has not increased? Let us see. In the first place, it is because the protection which the farmer has had has been continually decreasing. While the rates in the law remain the same, certain forces have been at work which I believe I can explain, which have operated to reduce the actual protection every day in the year. What are those forces? Here is one—the development of the frozen-meat trade of Australia, giving a great impetus to the production of wool of light shrinkage. Second, the famous skirting clause in the present tariff law. On this subject the Tariff Board says (vol. 2, p. 382):

The complaint of the grower of domestic wools that he is not now and has not during all these years been receiving the amount of protection nominally extended by the 11 cent duty on the grease pound is based upon the heavy shrinkage of the domestic fleece as against the light-conditioned skirted wools selected for importation primarily for their large net yield. An examination of the existing duties will show that the schedule is constructed upon the theory that wool shrinks 66⅔ per cent in the scouring. Since, however, it is certain that the wools actually imported shrink something less than 40 per cent, it is obvious that instead of paying $11 duty for every 33⅓ pounds of actual wool brought in, the importer is really securing some 60 pounds at a rate of not to exceed 18 cents per scoured pound.

In order that this matter may be more clearly understood, the board has prepared a tabular statement in which the full effect of shrinkages upon the actual operation of the existing wool duties is shown:

Present grease-pound rates with computed scoured-pound equivalents.

Shrinkage.	Actual duty on scoured content.
	Class I wools.—Duty per pound, 11 cents.	Class II wools.—Duty per pound, 12 cents.
75 per cent	$0.44	$0.48
70 per cent	.36⅔	.40
65 per cent	.31⅓	.34⅓
60 per cent	.27½	.30
55 per cent	.24⅔	.26⅔
50 per cent	.22	.24
45 per cent	.20	.21 9/11
40 per cent	.18⅓	.20
35 per cent	.16½	.18 6/11
30 per cent	.15⅔	.17⅐
25 per cent	.14⅔	.16
20 per cent	.13¾	.15

I have no doubt that gentlemen understand what that means. There is a provision in section 368 of the present law that I will read. I think it is only fair, however, in passing, as I criticize this section somewhat, to say that it is no reflection on the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], because he himself has fought for years to have this schedule revised. The provision that I refer to is as follows:

Provided, That skirted wools as imported in 1890 and prior thereto are hereby excepted.

What do they do under that clause? Australian wool is beautiful wool. When I spoke here in the last Congress I had samples of it. It is beautiful wool, not as strong as the Ohio wool. You can pull it apart as you can cotton batting. It is not as good as the Ohio wool in some respects; it is not so strong in fiber, but it is beautiful wool. The producers shear the wool off and spread it out, and they will cut off the legs, the dirty portions, the neck and belly, and simply leave the solid part of the wool, the best of it. Under that clause in the present law that wool comes in as if it were in its natural condition. Couple these two facts together, first the development of the frozen-meat trade, and, second, this practice of skirting, and you have the result that whereas the present law was drawn upon the theory that wool would shrink in the neighborhood of 66⅔ per cent; as a matter of fact, the wool which now comes into the country shrinks not 66⅔ per cent but it shrinks more nearly 40 per cent. That is discussed very briefly in the report of the Tariff Board, to which I simply refer in passing, in volume 2, page 382. Just to make it a clear illustration, suppose we had 100 pounds. The importer buys 100 pounds of wool, and if it shrinks 66⅔ per cent he would have 33⅓ pounds under the present law, and he would have to pay a tariff of $11, and that would make the schedule what the law intended it should be; but let us see how it actually works out.

Instead of shrinking 66⅔ per cent it shrinks only about 40 per cent, and, then, instead of having 33⅓ pounds it will be 60 pounds, and if you will divide the amount of duty he pays by 60 instead of 33⅓ it will be seen the farmer has not been getting anything like 33 per cent protection on the scoured pound. As a matter of fact, it is shown by a table which I shall place in my remarks he has been getting something like 18 per cent. That is why I said 18 cents on the scoured content in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. That is about what the farmer is actually getting under the present law as protection. Some interesting tests were recently made. I happen to know the authenticity of these facts. A fleece of Ohio wool was cut in two and half of it was sent to Boston and the other half to London. That sent to Boston sold at 26½ cents per pound, that sent to London sold for 19½ cents per pound, a difference of 7 cents—not 11, but 7. A fleece of Oregon wool was divided, as I have stated in this case. That fleece of Oregon wool sent to Boston brought 20 cents and that sent to London brought 14½ cents, a difference of 5½ cents. The same thing happened with Wyoming wool. In other words, the protection is not what the law indicates it should be. It has been only something like probably 6 cents on the grease pound or 18 cents on the scoured pound, and that is why the production of wool has not increased more rapidly under the tariff.

Now, I want to call attention to another fact, and that is the effect the tariff on wool has on the price of clothing. It is clearly demonstrable that if all the amount of the tariff is added to the price of the article that on the ordinary suit of clothes the tariff will not increase the price more than 75 or 80 cents a suit. Does anybody believe that simply by taking this tariff off that a suit that you now buy for $20 you will then be able to get it for $19.25? Does anybody think that there will be the slightest change in the retail price?

No one gives it serious consideration, because it is such a small element in the price. Ordinarily you can not make a suit of clothes for the biggest man on earth out of a piece of cloth and put over $2.10 worth of wool in it. How can it be that the removal of tariff on wool is going to have any appreciable effect upon the price of clothing? As a matter of fact, it will have practically no effect. For illustration—and I hold no brief for the wool manufacturers and I shall consider them only incidentally, for I think the terms of the present compensatory duty on wool are unfair and ought to be revised, and I shall vote for an amendment to reduce it—as I say, I hold no brief at all for the wool manufacturer, but I believe in giving even the devil his due. What I object to is free wool for the farmer but protection for the manufacturer. If wool is made free, why not clothes? The fact is, the price of that clothing is not because of the profit the manufacturer makes, but it is because of the profit that is added somewhere else. There is no wool raised in Ohio that will bring over 60 cents per pound, cleaned, and it will not take over 3½ pounds to make 3¼ yards of goods required for a suit. The cost of that wool can not be over $2.10, and there is not any better wool in the world, and this under the present tariff. Whether a suit costs $15 or $75, it can not contain more than $2.10 worth of wool, including the duty, and the rest of the price must be paid to American labor or American profit, and not over 25 cents profit per suit gets to the mill on the average. Twenty years ago department stores paid 80 cents, less 7 per cent, for goods to retail at $1. To-day the big houses will not pay over 62½ cents for goods to retail at $1 and not over 82½ cents for goods that retal at $1.25, and practically no house will pay more than $1.05 for goods that retail at $1.50. A $25 suit for women at retail in department stores in our great cities costs the retailer not more than $15 net, and it contains about $6 worth of dress goods.

A department store selling a suit at $25 gets $10, the mill not over $6, including the tariff on wool and the cost of the wool. Here is a little item I have here taken from a New York paper, an advertisement for one of the big department stores of New York City, which one it is not necessary to say, except it goes to show that they can sell a blue serge suit, special and thoroughly dependable, at $14.75. Now, let us analyze that. The ultimate consumer pays $14.75. The department store pays not over $10. The clothing manufacturer pays for goods not over $3.25. The clothing manufacturer pays for trimming, labor, expense, and profit $6.75, making $10. The department store gets $4.75. The mill gets $3.25, which includes the tariff, cost of wool, etc. The department store makes, by simply hanging up the suit, a profit of more than the farmer gets for raising the wool, more than the manufacturer of the cloth gets for its conversion into cloth.

The single profit that is made in the one handling is more than the total cost of that piece of cloth, including the cost of the wool up to the time it leaves the mill. And then they complain about what an immense profit the farmer is getting, and about the tariff. The clothing manufacturer pays for the goods not over $3.25. He pays for trimming and labor expense and profit, $6.75, making $10. The department store gets a profit of $4.75, a profit of nearly 50 per cent. Here is the actual cost. And yet we complain because the farmer down on the hills of Ohio is getting a little tariff protection upon his product.

I shall place in the RECORD something of an elaboration of what I said at the beginning about the influence of local custom upon prices, to make it clear, if I can, as a matter of fact, that the thing which has the most to do with prices is not the tariff, but these peculiar local customs.

Commodity.	Unit of sale.	Producer's share.
		Per cent.
Milk	Quart	50
Butter	Pound	87
Poultry	do	50

That is to say, the man who runs the dairy farm, furnishes the cow, cares for her, feeds her, and attends to the milking, gets but 50 per cent of what is paid for the milk by the ultimate consumer. In case of poultry, the farmer's wife who raises the chickens gets but 50 cents out of every dollar that is paid for them by the consumer. The producer of onions gets only 28 per cent of the consumer's price. The producer of oranges gets only 20 per cent. The producer of cabbage gets only 48 per cent of the price paid by the consumer. The producer of potatoes gets only $59 out of every $100 paid by the consumer. The man who raises the watermelons gets only 34 per cent of the price to the consumer. In other words, with the agricultural production increasing only slowly and in some cases absolutely decreasing, with only a small share of the consumer's price going to the producer, it is very apparent why the cost of living is high. We see clearly two of the reasons that enter into this great problem. Of course, there are other factors, which it is not our purpose here to discuss.

Mr. Chairman, I see that my time is almost gone, but before I conclude there are some things to which I should like to call attention. I should like to go through Schedule G, in which practically everything that is raised upon the farm is either put upon the free list or the rates are cut in two—the farmer suffers the most heavily of all. Did you notice the duty upon peanuts? It is as interesting as it can be. That is on page 57 of this bill. Before that they had been cutting and slicing right and left, putting cattle, and horses, and sheep, and mules, dead or alive, and swine, and all of those things at greatly reduced rates, and then the brethren, in order to save their faces and keep up appearances, slightly reduced the duty on peanuts. Peanuts unshelled now bear half a cent a pound. They made a tremendous (?) reduction from one-half a cent a pound to three-eighths of a cent a pound, in the interests of the people. And shelled peanuts that now bear a rate of 1 cent a pound—and who ever heard of such magnanimity—are reduced to three-fourths of a cent a pound. A product that is raised in a locality that has not a Member on the committee to look after it has to stand a cut, but peanuts had a friend on the committee, and so they did not suffer.

I will refer in the closing minutes which I have to this free list.

Mr. Chairman, this is a thing grand, gloomy, and peculiar.

Mr. MAPES. Where are peanuts raised?

Mr. WILLIS. In Virginia, North Carolina, and so on down. I am not complaining about that. I am simply bewailing the misfortunes of the poor fellows in Michigan and Ohio and other places who did not have a friend at court. I am not complaining.

When the farmer opens up this free list, there are things that are going to make him happy. He will find broom corn on the free list, and buckwheat is on the free list. But there is compensation. His broom corn has gone down in price, and his buckwheat is not worth enough to fill up a ravine; but what a satisfaction it will be to him when he finds that he can get cadmium free. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. And then if he goes on he will find corn and cornmeal, which he used to get protection on, now on the free list, but bonechar he can get free. Unfortunately, however, that is used only by the Sugar Trust, and consequently is put on the free list for its benefit. Incidentally, the Sugar Trust seems to be wonderfully favored in this bill, as is indicated by the following from the Ohio Farmer of April 26, 1913:

[From the Ohio Farmer, Apr. 21.]

FREE SUGAR.

So far every attempt in the Democratic caucus to alter any of the schedule items in the Underwood tariff measure has been thwarted by the administration forces. Practically every important item has its opponents, but the fiercest fight came, as expected, on the sugar and raw-wool items. The sugar schedule as written into the bill, reducing the duty at once from 1.9 cents to 1 cent per pound, then removing it entirely in three years, was attacked from both sides. Representative BROUSSARD, speaking for the Louisiana sugar raisers, attempted to compromise by proposing a 10 per cent reduction at first, with a progressive reduction every three years, but this was defeated 86 to 15. A free-sugar Member proposed to remove all the duty at once, but to make it effective October 15, to give wholesalers time to adjust their business to the new conditions, but the caucus also voted this down. Opponents of lowering the sugar tariff graphically pointed out that consumers are not now paying the full duty—1.9 cents per pound—on refined sugar, nor the 1.685 cents on raw sugar, nor the Cuban-sugar duty of 1.348 cents, for the reason that refiners, in competition for the domestic market, have so reduced the price that consumers are now paying only a fraction of these duties. Removing the tariff will therefore enable the refiners further to cut prices and hold them down until all the domestic beet and cane sugar producers are put out of business. Then the world's price of sugar at Hamburg would go up, on account of curtailed world's production, an illustration of which is afforded by the fact that a shortage of a million tons, which is less than our domestic production, sent sugar up 2 cents in 1911. Then, with the beet-sugar industry out of their way, the half dozen American refiners would import all their sugar, make their own prices, and grow richer than ever before. Mr. UNDERWOOD says that the only suggestions which President Wilson insisted on inserting in the tariff bill are the free-sugar and free-wool items. Also, it is reported that the President admits that "some of the domestic sugar factories must close, but he hopes that they will reopen later." What would they reopen for? Our farmers are not going to raise sugar beets at a cost of 3.54 cents per sugar pound to compete with the German cost of 2.41 cents (figures are from the Ways and Means Committee report accompanying last year's Underwood tariff bill), especially when all the margin of profit goes into the pockets of the American Refining Co. and its associates. Furthermore, Louisiana cane sugar, because it goes upon the market early in the fall, before domestic beet-sugar supplies are available, has served to keep the price of sugar more uniform the year around. Thus it is made clear that free sugar may benefit none but the half dozen powerful refining concerns, and the "dear consumers" may pay dearer than now.

But as the farmer sees that his corn and corn meal, wheat, and hogs are on the free list he can look up and thank his stars that he can still get cudbear free. [Laughter.] Think of the old farmer with his worn-out trousers and his run-over boots—for his trousers are likely to be worn-out and his boots run-over under the hard times which this bill will bring—going into the store and saying, "Mr. Storekeeper, I want a bushel of cudbear."

That is a thing that you Democrats have promised your constituents. It is a great satisfaction to know that cudbear is on the free list. It is a splendid thing for the farmer. [Laughter.]

Then if the farmer's wife has been so economical as to be able to save up a little lard and take it to market she will find the price has been cut a cent and a half a pound, but, thank God, joss sticks are on the free list, and also old junk. [Laughter.] And if that good mother should happen to want a leech she can get it, because leeches also are on the free list.

This farmer goes on and he finds his beef and veal and mutton and pork and lamb are put on the free list. The prices of the products of his farm have all gone to pieces, but he says, "I am satisfied, because I can get all the manna I want, as it is on the free list." And also meerschaum. I thought that was well put in here, "mere-sham." He finds that the prices on oats and hay have all gone to grass, but, glory be, he can get myrobolans free, and also nux vomica. That helps out. [Laughter.]

And his potatoes, on which he had 25 cents protection, are put on the free list. That is bad for him. It is bad to have the price of his rye and milk and cream reduced by taking off the tariff, but it helps out some to have the farmer know that if he wishes he can still get all the pulu he wants free of duty.

That is a great fundamental doctrine of the Democratic Party—to give the people pulu in great abundance. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

And here is another thing that helps out: Apatite and dividivi are made free. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Then, here is section 613. It will be a splendid thing for the American people, before the effects of this bill are outlived, to have spunk placed on the free list. Here it is. We shall surely need it before we get through with the effects of this bill. [Renewed laughter.] And then if you tell the farmers that the price of hogs has gone down and the price of tallow has gone down, it will comfort them to know that, even with that reduction of price in tallow and hogs, tamarinds are made free. [Laughter.] And that is the case all the way through this bill—a "mere sham." [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, with the full knowledge that any remarks I may make on the pending bill will be futile, yet, in justice to my constituents, I must register a protest against the provisions of these schedules which, if enacted into law, will disastrously affect the people of the first New Jersey district, the people of the entire State of New Jersey, and the people of the whole country. We need only the light of experience to read the handwriting on the wall.

I shall confine my remarks largely to the situation in my own district, though I believe my contention is applicable generally to all other districts and States of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I represent some 200,000 industrious, energetic, prosperous people, and I might say that almost every article we need in our daily life is produced and made in my district and State. On our farms—though ours is not an agricultural State—we raise millions of bushels of wheat, corn, and oats, and about every known article of so-called garden truck. In our factories, mills, and yards we turn out innumerable articles, from steel pens to battleships and merchandising vessels. Thirty thousand wage earners are paid some $15,000,000 yearly, more than the amount paid by the Government to its employees here in the National Capital. Besides our profitable farming communities we have prosperous iron and steel and pottery and woolen plants, while our chemicals, candy, soups, laces, oilcloth, embroidery, stoves, corks, talking machines, and scores of other articles are known throughout not only our own country but all over the world.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize the fact that every one of the industries of my district is subject to the very keenest competition. We have no monopolies and we pay dividends on no watered stock. With possibly one exception, you can not connect us with any so-called trust; and, further, many of the manufacturing concerns of my district can and do pay the highest wages on earth, and make a reasonable profit by exercising the most rigid economy and efficiency in management.

Fifty million dollars have been invested in plants and machinery, and $50,000,000 worth of products are turned out annually. This could only be possible, however, with protection against the products of cheap foreign labor. Remove this protection in whole or in part, as is proposed in this most iniquitous, un-American, free-trade bill, and one of two things must happen in the factories in my district, my State, and all over the country—the mills must close or the workmen must accept foreign wages.

There is no dispute, Mr. Chairman, about this difference in wages. No one denies or will deny that the wages paid in Camden, N. J., are double and treble those paid abroad for the same work. And with the wage cost of an article amounting to from 70 to 90 per cent of its total cost of production, what is going to happen when we are driven to open competition with producers who receive but one-half or one-third of our wages?

We are told that this new tariff will reduce the cost of living. I believe it will, Mr. Chairman. It will mean living in one or two rooms instead of living in a whole house. It will mean one suit of clothes instead of three. It will mean meat occasionally instead of daily. It will mean few, if any, luxuries. It will mean the withdrawal of savings, which in the city of Camden amount to $20,000,000. It will mean a cessation in building, which will affect the workers in the various trades, whose wages will be cut in half or worse because of idle time. And then the merchant and professional man and woman will suffer, till only the pawnbroker will be doing a profitable business. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The President in his message made no allusion to wages. The report of the majority is silent on the matter. The speeches favoring this bill severely let the subject alone, and yet it is the pith of the entire question.

We are told by the astute writers on finance and economics of the country that we are to have a new national wage adjustment. We are told that this bill, if it becomes a law, will revolutionize our wage scale, will disrupt our labor unions, and level our present standard of living toward the foreign plane. Such must be the result, if not the intention, of this bill. It will positively close more than one factory in my district unless our workmen are willing to accept one-half or one-third of the wages they are now receiving. And when that result is brought about, Mr. Chairman, every man, woman, and child in the country must be adversely affected.

My people are already realizing what this bill means. They are sending me petitions bearing thousands of names, not the names of capitalists and manufacturers and bankers, but the names of the men and women of the mills, regardless of party. Some of them remember and refer to the conditions of 20 years ago and beg that we do not repeat that folly.

I have sent this bill to the industrial establishments of Camden, the principal city in my district, and elsewhere, and from many of them I have received candid replies, stating the result that must follow the enactment of its provisions.

The head of the State grange and a practical farmer says:

I haven't had time to make a thorough comparison of schedules, but am fully convinced, so far as I have gone, that the bill will be fatal to agricultural interests.

From the South Jersey Farmers' Exchange comes the following:

We are writing you on request of about 1,000 members of the South Jersey Farmers' Exchange in protest against the bill that is before Congress to take the duty entirely off of potatoes. We think at least there should be not less than 15 cents per bushel duty paid on all foreign potatoes coming into this country. We can hardly believe that you and other Members representing the farmers' interests will allow this bill to go through.

From a letter of the officials of a worsted mill I take the following extracts:

We certainly feel that its effects will be most serious and depressing, for we can not see how the manufacturers will be able to compete against foreign importations with but 20 per cent on yarns and 35 per cent on manufactured goods and clothing, even with wools being admitted free of duty.

* * * * * * *

We are wholly dependent on the weavers of the goods for our business, and what we fear most is that they will not be able to run under a 35 per cent duty at the present scale of wages, in which case they will have no use for our yarns, and we, in turn, will have no use for wool, free or otherwise.

The head of a varnish and paint concern writes:

I can assure you that its provisions will operate most disastrously, as far as our interests in Camden are concerned.

I extract the following paragraphs from a letter concerning the worsted and woolen yarn industry:

From every indication it means practically utter destruction.

* * * * * * *

It is almost certain that there will be very little American cloth made until American labor has been brought down to the level of European labor.

* * * * * * *

An analysis of the last census report shows that in the city of Camden there were about 1,200 persons employed in the manufacture of worsted yarns, receiving $355,000 annually in wages. This means that approximately 16 per cent of our entire population is dependent upon this industry for a livelihood. Strike at the root of this industry and you deprive this portion of our population of the means of support. Nothing could be more disastrous to our city and to the worsted-yarn industry than the passage of House bill 3321.

From a macaroni company comes the following:

As we said formerly, this will practically mean that many American macaroni factories will have to go out of business, as it is impossible to compete with foreign manufacturers, because macaroni is a product that is used principally by foreigners, and they prefer to buy imported goods, especially if they can buy it cheaper than the American product.

A firm in Camden dealing in wool, scoured, carbonized, and combed, writes:

We have carefully considered the portions of the bill relating to our industry, and look upon its passage with very great fear.

* * * * * * *

The proposed bill provides for free wool and 25 per cent on manufactured textiles, and in the light of past experience we can not see where the textile manufacturers have much chance to operate. We believe since the passage of the former bill the textile industry of this country has advanced considerably, possibly to such an extent that the industry might be able to live under the condition of the bill passed in President Cleveland's term, but it surely has not made such strides that it can exist under the provisions of the Underwood bill.

* * * * * * *

It is a national disgrace if this country can not clothe its people, and we thoroughly believe that a bill bearing such a low rate of protection to manufactured textiles will give the industry a severe setback. From the Democratic standpoint of tariff for revenue, the proposed bill will be a great success, in that it will permit the importation of goods in enormous quantities.

A comparatively new industry, that of phototypes, gelatine prints, commercial and art catalogues, send the following:

At its best this industry is but in a state of infancy, and it is to further develop it in this country that we protest against lowering the tariff, as we have found in the past that it is already low enough on work done by this process to make it impossible for us to compete with foreign houses on such things as illustrated post cards and art subjects. Worse still, another lowering of the tariff would mean to us to abandon the industry altogether, as we would be absolutely unable to compete with the in-rush of the printing done by foreign producers.

A petition signed by the employees of the above firm says:

Should the tariff be lowered on the goods of our employers it would be impossible for them to compete with the foreign producers, and consequently they would be compelled either to abandon the industry or reduce our wages to such an extent as to almost deprive us of a decent livelihood, to which we as American citizens are justly entitled.

One of the glaring inequalities of the bill, bearing on an industry in my district, is the fact that a duty remains on burlap, not one yard of which is made in this country. To place this on the free list would work an injury to no citizen of this country, but, on the contrary, would be a positive and substantial advantage to the poorest man, as this commodity is the basis of his carpet—floor oilcloth.

On the other hand, the duty on floorcloth has been changed from 45 per cent to 20 per cent, and this feature, in connection with the fact that the raw material—burlap—carries a duty, makes it practically sure that the American manufacturer of floorcloths can not compete with the manufacturer abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I have quoted the comments of honest business men, of men who know what the effect of this tariff would be and who would be justified in anticipation of its enactment in closing their mills or announcing the reduced wages, which must positively be the only alternative. And in this connection, Mr. Chairman, I could pay no higher tribute to the manufacturers of my district and the State, and to the manufacturers throughout the country, than to call attention to the fact that they have made no threats, they have resorted to no recrimination, but in the face of coming adversity, and ruin for many, they have kept up courage and proceeded as best they could with constantly decreasing orders, keeping their fires lit and their men at work in the hope that in some way disaster may be averted.

I might, in justice to myself and the industries of my district, ask that the bill be amended, but I should have to present as many amendments as we have industries, and as it would only be a waste of time I shall refrain.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do protest against this bill, not alone because of the general reductions that take away the adequate protection our industries need against cheap foreign labor, but because of the vicious features of the measure which increase the duty on raw material that we do not produce and reduce the duty on the finished product. That sort of tariff making, sir, is not only un-American but inhuman and iniquitous to the last degree.

It would seem that there could be nothing worse for our labor and industries than free trade, but worse still is a tariff that taxes the raw material and lets in free, or with a low duty, the finished product. There is no reason and no excuse for such legislation, Mr. Chairman, unless it is the intent and desire to adjust American wages and the American standard of living to the European and Asiatic level.

When the wages of workmen in our mills and factories are reduced to the Democratic free-trade dollar-a-day basis, then the price of farm products must be cut in half and the wages of carpenters, painters, plumbers, masons, bricklayers, paper hangers, decorators, teachers, clerks, and so on, must also be cut in half, with idleness on every hand. There will be no strikes then for higher wages and shorter hours. Instead of a job or two for every man, there will be two or more looking for every job.

There is another point, Mr. Chairman, that should not be overlooked. While you are reducing duties upon a standard American product, other nations are increasing their duties, with the result that our manufacturers will be ground between two millstones.

We are making in my district superior goods, the best made on earth. The cheap imitations of these goods are at present kept out by an adequate tariff; take away this protection and we shall be inundated by the cheaply made foreign product. We are prohibited from selling abroad by foreign tariffs; our home market will be taken away, the domestic industry destroyed, and the inferior substitute will flood our markets. Wherein do we gain?

Again, we find that some of our industries are given slight incidental protection that may enable them to barely exist, and yet our farmers are given no protection whatever, and when the agriculturists of my district or of any other district are unable to make a profitable living, how can they buy the products of the mills and factories?

Why, Mr. Chairman, this bill instead of being called a bill to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government—which it will not provide—and for other purposes, should be called a bill for the emasculation of American wages, the dismantlement of American homes, and the debasement of American men and women.

With all the vigor of which I am possessed do I protest against such a blow to the industries of my district and against such an attempt to ruin the people I represent. I can do no more. But I warn you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the day of reprisal will come as it came in 1824, in 1860, and in 1896—you may bring calamity and disaster and ruin and poverty and suffering, but the people will rise in their might and again restore us to protection and opportunity and prosperity.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the majority, you are taking an unfair advantage in carrying out your designs; you were not asked to frame and pass this vicious tariff measure. On the contrary, a most substantial majority of our voters protested against such legislation at the polls last fall, and a still greater majority would register their disapproval now if they could do so. You were given power by a political fluke. In the vernacular of the day you scored not by a clean base hit, but by being hit by the ball. The American people are opposed to your policy. We are a people who favor adequate protection to home labor and industries. We are in favor of high wages, a high standard of living, comfortable homes, plenty to eat and wear, and opportunity for all with consequent national progress.

This bill, if enacted into law, will bring disaster and ruin and will adversely affect every person in the country except those who profit from the adversity of others. We of the minority can only protest and hope that in some way the evils that threaten us may be in part or wholly averted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am very proud indeed to have the privilege of addressing so large and enthusiastic an audience. [Applause.] I hope my genial friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—and I am glad that he and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] both honor me with their presence and attention—will pardon me if I become personal to the extent of saying that, although I greatly admire the superb qualities of leadership possessed by the gentleman from Alabama and hold him in the highest personal esteem, I was, nevertheless, in favor of the nomination of my old friend CHAMP CLARK for the Presidency. [Applause.]

Millions of honest voters had been persuaded into the firm conviction that protection was unconstitutional and a robbery; that it was a handicap to capital, a burden to the masses, and beneficial only to plutocrats and other selfish enemies of the common people. I felt that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], having been the star performer in that well-staged drama, ought to have been the chief beneficiary of Democracy's ill-gotten gain. [Laughter and applause.] But the Democratic Party is sometimes ungrateful, as Republics are proverbially said to be, and my friend was "turned down." The manner of the "turning down" and the reason for it have nothing to do with the tariff question, and therefore it is not proper that I should discuss the subject here.

Mr. AUSTIN. But he will come back again, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope he will. I do not know whether I shall favor his nomination four years from now or not; but one thing is certain, and that is that if the popularity of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] continues to grow in this country, as a result of his authorship of this bill, as it is now growing in the countries across the sea, where they are looking with longing eyes to our rich markets which the bill will open up to them, then his political future is assured and the attainment of the goal of his ambition certain. [Applause.] Then nothing can keep him out of the White House. Even fusion between Wilson and Bryan and LA FOLLETTE and CLARK and Roosevelt, with the Socialist vote thrown in, could not stop him. [Laughter and applause.]

But will the American people like him as well "after taking" as they do "before taking"? [Laughter.] That is the momentous question. He is not exceedingly popular just now down in the district which I have the honor to represent. My constituents like him well enough, but most of them fear the effect of his bill. However, I will tell him how he can make himself a hero in the tenth district of Kentucky. We raise a good deal of cattle and hogs there, and we also consume a good deal of beef and pork and bacon. We produce a great deal of coal and lumber, but we also use a great deal of those commodities, and the same is true with reference to many other articles I could mention. If he can so shape this bill that he can maintain the price of cattle and hogs and at the same time reduce the price of beef, pork, and bacon to the consumers of those articles; if he can keep up the present price of coal and lumber to the producer and at the same time cheapen them to the consumer; in a word, if he can devise some sort of automatic process working both ways whereby the wages of labor can be maintained as well as the prices of what labor produces and at the same time these products can be cheapened to the consumer; then, indeed, I am almost willing to concede that he could come very near carrying that rock-ribbed Republican district as the nominee for the Presidency in 1916.

I earnestly hope that he can do these things, because I want to see all the people of my district get a square deal and their share of the beneficence of this bill. I confess that I entertain serious doubts as to whether all this is possible, although I really think that you Democrats are in earnest about it and really believe that you can accomplish this devoutly wished-for result. I give you credit for the utmost good intentions, but I beg to remind you that there is a certain road which is said to be paved with that kind of material.

I will admit that I used to be quite considerably prejudiced against Democrats, and sometimes I even doubted the patriotism of some of them. When I was a boy and heard that good old camp-meeting song—

Show pity, Lord! O Lord, forgive!
Let a repenting rebel live—

I thought it was a generous plea of a righteous Republican to the good Lord to be merciful to a poor penitent Democrat. But in recent years I have developed very largely the spirit of tolerance. I think the gentleman from Alabama and his followers earnestly believe that this bill will work out great good for the country. On the other hand, I am just as firm in my belief that it will curtail home production, embarrass capital, lower the wages of labor by reducing the demand for it, driving many out of employment, lower the prices of farm products and of labor's products generally, and halt the industrial progress of the Nation. Should it turn out that I am mistaken, my disappointment will be compensated by the gratifying knowledge that more good has come to the country.

I want to say to my distinguished Democratic friend from Kentucky in front of me here [Mr. STANLEY] that I will not agree to join his party in that event, because it is wrong in too many other things; but if you Democrats make times better by this bill I will take off my hat to you and admit that for once you have guessed right.

I shall not attempt, Mr. Chairman, to point out all the defects, great and small, in this bill. Life is too short for that. I shall content myself with pointing out some of its most striking shortcomings. Everyone within the reach of my voice and millions of people throughout the country will remember how for years the Democrats, in season and out of season, have berated the Republican Party for not giving the farmer a square deal, and how they swore by high heaven that things should be different if their party ever got into power. Every Democratic platform since the close of the Cleveland administration has been ringing and reverberating with promises that the farmer and his interests should be properly cared for if the Democratic Party obtained control of the Government. This was one of the leading issues upon which that party appealed to the voters of the country for confidence and support.

Well, the party is in power now, and the very first thing it has done, in spite of those promises, has been to give the American farmer the worst slap in the face that has ever been administered to him since the foundation of this Government. It taxes the raw material and lets in free the finished product. It taxes wheat, but lets in flour free. It taxes cattle and hogs, but lets in free beef and pork and bacon, thus transferring to foreigners the employment involved in converting the raw material. If ever any class of producers in our country was discriminated against by legislation, it has been done in the case of the farmers in this bill. It was bad enough in the so-called farmers' free-list bill, which proposed reciprocal trade in agricultural products between the American farmer and the Canadian farmer, but this bill is infinitely worse, because it invites the Canadian farmer to dump all of his surplus products into the United States and gives the American farmer nothing in return. I know it is contended that Canada to-day has no agricultural products to spare, but it is well to bear in mind the fact that up in Alberta and other Provinces enormous wheat fields are being cultivated in ever-increasing numbers and that in the natural course of events that wheat will seek the American market. I opposed reciprocity with Canada, although it was favored by a Republican President, because I feared the conditions which I have just described, and with all the more vigor do I oppose the present bill, which aggravates these adverse conditions beyond compare.

Our Democratic friends declare that while it is true that the farmer's profits on his crops may be scaled down by the free entry of the products of competing agriculturists, he will be benefited by the lower prices of the things he consumes. They seem to forget, however, that it makes very little difference how cheaply an article may be bought if the would-be purchaser has not the money with which to buy it. It will make very little difference to the American farmer whether he can buy his clothing and the clothing for his family for 25 per cent less than he has been paying for it if his own income is cut down 50 per cent, or even more, as the result of this tariff legislation. It will make very little difference to him that agricultural implements can be imported free of duty if production on his acres has to be curtailed because no longer profitable.

Coal is put upon the free list in this bill. I am opposed to that. I do not believe that the price of coal will be cheapened thereby in such a degree as to make a material difference to those who use the domestic product. I do know that free coal is certain to result in the lowering of wages of the men employed in American mines. I am sure that it will affect most injuriously the coal-mining industry of Kentucky and West Virginia for the reasons already stated, and also because of the fact that a large part of the northern market now supplied from the mines in those States will hereafter be supplied by Canada and Nova Scotia by reason of the cheap water transportation from those Provinces as against the more expensive rail transportation from the States I have named. I assert, Mr. Chairman, that this is a most inequitable arrangement. We allow Canada to bring her coal into the United States; we make her a present of this great market and we ask nothing in return. In all conscience it would be bad enough to allow the free importation of coal under any circumstances, but it appears to me as extremely poor statesmanship to permit this to be done without obtaining at least some reciprocal advantage from Canada. It violates every fundamental principle of economic wisdom, and can not be excused even upon the score of expediency.

I know it is contended that putting coal on the free list will not reduce the wages of the labor employed in the coal industry in this country. I have had no practical experience in the business, and can not therefore speak from personal knowledge, but I would like to introduce a witness who has had vast experience in the business and ought to know what he is talking about. I refer to no less a personage than the Hon. Henry Gassaway Davis, of West Virginia, whom you Democrats nominated for Vice President a few years ago. Mr. Davis appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in 1893 (Fifty-third Congress), of which Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, was chairman, and of which the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska, was a member. It so happened that Mr. Davis was being interrogated by the Nebraskan with regard to the effect of putting coal on the free list. In answer to one of Mr. Bryan's questions Mr. Davis made this very significant statement:

That is the district of your chairman—the second West Virginia. There are 3,000 or 4,000 people there who are depending almost entirely upon the digging of coal and getting it to market. Make coal free and you take from them their bread. (See p. 1127.)

Your arguments now contradict this distinguished witness, although you tried to elect him to the great office of Vice President after he had taken this stand. This may be Democratic consistency, but it is certainly not a jewel.

Mr. Chairman, the lumber industry is also an important one in my district, and I am opposed to free lumber for the same reasons that I am opposed to free coal. I have heretofore stated pretty fully my views on free lumber, and as I expect to debate it, as well as free coal, under the five-minute rule, I shall not go into these matters further now, except to venture the prediction that this bill will injure both industries and to protest against its enactment.

We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, about the wonderful benefits to be derived in consequence of this legislation by the "ultimate consumer." One would think that the ultimate consumer was in a class by himself. The family name of the ultimate consumer is "everybody." The tailor is the ultimate consumer of the shoemaker's product; the miller is the ultimate consumer of the man who sells him the machinery for his mill. What one man produces another consumes. Production and consumption are interlocking facts. You can not separate the one from the other. You can no more segregate the effect of the one upon the other than you can set apart cause and effect in any other operation, whether natural or artificial. We are all producers and we are all consumers. If one of us is inordinately benefited some one else is necessarily inordinately injured. It is an endless chain. In the view of economic legislation the ultimate consumer is a myth.

In order to furnish the Treasury a compensating revenue for the loss resulting from the lowering of the tariff duties the Underwood bill provides an income tax. I have always favored such a tax as a proper means for raising revenue for the support of the Government. I voted to submit the constitutional amendment to the States, and I am glad that it has been ratified so as to enable this Congress to impose the tax. It is no more than right that the wealth of the country should bear its proper share of the expense of Government. The burden of such expense ought to be placed upon those best able to bear it, and for the protection of whose interests most of that expense is incurred. The "unearned increment" ought to be made a factor in providing for the needs of the Nation. The principle of this kind of taxation has long been recognized as absolutely correct by other nations, and has been carried into practice much more drastically than this bill proposes. I have no fault to find with the scale adopted for the imposition of this tax. I do not care how large the amount of revenue which may be derived from it. The industrial and social progress of the Nation will call for ever-increasing expenditure on the part of the Government. As the country grows its needs will grow. We are accustomed in the United States to doing things upon a liberal scale, and we shall never change in that respect. When the first billion-dollar Congress passed into history a great cry was set up over the alleged Republican extravagance of that day. Since then we have come to the billion-dollar session, and our Democratic friends have appropriated considerably more than a billion dollars in one session without turning a hair. I am not finding fault with them for that; I predict that while they are in power they will probably exceed the limit of appropriations of the last session.

Many things remain to be done in the legitimate functions and through the legitimate expenditures of the Government. Millions of dollars can be profitably expended every year in the construction of good roads. I heartily approve of the proposed creation of a committee of this House to whose care is specially to be confided the subject of providing comprehensively for a system of public highways with Federal aid in their construction and maintenance. It is one of the great needs of the American farmer, upon whom rests an unnecessary burden of hundreds of millions of dollars every year in the matter of carrying his produce to market over the worst roads of any civilized country. The American farmers, Mr. Chairman, are very much more concerned and directly interested in the improvement of roads than they are in the improvement of rivers and harbors, however necessary the latter may be. We have heard quite a good deal of late about several proposed enterprises to be undertaken by the Government looking to the construction of inland waterways that are to link the Great Lakes to the Gulf and make it possible for great steamers to pass from the Lakes to the ocean. I have no objection to the prosecution of such enterprises, but I maintain that of greater importance than these is the building of good roads, which are the primary avenues of transportation for the farmers.

It will be expensive, it is true, but it will make up the unequal distribution that has occurred heretofore in Federal appropriations and do justice to a class of our citizens—the farmers—who are most in need of this assistance; and the burden on the taxpayers will be many times compensated by the advantages that will accrue to them and to the whole country. If the country is to be so greatly benefited, as is generally supposed, by the new markets that the building of the Panama Canal is to open up to our surplus products, this public highway improvement is the only substantial way in which the farmer can get an adequate return for the share of the expense of the canal which he has borne. Mr. Chairman, I have been advocating Federal aid in the construction of public highways for many years. I have made it one of the chief issues of my campaigns for Congress. So persistent have I been in its advocacy that I was dubbed "Turnpike John" by my Democratic friends. I have always been rather proud of the name, because I regard it as a token of honor rather than of ridicule, as it was originally intended, and I am glad to see the Democrats and the country generally coming around to my views on the question.

No matter how large the revenue may be which is to be derived from this income tax, there are many other perfectly legitimate ways in which it can and will have to be expended. I need but point to one of these to make good my assertion—the Navy. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the millennium is right at our door and that the era of everlasting peace between the nations of the earth is at hand. I permit myself, however, to entertain some gentle doubts as to this perfect consummation. At any rate, as the most reliable insurance of peace for our country and against any hostile designs on the part of any foreign nation there is no better or more obvious investment than a navy which shall be in all respects the equal of any other, excepting always, of course, the navy of Great Britain. For these reasons and many others which I do not regard as necessary to state I favor the income tax, and, to use a popular phrase, "you may go as far as you like" with it, provided always that you do not thereby destroy the protective system which enables American industrial life to hold its own against the cheaper methods of other nations and which sustains the better standard of living which differentiates the American wage earner from his fellow in any other country. Under this protective system our country has flourished for more than half a century. I believe, nay, I feel certain, that you can not subvert the principle of protection nor lessen its application without grave danger to the best interests of our people.

Mr. Chairman, this bill carries joy to the heart of every importer in exact proportion to the sorrow and apprehension which it stirs in the breasts of American manufacturers and wage-workers. The importer's business will flourish exuberantly under its operation, because foreign goods of every kind, now restrained by the protective tariff, will pour in at every port. We shall see imports growing in corresponding ratio to the curtailment of domestic production. While the American manufacturer and wage earner see their profits and earnings shrinking day after day the importer will reap the rich harvest which this bill insures him. Not only the importer is rubbing his hands in glee at the prospect thus opening up before him, but foreign manufacturers are already singing pæans of joy in view of the impending breaking down of the tariff barriers which thus far have kept the American market free from the floods of cheap-labor products.

British and German trade journals and the daily press of both those countries have been fairly shouting the good tidings to their readers. And let me say right here that even those of our own newspapers which have been persistent propagandists of free trade or of a tariff for revenue only have not hesitated to say, since the provisions of this bill have become known, that it can not fail to injure many domestic industries, while some, as sugar and wool, will be practically destroyed.

There is a strong sentiment—and it is becoming stronger every day—that we shall have to enact legislation which will check the influx of immigration, especially of that class whose inevitable effect is to lower the standard of wages and the standard of living of the American workingman. This fact is recognized in nearly every State, and this feeling has found expression in many a petition to Congress asking for appropriate legislation, and numerous bills have been introduced both here and in the Senate with the view to checking the tide of undesirable immigrants. Mr. Chairman, there are more ways than one to kill a dog. Suppose that we were to enact a law to keep out the kind of immigrants that preeminently get into destructive competition with our wage earner; what will it profit those wage earners if we let down the tariff bars so far that they will have to compete against the products of that same kind of labor brought from abroad? So far as the effect upon economic conditions is concerned, the one process is almost as bad as the other; but if I had to make a choice between the two evils, I would prefer to take goods manufactured abroad by cheap labor rather than see the cheap laborer himself imported into this country and by his presence and activity lessen the opportunities of the American workingman for employment and for earning the wages he is now accustomed to receive, and at the same time lower our standard of civilization and patriotism. In its ultimate effect upon economic conditions there is very little difference between the policy of a low tariff and lax immigration laws, and I fail to see any consistency in the action of a Democratic House in passing a drastic anti-immigration law and then tear down the walls that give us protection from the ruinous competition of the cheap labor of the very same class of people.

Right here I can not forbear to express my sympathy with the action of the California Legislature and the attitude of California's governor in respect of the tenure of agricultural lands by alien Japanese in that State. I want to register my most positive dissent from the policy of the present administration on that subject. Almost from the day when Commodore Perry introduced Japan to the knowledge of the civilized world—certainly, ever since Japan has taken on the garb of western civilization—she has been a land-grabber. Japan is taking a leaf from the colonization book of her good friends, England and Germany. Like them she has adopted the motto, "Wherever you see land, grab it." She has become an industrious colonizer. Her population is increasing at such a rate that an outlet must be found for the surplus. Whether it be the forcible annexation of Korea or the joint occupation with Russia of Manchuria or the insidious acquisition of land in the States on our Pacific coast or the flooding of Hawaii with Japanese, the aim and purpose of every movement is the same—to wit, to extend Japanese influence, Japanese customs, and Japanese methods. We would be blind, indeed, if we were to shut our eyes to these facts and to the further portentous one that Japan means to extend her Empire at the cost of any nation whom she may deem weaker than herself. If Japan to-day were ready for a combat with the United States, she would not care the value of a tinker's dam whether she had a treaty of peace and amity with us or not. I do not think we ought to let Japan or any other nation bluff us, and I do not think the American people will stand for it, either. All this, of course, is incidental to the general subject of my remarks.

I do not flatter myself with the belief that anything said in criticism of this bill by anyone on this side of the House, or on either side, for that matter, will have the slightest effect upon its status. I am perfectly well aware that I am now performing a useless function, and I should not undertake to perform it but for the fact that this bill deals a staggering blow to the industries of our country. That blow will be felt in my district and in my State as in all others.

Men of the South, no section of the country will be a greater sufferer under this bill in the long run than the Southland. We are in the transition stage from a purely agricultural to a large manufacturing community. There is hardly a State south of the Potomac that is not benefited by protection. When the people of these States realize that their onward march in industrial enterprise is checked as a result of the enactment of this bill, as I believe it will be, I shall be surprised if many of those States do not turn to the safe old captain who for so many years has guided the good ship Prosperity safely through storms and breakers. When the Republican Party returns to power, as surely it will, mark my words, it will be because the electoral votes of some of the Southern States are cast for the Republican nominee. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALLIN].

Mr. WALLIN. Mr. Chairman, it is becoming quite the fashion nowadays to brand any critic of the tariff bill here under consideration as an alarmist who seeks to trot out some sort of a bogie man to frighten the susceptible for political effect or personal gain. While this savors of assertion rather than of argument, I sincerely trust it will prove true and that nothing worse or more fatal to the business interests of the country will follow.

It is conceded here that the majority will enact into law substantially the same bill which is now before this House. The Democratic platform unquestionably declared for a tariff for revenue only. That was bad enough, but the majority of the Ways and Means Committee have gone much further. They admit that under the reduced duties they propose the revenues of the Government will fall more than $70,000,000 below the sum required to meet expenses and millions below any hope of a surplus in the Treasury, and that additional goods valued at two hundred and fifty millions will be imported to this country. So alarmed were our friends on the other side at the prospect of this result that, it is reported, the President, the Cabinet, and the radical antitariff Members of the Senate were called into consultation and an agreement was reached to let the funeral proceed and to drape the hearse with an income tax, so that any person whose income happens to reach over $4,000 a year might be doubly punished—first, by losing business, and, second, by paying for that loss out of his own pocket.

Now, our friends are "touchy" over any criticism of their pet measure and wish it understood that they are striving for an "efficient competition." With the enactment of such a measure, "efficient" competition will arrive on schedule time, so efficient that the results of 1893–1896 will be reenacted and the policy of proper protection for the farmer, the wage earner, and for our industries will be once more indorsed and demanded by the people at the first opening of the polls thereafter.

It is a matter of knowledge that foreign manufacturers are now within our midst arranging for the reception of increased imports of their goods the day the President signs such a law as is proposed by this bill. It is known here that these same foreign manufacturers are arranging facilities for doubling and tripling their output, because they are confident of making tremendous inroads on our market, which Americans, with increased cost of production, can not meet. It is a fact to-day that one of our great industries, into whose product labor is the principal factor, and whose product has been placed on the free list in this bill, is seriously considering the invitation of a foreign nation to transfer its plants across the ocean, where the labor rate will enable it to continue business, even with transportation to its American customers paid. It is known that our manufacturers are retrenching or preparing to retrench. This is a sample of the "efficient" competition we will enjoy when this bill becomes law.

However, it is simply my intention to protest, though in but a feeble way, on behalf of the industries of the district which sent me here. In this protest which I have been commanded to make that vast and important branch, agriculture, is incorporated, but those better qualified than I will speak for it. The first to feel a depressing effect on business is the farmer, and the first to resent such a condition is the man who tills the soil. However, to be specific, the district which I represent, outside the farms, is almost entirely dependent upon its manufactories. Carpets, rugs, knit goods, gloves, leather, brooms, pearl buttons, electric works, lumber, silk mills, iron and steel, oils, furniture, packing houses, and workers in wood are among the chief industries dependent upon governmental recognition for life and prosperity. I believe there is no district in the country enjoying a greater diversity in the way of manufacturing, and yet, to an extent they are all interdependent. That which seriously affects one affects all to a more or less degree. In the four small cities of my district one hundred million or more dollars are invested in manufacturing, with a wage earners' compensation roll of about twenty-five millions a year, and nearly 50,000 persons actively participating as workers on that list.

The year 1912 was the most profitable ever enjoyed by the concerns or by the people of that district. Labor was satisfied and contented with the highest wage ever paid it there. The output of the factories was the greatest ever known, and the district turned out one-sixth of all the carpets and rugs made in this country; practically all the gloves and brooms; contains the greatest electric manufactory in the United States and one of the greatest locomotive works; while our knit-goods industries ranked in product, number of workmen, and percentage of wages with any in that great center of activity.

The protest which I voice to-day comes from every branch of this interwoven and enormous fabric of business and financial construction. Some of the protests, it is true, are more emphatic than others. Those of the glove industry are perhaps the most grave and anxious. This industry is practically confined to one small county and two small cities. While about $20,000,000 is invested there only about six or seven thousand workmen are directly employed in the factories, as a great percentage of the work is done outside in the dwellings and residences of the people, so that great community is employed and sustained by that one industry. The reduction of the tariff by an average of about 15 per cent below that of last year will be a severe blow from which every manufacturer, no matter what his political affiliations may be, agrees he can not recover. Should their fears be well founded the only income-producing business of the community will be wiped out by the proposed "efficient competition" which will result.

This is but an individual instance of the feeling in a district where the businesses have dependent upon them not alone armies of wage earners, but where the welfare and comfort of every industry, every business house, and every property owner, every working, self-supporting citizen is interlocked and dependent upon the general prosperity of individual concerns. Your plan to reduce the high cost of living by closing the industries, giving the business to foreign countries, and driving our people back to the farms may accomplish that result, but where will the farmer find a market for his produce?

Before closing, however, I desire to point out what I believe is an unintentional misconception of the amount of foreign imports which we will be compelled to meet when this bill is enacted. With most of the schedules here mentioned I am more or less familiar. For instance, the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, in their handbook of information regarding tariffs and this bill, estimate that the imports of gloves to the amount of about $8,000,000 in 1912, under an average duty of 44.15 per cent, will reach only about $9,000,000 under their proposed average tariff of 31.77 per cent. I am not familiar with the grounds on which these estimates were based, but if those imports do not reach a very much higher sum it will be a matter of wonderment to those who are supposed to know whereof they speak.

In the matter of carpets and rugs the discrepancies in the committee's estimate of imports, I believe, are marked and misleading. Let me mention the fact that with a duty of 64.62 per cent last year the imports of Aubusson, Axminster, chenille, and moquette carpets was but $65,000. With the duty in this bill reduced to 35 per cent the estimate of imports is but $25,000 additional. These imports will increase, in my belief, to $500,000 a year. Take, again, the schedule for Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay carpets. Under the Payne law in 1912, with a duty of 69.38 per cent, the imports were but $23,307. The committee has reduced this duty to 30 per cent, and increased in its estimate the imports only by $7,000 in round numbers. With a decrease of more than 50 per cent in this duty I can see no reason why the imports in this line alone will not exceed $250,000 per year. The same ratio is true of the Brussels, Wilton, velvet, and tapestry and ingrain carpets.

In tapestry Brussels the estimates of the committee seem to me to reveal a most glaring inconsistency. In 1912 the tariff on these carpets was 83.53 per cent. The imports under this rate were but $225 for that year. In this bill the committee has reduced this duty to 20 per cent, and yet, with this remarkable reduction, estimates that only $4,000 of these goods will be brought in from abroad. In my opinion the imports of tapestry Brussels under a 20 per cent duty will run up to hundreds of thousands of dollars per year, and possibly into the millions. Tapestry Brussels are the most popular in the American market and are handled by the factories and dealers in large quantities.

In the matter of rugs, more or less luxuries, the discrepancy, to my mind, is even much greater. The reduction in the tariff rate, it is true, is not so great—from 58.10 per cent in the Payne bill to 50 per cent in this bill—but these goods are high in price and the 8 per cent reduction in the duty will make a marked difference in shipments. In 1912, $3,800,000 worth of these rugs were brought in to take the place of those of American manufacture and purchased by the wealthy, and yet the committee believes, with its reduction in the duty, the importations will not exceed four millions. From what I know of conditions, I assert that if these imports are kept down to $6,000,000 per year under the proposed tariff rate we may be thankful.

However, if the estimated imports on the other schedules of this bill are as faulty as those to which I have referred, the hope of retaining a home market for home manufactures will fast disappear; the boast of the highest paid labor in the world will be a thing of the past.

That these protests will fall on unheeding ears, I am certain. That they will avail nothing in this mad rush to carry out a theory once tried and found wanting, but demanded in a platform indorsed at the polls by a minority of the voters of the country, is practically certain, but one whose home folks are so vitally interested in this matter would be derelict to his duty and to his principles did he not in some way strive to record these warnings publicly and at the fountainhead.

I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible at this time of night with such a short time allotted to me to make any extended remarks upon this important subject, but I am equally well aware that if I had a longer time anything I might say would not change this bill in any particular. We are told that no amendments will be permitted and that it is fully determined that the bill shall pass this House in the manner in which it was reported by the Ways and Means Committee. This leaves no opportunity for any Member to procure an amendment or to comply with the requests of his constituents who want it changed.

I was very much interested in what gentlemen on both sides have said during the day. Some of it I agree with and much of it I can not agree with. I favor the income tax, but no one can vote for it separately or without voting for the whole bill. I can not believe when I read the history of this country that it will prosper under free trade or tariff for revenue only, which is the same thing. I have heard gentlemen here say to-day that they do not know what effect the passage of this bill will have upon the industry or the prosperity of this country. I wondered, then, to myself why it is, when we consider the present conditions, that we should take this leap in the dark, not knowing whether it is going to preserve the splendid conditions that we have to-day and that exist throughout the country.

Abraham Lincoln was a protectionist, and if he was right at that time the principles of protection are right to-day. The great Republican leaders of this country have been protectionists, and our country has gone on in this magnificent prosperity under protection within the past decade from $115,000,000,000 to the fabulous wealth of $150,000,000,000.

Now, where is the necessity for a change in our fiscal condition? We can not hope that our condition will be better, nor is it expected that we will reap greater prosperity. We are told that it is done for the purpose of fulfilling a promise and party pledges, if you please. But the Democratic Party did not receive a majority of the popular vote at the last election. More votes were cast for the principle of protection than for free trade or a tariff for revenue only.

Now, there are many phases and features of this bill which work a great injustice. They say it will not affect any legitimate industry. I would ask any reasonable man to turn back to the times and conditions of the former bill for a tariff for revenue only and compare the times then with the prosperous times of the present.

I am not ready to admit that the making of a tariff bill is a simple matter where equity and exact justice is to be done to all classes concerned. I am willing to admit that if we adopt the rule followed in this case where we act blindfolded, or where we only compute the revenue necessary to run the Government and estimate the imports, that it is not a difficult matter. That is the basis of a tariff for revenue only, and it is not difficult if each one dollar of imports bears the same rate of duty that every other dollar of imports bears. But that is not equity. That is not justice, because some articles should pay more duty than others, and the only way to levy a duty for revenue only is upon articles we do not manufacture or produce in this country. If the duty gives incidental protection or adds to the cost of an article, it is to that extent a protective tariff and not considered in the make-up of this bill. Such a tariff as is contemplated by the proposed measure ought to be levied upon articles we do not manufacture or produce in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I can not support the pending measure, for the reason that I do not find in its provisions any encouragement for the industries of our country. It is a direct blow at our agriculture, which is the greatest of all our industries and which brings more happiness and prosperity to a larger number of people than any other industry. There is no need for the assault upon the American farmer that is made in this bill by putting nearly all of his products upon the free list or at a very low rate of duty and compelling him to compete with the agricultural products of foreign countries.

Foreigners do not defend our flag; foreigners do not build our schoolhouses and our churches; foreign nations do not build our highways nor do they seek to promote our national welfare. They would prefer to promote our national downfall. This tariff bill is unjustly discriminatory. It permits other countries to levy duty on our products, while they can import their like products without paying duty into our country. It places a duty on the raw material, while it allows the finished product to come in free. Meat and flour are imported free of duty into this country, while cattle, sheep, wheat, rye, and oats pay a duty. Live stock and grain must be manufactured into meat and flour, and it is inconsistent to charge a duty upon the raw material while permitting the manufactured product to come in free. If you wish to help the American workman and the manufacturer, put a duty upon the manufactured article.

We are engaged in the duty of enacting the economic law of our country which shall control under the Democratic administration now in power. This bill has been assailed by some of the greatest economists of our country as being drastic. No more important legislation will be considered than that relating to the tariff. It forms the dividing line between the two great political parties. It affects the manufacturer, agriculture, and commerce of the Republic to a greater extent than any other measure that will be considered. It is of vital interest to the laboring classes. Labor and agriculture are the foundation and source of all our prosperity. Thomas Jefferson gave special prominence to agriculture and commerce in his first inaugural address. For the vantage ground of national prosperity we are competing in the make-up of the world's progress with all nations of the earth, and in the conduct of affairs for national supremacy in trade and uplift I concede that all of us, of whatever political faith, have only the best interests of our country at heart, and whatever differences of opinion exist between us are based upon honest convictions.

I, for one, do not believe that the welfare of our country is best subserved by the tariff becoming or remaining a party measure or that the tariff should be made the test of party success or party reverses.

During our national existence many tariff bills have been enacted into law. We have had high protection, low protection, and so-called tariff for revenue only. Truly out of all this experience in framing tariff legislation the burden should be lighter and the pathway plainer in arriving at what is best for our country and all the people. The appointment of a nonpartisan tariff board chosen by the President and confirmed by the Senate is demanded by the people. This commission ought not to fix rates, but furnish basic information upon the relative conditions of all trade, foreign and domestic, and the relative effect upon our industries and commerce in imposing, changing, or altering the tariff rates and duties. Everyone admits that we are a happy, prosperous Nation; that as a Nation we are so far ahead of all others as regards the prosperity of all to admit of no comparison. I give due credit to our Democratic friends on the other side for their personal part in aiding that prosperity; but you must admit that we have attained this exalted national supremacy under a protective tariff, and that there is no free trade period or tariff for revenue only period known to such prosperity. The exact reverse is true. I want to give one concrete example. Under the last year of the Wilson-Gorman free trade tariff for revenue only bill in the fiscal year of 1897, and before the Dingley bill took effect, there was imported into this country more wool than during any prior year or any year since the fiscal year of 1897. The older Members of this House know of their own knowledge that good sheep sold for 75 cents a head during those times of adversity. In the fiscal year of 1897 250,000,000 pounds of wool were imported into this country under the free wool tariff, while the greatest number of pounds of wool imported in any one year prior to the passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill was 172,000,000 pounds in 1892, and the most wool imported in any one fiscal year since 1897 was 266,000,000 pounds in 1908; and this is true notwithstanding the fact that we have increased in population more than 25 per cent since 1897.

No one will dispute that where the duty is excessive or where rates are levied in excess of fair competition and reasonable rates they are too high. Rates are too high when the law will permit the manufacturer or producer to charge an unreasonable price for his product. In such cases it should be lowered. But no bill should indiscriminately make an unwarranted assault upon the industries of our country so that our manufacturer can not pay his labor American wages or compete with his foreign competitor, who pays much less for his labor than is paid in this country.

Much has been said about the efficiency of the American workman. The efficiency of the American workman is not questioned. He is the superior artisan of all the workmen of the world, but that he should be compelled to do twice the work of a foreign workman in a day's time or in the same number of hours in order that the American manufacturer can compete in the markets of the world with foreign manufacturers is exacting too great a toll on human efforts and is expecting too much from the laborer. Any economic law which has for its basis the principle that the American laborer does or ought to do as much again in a day's time or any other given time as the foreign laborer is wrong in theory and in fact. A laborer should only be required to do a day's work, and for it should be paid a reasonable wage. The wage should be one which will support himself and family, educate his children, and admit of an assured competency to provide against want in old age.

It is claimed that under this bill our imports will be increased $241,000,000. How can you claim that by increasing the importation of farm products you will benefit agriculture? How can you claim that by increasing the importation of manufactured goods you can benefit the American manufacturer? Or how can you claim by importing manufactured articles you can increase the demand for or the wages of American labor?

Why is it that wages are low in protected Italy and Germany while they are high in protected America? The proof of the pudding is in the eating. The fact exists. Wages in Italy are only one-third of what the wages are in America, while wages in Germany are about one-half in like trades and occupations. This is the result of their thick population. In Italy the population is 300 to the square mile, and in Germany it is the same. In America the population is only 30 to the square mile. In Italy and Germany there is not sufficient work for their people to do. In America there is good, profitable, dignified labor for all at good wages.

Why the demand for this drastic free-trade measure? The claim is made that it is to reduce the high cost of living. It is also claimed that it is to carry out the mandate of the people and fulfill the party pledge. One of the purposes, as stated in the bill, is to reduce tariff duties, and if enacted into law it will certainly do that. But why reduce the tariff so much that it will destroy the industries of our country or depress agriculture? No one wants that to be done, and no explanation is offered to show that the passage of this bill will not have this effect. Foreign nations are hailing the passage of this bill and its enactment into law with delight. Why, you may ask? Because it will provide a rich market for a quarter of a billion of their products of field and shop.

Buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest market is an old Democratic slogan. There is no cheap market anywhere when you have nothing with which to buy. Without money with which to buy everything is dear. The best market in the world is the American market, and it should be preserved for the American people against all comers, to lend happiness and prosperity to their eternal welfare. You say it will bring down the high cost of living? I find that the cost of agricultural products is 25 per cent cheaper this year than last. I notice by an article in one of the local papers of my district that the price of kraut does not pay for cutting the cabbage, and onions can find no market. Potatoes are 25 cents a bushel, wheat 90, hay $10, and I am constrained to inquire whether in this bill the farmer is to be made the goat? You have reduced the tariff on his products one-half or put them on the free list.

Articles.	Present rate of duty.	Proposed new tariff rate under Underwood bill.
Wheat	$0.25 per bushel	$0.10 per bushel.
Oats	$0.15 per bushel	Do.
Barley	$0.30 per bushel	$0.15 per bushel.
Beans	$0.45 per bushel	$0.25 per bushel.
Sugar beets	10 per cent ad valorem	5 per cent ad valorem.
Onions	$0.40 per bushel	$0.20 per bushel.
Apples	$0.25 per bushel	$0.10 per bushel.
Buckwheat	$0.15 per bushel	$0.08 per bushel.
Hay	$4 per ton	$2 per ton.
Straw	$1.50 per ton	$0.50 per ton.
Butter	$0.06 per pound	$0.03 per pound.
Eggs	$0.05 per dozen	$0.02 per dozen.
Cheese	$0.06 per pound	20 per cent ad valorem.
Rice	$0.02 per pound	$0.01 per pound.
Cattle	$27.50 per head	10 per cent ad valorem.
Horses	$30 worth $150	$15 worth $200.
Sheep	$1.50 per head	10 per cent ad valorem.
Wool	$0.11 per pound	Free list.
Swine	$1.50 per head	Do.
Potatoes	$0.25 per bushel	Do.
Meats	$0.015 per pound	Do.
Flour	25 per cent ad valorem	Do.
Cream	$0.05 per gallon	Do.
Cornmeal	$0.40 per hundredweight	Do.
Buckwheat flour	25 per cent ad valorem	Do.
Oatmeal	$1 per hundredweight	Do.
Rye flour	$0.25 per hundredweight	Do.

This is significant when we see by your report that in 1912 there was imported into this country of these farm products the following quantities:

Imported in the fiscal year of 1912.

Wheat	bushels	2,681,381
Oats	do	2,721,037
Barley	do	2,768,474
Beans	do	825,720
Onions	do	1,433,797
Potatoes	do	13,740,481
Hay	tons	699,213
Butter	pounds	1,005,640
Cream	gallons	1,120,240
Eggs	dozens	1,098,702
Cheese	pounds	46,017,405
Cattle	head	316,602
Wool	pounds	193,779,722
Meats	do	1,822,933

These importations will be greatly increased in quantity under this bill.

The importance of agriculture can not be overestimated. Farming is seeing the dawn of scientific treatment more clearly than heretofore. New methods of culture are being studied. The exodus to the city is being discouraged. Is all the effort to make farming more profitable and country life more desirable to be arrested by the hands of the lawmakers of our country? Is the hand of the husbandman to be stayed and the greatest of all industries retarded, the value of farm holdings diminished, and the profit of his toil swept away? We are at a loss to know of any good reason why this should be done. The Ways and Means Committee have not furnished one. When it becomes a law and the people see and feel its effects, you will abandon search for a reason and vainly seek for an excuse.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes yielded to me by Mr. PAYNE I can not argue the question of tariff. I can only enter my protest against the bill.

I came to this session prepared to vote on any tariff bill wherein the revision was downward and based on a scientific investigation that would give protection to the industries and laborers of this country against the invasion of cheap foreign labor and industries. This bill, in my judgment, is simply a makeshift, based solely on the judgment of a few inexperienced men and not given proper consideration by the representatives of the people in Congress. The Democratic Representatives in caucus were told what to do and did it. This is proven by the comparatively few changes from the original draft. I am disappointed and surprised that new Democratic Members, coming here fresh from the people, did not break the rule of "Cannonism." That rule is justified by your leaders in saying, "Republicans did it." Does that make it right? You gave the bill, in closed caucus, about three weeks' consideration. You will force the House of Representatives to approve it in five days. Is that fair in considering a bill of this importance?

Your whole bill is class legislation, written for the food consumers without one thought for the food producers. Is it because the congested centers you represent are food consumers? Why did you not remove the duty on rice? Is it because the rice is raised in the South and you believe just that much in a protective tariff? Why did you not put cotton products on the free list? Could not you raise your revenue on agricultural products? Have the food producers—the farmers and stockmen—of this country received more than their share of the present prosperity? You strike such a keen ax at the root of the agricultural tree, and you will see the tree wither and the leaves fall.

I do not need to pile up statistics mountain high to prove that the American producers of cereals, hay, and meats are placed at a disadvantage when brought into open competition with the wheat growers of Argentina, the herders of Brazil, and the farmers of Australia and Canada. Not because our climate is not as favorable, not because our farmer is lacking in enterprise or integrity, not because he is not favored by industrial inventions, but his handicap is the thing of which we boast—higher land values, higher wage scale, better methods of living. These factors enter into the cost of production.

In every speech I have heard from the opposite side I hear the plea for the reduction in the cost of living. What matters it to you if the price of foodstuff and clothing is cut in half and you have not the wherewith to purchase it? [Applause.] You could reduce the cost of living by importing "coolie labor" to this country in competition with our sturdy farmers and diligent laboring men, but would you advocate it?

Are you prepared to tell the American farm hand, who to-day has the right to hope that he will become a farmer in his own right, that his wages must be cut to the basis of the Argentinian laborer at $10 to $12 per month, or the Brazilian tiller at from $12 to $14, or the Chilean at from $8 to $10? Are you prepared to promise the farmer that the railway transportation rates from the West will be reduced to the point where he can meet the water competition of his foreign rivals? [Applause.]

I am not pleading for the protection of an "infant industry" in the nature of the small farm, but I am urging that the man on that farm be not reduced to a condition of poverty. It has been the proudest boast of this Nation since the establishment of its independence that poverty and servility are not hereditary; that because a man's father and his grandfather and countless generations before him have been dependent tenants that his lot must remain the same. It is the spirit of the freeholder that we as a Nation have tried to engender in the hearts of every native-born American and of every foreigner who has come to our shores and become a part of our national life. [Applause.] But can this spirit continue to thrive if we cripple it by unfair and unworthy competition?

Consider this bill schedule by schedule and I will vote with you on every point that I consider fair and just to the people I represent. I believe in an income tax, but not in all of the provisions incorporated in this bill. You force me by presenting this bill as a unit—as you did the sundry civil bill—to vote against provisions I favor in order that I may protect my district from the unjust provisions it contains. Is this Democratic? Is this fair?

The bill as a whole is unjust to my people. The farmer, the beet raiser, the woolgrower, have been made the "goats" in this tariff bill, and a goat is a disagreeable factor when molested. You have challenged him to combat and the future will prove to you his staying qualities. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER].

CONDEMN METHODS USED IN THE PREPARATION OF THE BILL.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, tariff legislation, and especially when it is of such a sweeping character as that proposed by House bill 3321, should be carefully considered, and ample time should be allowed for a free and open discussion before the entire House. This bill has been prepared by our Democratic friends in secret caucus and is now presented in its completed form with the distinct understanding and determination of our friends on the other side of the House that it shall pass in its present form.

DENIED A VOICE IN LEGISLATION.

Many of us are new Members, and for the first time sit in this House representing constituencies that are vitally interested and affected by the provisions of this bill; and whether we are old or new Members, unless we have been elected on the Democratic ticket, have not had and will not have a practical voice in this proposed legislation. This bill has been prepared by a mere handful of men who have either no practical knowledge of business conditions or by training and interests are impelled to look only on one side of the question.

DO NOT REPRESENT A MAJORITY OF THE PEOPLE.

These men seem to think that because they are in the majority in this House that they, and they alone, are commissioned to draft this legislation. Let me remind them, in all kindness, that they do not represent the majority of the people of this country, neither did they receive a majority of all the votes cast at the last election; therefore the "free-trade" or "tariff-for-revenue-only" policy of the Democratic Party was not approved by a majority of the electors of this country, and, even had they been, the methods adopted in the framing of this bill would not be justified. No method can be approved by the American people that does not give all the representatives of all the people a voice in legislation that affects every citizen of the United States.

DEMOCRATIC PLEDGES.

Let me call your attention to the pledge given by the Democratic Party to the American people in their platform. As to the right of the people to rule, their platform says:

> We direct the people's attention to the fact that the Democratic Party's demand for a return to the rule of the people, expressed in the national platform four years ago, has now become the accepted doctrine of a large majority of the electors. We again remind the people that only by a larger exercise of the reserve power of the people can they protect themselves from the misuse of delegated power—and so forth.

Has the course pursued by our Democratic friends been in accordance with their platform pledge? Has not this very method been condemned by them; or do they consider their action a fulfillment of their pledge when a majority of the people are denied a voice in this all-important bill? Again let me quote from the Democratic platform. It says:

> Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

Is this a keeping of their pledge when in office? It was no doubt relied upon during the campaign by the voter.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

Now, as to the provisions of this bill: It is almost inconceivable that the American Congress should be asked to pass a bill drafted by Members of this House who deliberately choose to favor foreign industries and foreign workingmen rather than American. If this bill is passed as it is written then our industries can only prosper when they are located in foreign countries beyond the seas.

TARIFF AN ECONOMIC QUESTION.

It is extremely unfortunate that this whole tariff legislation can not, and is not, considered from an economic instead of a political standpoint; it is an economic question and not a political one. So long as it is considered from a political standpoint just so long will the political club be used to drive men in line and tie them body and soul by the political caucus to support the measure, regardless of its true merits or the consequences it may have upon the interests of any Member's constituents or the country as a whole. The American people will never forget the sincere effort and honesty of purpose of the Republican Party to sever this question from politics. It was a Republican President who first proposed a nonpartisan tariff commission, and at a time when all branches of the Government were in control of the Republican Party, for the express purpose of obtaining information that would enable Congress to write a tariff bill that would be just and equitable to a majority of the people of this country.

PROSPERITY.

During the last 50 years this country has had an era of internal development, of internal growth and prosperity, that no one had dreamed of, and one that has never been equaled by any country at any time anywhere. It has not only attracted the attention but commanded the respect and admiration of the entire civilized world.

MERITS OF PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

It is an undisputed fact that during this era of prosperity there was a protective tariff in force, and it has been the experience of this country that whenever that tariff was replaced by a so-called "tariff for revenue only" we paid the penalty by disastrous and ruinous panics. What we want to do is avoid a repetition of these conditions.

HAVE RIGHT TO EXPECT BETTER BILL.

I am not opposing the passage of this bill because it is a Democratic measure. I am opposed to it because of its vicious provisions. We have a perfect right to expect and even demand from our Democratic friends a bill more in harmony with the interests of the country, and especially with the interests of the farmers and workingmen. As a justification of this statement, let me call your attention again to the Democratic platform, and remember you stated that your pledges were to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign. It says:

> We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate business.

This is all we ask. We want no other. The Republican Party and the members of the Republican Party recognize and acknowledge the fact that the Payne bill was not a perfect measure, nor was any previous tariff bill perfect, neither did nor do we expect a perfect bill from our Democratic friends. We recognize the fact that the time allotted to the Ways and Means Committee and to Congress is entirely too short to properly investigate each item in each schedule in this entire bill, and especially in the absence of impartial technical knowledge, such as would and should be furnished by the tariff commission; but we have a right to expect a bill in accordance with the pledge of the Democratic platform that will not injure or destroy legitimate business, and we also have a right to have a consistent bill. This bill is not only vicious but inconsistent.

INCONSISTENCIES OF BILL.

When you present a bill that provides for a tariff of 10 cents per bushel on wheat, and then put flour and bran, the products of wheat, on the free list; put a tariff of 10 cents per bushel on rye, and then put rye flour on the free list; put a tariff of 10 per cent ad valorem on cattle and sheep, and all other live animals not especially provided for, and then put wool and beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork on the free list, it is not consistent, and the Democrats knew it was inconsistent when they presented it.

UNFAIR AND UNAMERICAN.

A bill that places manufactured articles, in which a considerable portion of their value is labor, on the free list is absolutely unfair to the American manufacturer and wage earner, and I submit to you that any legislation that does not take into consideration the interest of our wage earners is un-American and not worthy of serious consideration. Any tariff bill that does not provide a duty equal to the difference in cost of production between here and abroad can not and does not protect American labor.

COMPETITIVE BASIS.

We are told that it is the policy of our Democratic friends to put all lines of manufacture on a competitive basis with foreign countries; that is to say, that a certain proportion of the articles we use shall be imported and the duty on each article should be determined and regulated by the volume of importations of that article, and in this way maintain a competitive basis in all lines of trade. If the volume of importations increases beyond a certain point, raise the duty; if they fall below a certain point, then lower the duty, and in this way protect the American public from overcharges and monopolistic greed on all articles. This is to be their cure-all for all tariff legislation.

WILL NOT BRING RESULTS.

The intention is good—we are all emphatically opposed to overcharges and monopolies or special interests—but, Mr. Chairman, I submit to you that this proposition will not bring about the desired result, because it is fundamentally wrong and can not bring satisfactory results. It places a penalty on thrift, economy, honesty, and ability, and puts a reward or premium on waste, incompetency, and dishonesty; for instance, should there be a trust or combination manufacturing a line of goods having agreed-upon prices, selling the goods to the public at a high price, the importation would naturally be large, because the high price charged will permit importation by the foreign trade; then that line is on a competitive basis, according to the Democratic doctrine, and the duty may be retained, notwithstanding the fact that there never was free and open competition, economy in manufacture never being necessary or practiced. On the other hand, in other lines of manufacture where the most fierce, free, and open competition has prevailed for years, compelling the greatest possible economy in the minutest details of manufacture, as well as in the marketing of the goods, resulting in the placing of the goods on the American market at so low a price as to practically prohibit importation, then the duty on such lines of goods must be reduced or put on the free list, thereby penalizing the industry for not forming a combination and raising the price so as to allow a proper amount of goods to be imported.

SELLING PRICE AND COST.

The selling price on all articles is regulated by the cost, and the price of labor is just as positive an item of cost as is material. Cost of material—that is, raw material—is about the same in all countries, but there is a vast difference in labor cost in different countries; therefore the tariff duties should be based on the difference in labor cost on each manufactured article instead of volume of imports. If this is done, then and then only will we accomplish the purpose we are striving for and desire to accomplish.

I might incidentally refer to the boot and shoe industry of this country, because I am intimately acquainted with it, which is one of the largest industries in the country, having an invested capital of between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 and employing hundreds of thousands of workers and paying millions of dollars to their help each year. According to census reports the volume of business of the boot and shoe manufacturers, including cut stock and findings, in 1909 amounted to over $512,000,000—to be exact, $512,797,642—as compared with $357,688,160 for 1904, showing an increase of over $157,000,000 in five years—over $31,000,000 each year—so that the estimated volume of business for 1912 is over $615,000,000. It is a larger industry than either the wool or sugar industry, and yet it has received practically no consideration. The shoe manufacturers appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and stated their position, and explained that in order to save the industry and protect the workmen from cheap foreign competition it was essential—and made the modest request—that the small duty of 10 per cent on boots and shoes should be retained. But they find them on the free list in this bill. This industry and the men engaged in the shoe factories must be penalized and punished because the manufacturers placed the price of shoes so low and have supplied the American people with such good footwear that even with the nominal duty of 10 per cent they have made it impossible for foreign manufacturers to gain a foothold in the American markets. They have done more; they have even invaded the foreign markets and committed the "unpardonable sin" of shipping shoes of certain grades to foreign countries, even to the extent of $16,000,000; so, of course, off goes the measly 10 per cent duty and shoes go on the free list, and the American market is invited to become the dumping grounds for all grades of shoes, the product of the pauper labor of all foreign countries, and the American workingman is put in direct and open competition with the lowest of the underpaid foreign workmen.

Here is a great and most important industry pleading for a duty that will protect the cost of labor, and labor only. The competition has been fierce, free, and open; it has caused the greatest possible economy to be practiced in the minutest detail of manufacture. The competition has forced the reduction of profits to the point where only the fittest have been able to survive, and now with unfair, unequal competition of foreign-made goods, with a labor cost that is only a fraction of the American cost, it remains for the American manufacturer to either turn over the business to his foreign competitor, reduce the wages so that he may be in a position to compete and retain his market, or remove his factory to foreign land, which no doubt many will do. They are told that because the importation of shoes is so small the trade is not on a competitive basis, and for this reason shoes are placed on the free list, plainly penalizing all connected with the industry for thrift and economy.

ARTIFICIAL VALUE.

Again we are told that the objection to a duty on any article equalizing the cost of labor between here and abroad is that it creates an artificial value, which is a direct tax on the consumer, which he should not pay. This is to say that American labor is on an artificial basis, and that we are paying an artificial price for it, directly the result of the protective tariff. There is no question but what this bill will reduce the price of labor, but where shall we find the standard or real value of labor? Shall we accept the English scale as the real or true standard, which is about one-half of the American price, or shall we go to continental Europe, where it is still less, or go to India—Calcutta, for instance—where an able-bodied man receives from 8 to 15 cents per day. Do we realize that the standard of living always follows the wage scale; in fact, the standard of living is just what the wage scale permits it to be. No one on either side of this House desires to do an injustice to labor, but this bill utterly disregards and ignores the wage earner. There are millions upon millions of wage earners in our factories, in our mills, in our mines, on our farms, everywhere, whose welfare, happiness, and earning power will be impaired. They can not and must not be ignored.

They are the all-important factor in our national life. They are the great consuming public. They are the great purchasing power of the Nation, and it is only when the wage earner has steady employment at a fair wage that this Nation can and does prosper. The moment that you interfere with their earning power you strike at the very root of national prosperity.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, very kindly referred to the labor unions in his splendid opening address, and gave credit to the unions for the present scale of wages paid in this country, but at the same time he presented a bill that entirely ignores them and will utterly destroy the wage scale now established and in force. The distinguished gentleman told us that this bill is drawn with a view of putting all lines of production and manufacture on a competitive basis and encourage importations to the end that the cost to the consumer may be lessened; but does not the gentleman realize that with every manufactured article imported into this country comes with it a certain amount of foreign labor? Not only that, but just that much less American labor will be needed. And does he not realize that if any considerable quantity of manufactured goods are imported there will be a surplus of American labor?

The American labor market will be glutted and result in a lowering of wages.

The wage earner has his labor to sell; it is his stock in trade, and is in no way different from any other market. If labor is scarce, as it has been for some years, it commands and sells at a good price, but if there is a surplus of labor it must be sold at what it will bring, and bear in mind that it must be sold. The family must live, and when he is compelled to sell it in free and open competition with the foreign market, can he hope to get more than the market price?

Again I shall quote from the Democratic platform. It says:

American wages are established by competitive conditions and not by the tariff.

True, the tariff does not establish the wages, but it does establish the condition, and the condition, or perhaps better, the demand, establishes the wages. The only excuse offered for refusing to protect labor by equalizing the cost of production is that it is so difficult or not possible to ascertain the labor cost. This is all a mistake. As a matter of fact, the labor cost is no more difficult to obtain than cost of material or selling cost, or any other item, and is known and readily available down to the minutest detail. If there be first a willing mind the rest is easy.

In conclusion. The purpose and object of the distinguished gentlemen who wrote this bill was no doubt to legislate in favor of the consuming public, but who is it that will really benefit if this bill is passed?

The farmers and stock raisers can not, because their products are on the free list, or nearly so.

The manufacturers can not, because their products are on the free list or protected by an insufficient duty.

The millions upon millions of wage earners can not, because their products must be sold in the open market with foreign competition.

The class that will benefit are the indolent and idle rich; their business will not be affected. "They toil not, neither do they spin," so they have nothing at stake. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MOSS].

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it may be with excusable timidity that I arise in this Hall in the presence of so many distinguished and learned men who have made the subject of tariff a lifelong study. The people, however, of West Virginia whom I represent, are so vitally interested and will be so seriously affected by the passage by the Democrats of this Congress of the tariff bill, as now framed by them, that my duty impels me at least to remonstrate and protest against the injustice which will be inflicted upon my constituents. The great State of West Virginia, with its untold resources, its vast natural wealth, its varied industries, and its intelligent people, never gave consent to a reckless attack by the Democratic Party upon the industries of this Nation; but, on the contrary, by the election of four Republican Congressmen, elected by the aid of the Progressives of West Virginia, that great State announced in no uncertain terms that it preferred to live and thrive under the peace and prosperity of protective administration. But the misfortune of a divided party in the Nation gave technical victory to the Democracy, and though the majority of our Nation's voters registered their adherence to the great doctrine of protection, as enunciated in both the Republican and Progressive platforms, yet Democracy, though indorsed by a mere minority, feels called upon once more to throw this great Nation into the uncertainty, the fear, and the demoralization resulting from tariff agitation.

I stand upon the American doctrine of protection and the creation of a tariff commission, both of which are important planks of the Republican and Progressive platforms. In one sense the tariff question is and always will be political, for the Republican Party has always stood for protection to American industry, American labor, and American homes. The Democratic Party has always opposed it. And incidental to this doctrine we have always believed it proper, speaking generally, to levy duties upon articles or products which we produce in this country rather than upon those imported from other countries which we do not produce. The Democratic doctrine, with some modifications from time to time, has been that the object of tariff is to raise revenue without any fixed policy as to the manner in which that revenue should be raised. This means that that party advocates a hit or miss tariff policy, and when in power is more prone to remove the duty from articles coming from abroad which are also produced in this country than they are upon articles not so produced here—the very doctrine which has resulted every time it was tried in bringing disaster to the people of this country.

In another sense the tariff question is not a political question. When it comes to fixing the proper amount of tariff rates, that is the work of a statistician and not a politician. We favor a nonpartisan tariff commission composed of men of the highest character, stability, and learning appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to enter upon a searching inquiry, both here and abroad, as to the comparative cost of production here and there, and other conditions surrounding the question, and then to lay this information before the Congress so it can intelligently act upon this important problem. The Democratic Party, however, have just proven by the drafting of this tariff bill that they are in favor of approaching this important question by guesswork and not by scientific methods, and the bill which has been introduced by the majority leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and which the Democratic President has ordered his party to pass, is a juxtaposition of inconsistent and irreconcilable tariff patchwork, and it is so presented to us that we must vote for all or none of it—we must swallow the whole dose, good and bad, mostly bad, or else reject it all. For one, I shall not partake.

In the first place, the Democratic tariff bill was not framed after a full and fair hearing. Men who represented the farmer, men who represented labor, men who represented capital employed in vast manufacturing industries of this country, were denied even the right to be heard. A tariff bill involving hundreds of articles and products was framed in a few weeks behind closed doors and backed by orders from the Executive Mansion. While Federal patronage is being withheld until Congressmen shall obey the commands of the President, this mass of heterogeneous elements, dignified by the name of a tariff bill, is introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States by the leader of the party, and will be pushed through the House after only five days of debate. Is it true that our friends on the other side are possessed of such superior intellect and so much keener perception than the average statesman ever claims to possess that they can frame tariff bills offhand and secure the peace and prosperity of this country by their passage?

It does seem superfluous, after a century of tariff experience, to argue that free trade, or any approach to free trade, is disastrous to this country. Every time it has been tried we have had desolation and distress. Every time a truly protective-tariff law has been enacted it has been followed by unexampled prosperity, and yet our friends on the other side, in order to again test the theories which they profess to love so well, are ready to turn their backs upon the light of experience and again grope in the dark night of experiment. And the American people must pay the penalty.

Perhaps it is the way of Providence. The great Republican Party has been split in twain by internal dissension. Lincoln, Blaine, McKinley, Grant, and Garfield, and all the other great and illustrious names possessed by that party that have adorned the pages of history, were forgotten, and, with open eyes, that party walked over the precipice of defeat in the year 1912. What will bring unity? What will bring back its pristine strength? What will induce the partisans of men to put principle above personality? I predict, my friends, that the great moving cause that will unify that great party and make these men forget their feuds and factions when confronted by the call of their country's good will be the dire result of the passage of the Underwood bill, which will follow as surely as the darkness of night follows the splendor of day. Back there in the hills and valleys of my own great State of West Virginia there still remains some of that bitterness and animosity which the division of our party last year engendered; but if those men could only be here now and could behold this blind and reckless band of Democracy stamping out the American doctrine of protection, opening wide the door to the competition of pauper labor, and deliberately plunging this country into financial and economic depression, all to carry out a pet theory of their own—if they could be here and see all this as we see it there would be no further division in the Republican Party. The Republican Party must be progressive. The people of this country will indorse no party that stands still. It has received the punishment and, I believe, learned its lesson. There are now strong indications that it will resume its old-time leadership in the march of progress. Those of us who love her will stay with her so long as she will live up to her historic traditions. But should she prostitute her pristine purity, become but the petty agent of privilege, and give to an expectant public but her empty name, then will we spurn her as treachery alone deserves and unite under some other name to wage battle against the destructive and devastating forces of Democracy. That hour has not yet come, and I hope to God never shall; and I believe that this present year will show that this grand old party still stands for protection, for a sound dollar, for the cause of the great common people, their active participation in the affairs of this Government, and for the maintenance of the honor and glory of our flag, whether it wave over the dome of the Capitol Building here in Washington or over the sunny islands of the distant seas.

The spokesman of the Democratic Party in this Congress is the Hon. OSCAR UNDERWOOD, of the State of Alabama. He is indeed a splendid gentleman and a most pleasing personality. We give him full credit for his great ability and his sincerity, and it was indeed a privilege which I highly prize to have heard his speech on the opening day of this debate, setting forth the views of his party on this great question. I am, however, compelled to say that, in my humble judgment, the premises upon which his argument is based are so fallacious, his theories so much at variance with the experience of the past, and his argument to establish the correctness of such theories so strained that we were impressed with the difficulty of his case and sympathized with him personally in his efforts to defend the indefensible position of his party. He speaks of the cost of living and quotes statistics to show that since the year 1897 farm products have increased 93 per cent, and attributes that to the tariff. The prosperous farmers of West Virginia can testify that in recent years, during Republican administrations, they have been able to secure a fair and decent price for the products of their farms, and I do not believe that the gentleman's complaint about the prosperity of the farmer will be received with much relish by that industrious and intelligent class throughout this Union. If a Republican tariff is responsible for justice and equity to the farmers of this country, then make the most of it, but do not advance as an argument against the great principle of protection the fact that under a protective tariff the farmer enjoys his share of prosperity, while under the tariff for revenue only, as experience has proven, he receives more than his share of common disaster.

The high cost of living is caused by surplus of gold production, increased migration from the country to the city, monopolies, and other reasons that time will not permit me to discuss, but it is not caused by a protective tariff. It is a world-wide complaint—of free-trade as well as protective countries. But if it were so caused, the concrete proposition is reduced to this: Would you rather pay reasonably high prices for the necessities of life and have the money to buy them with, or do you favor cheap prices and empty pockets? When people have money they consume without stint or restraint, and the supply, therefore, equals or surpasses the demand. When they have not money they economize, reducing themselves to bare necessities, and thus reduce the demand and thereby the price.

I lay it down as a fact which can not be challenged or contradicted that the American laboring man is paid a higher average wage than the laboring man of any other country on the face of the globe, and with that wage has come a higher standard of living. Again I assert—as statistics clearly show—that the American laborer can buy much more of the necessities of life with his eight hours' work than can the laborer of any other nation with a similar amount of work. As long as this condition exists it is idle to talk about the superiority of free trade. It seems to me axiomatic that admitting, as our Democratic brothers must do, that the American laborer is paid on an average from at least one-half to two-thirds more than the European laborer, and often twice as much, then if we are thrown into direct competition with the products made by that cheap European labor only one result can follow, and that is that the wages of the American laboring man and his standard of living must be reduced. I am one of those who think that our laboring man is entitled to live better than his brothers across the sea. I believe he is entitled to his little home, to conveniences for his family, to send his children to school, and, in truth, to stand erect in the nobility of manhood and command the respect that honest labor deserves, and I am opposed to any party that advocates the cause of the foreigner in preference to the American and seeks to advance theoretic altruism to the extent of pulling down our own standards and industries in order to build up those of the foreigner. I must say that even the statement of the gentleman from Alabama can not convince the American people that the cost of production is not to a large extent a determining factor of competition in the world's market, and therefore while we should cherish a spirit of brotherhood toward all mankind it is first our bounden duty to preserve the peace, happiness, and prosperity of our own people.

The gentleman from Alabama again asserts that the protective tariff has prevented our development as a factor in world trade, has stifled enterprise, has put a premium on inactivity. What an astounding statement, coming from the leader of a great party. If all this be true, then the greatness and prosperity of this Nation, which statistics show has surpassed all other nations in industrial and commercial development and progress, is but a passing dream and facts about which no unprejudiced mind could heretofore cherish a doubt are but fleeting clouds and a vanishing mirage. The gentleman is mistaken. Protection has made this country commercially great, and has contributed in no small degree to our prosperity and happiness. If this Nation be so hampered and oppressed by a protective tariff, why is it that the citizens of these European countries that our friends appear to envy are pouring into this country as a very gulf stream of oppressed humanity?

It is with sincere regret that I heard this leader of Democracy in that eloquent address appeal to class distinction and class prejudice. He announced that the Democratic Party, by this tariff bill, intended to tax the luxuries of the rich, not the necessities of the poor. Perhaps the gentleman, then, can explain why it is that the tariff on luxuries is not as high, on an average, in the Underwood bill as it is under our present tariff bill, framed by a Republican Congress. Why did you not increase the tariff on these luxuries and carry out your pretensions of punishment of the wealthy class? Why did you reduce the tariff on gold leaf, tinsel wire, aeroplanes, fancy cakes, preserved fruits, lace window curtains, oriental rugs, wearing apparel of silk? Are these not luxuries of the rich? How much of them does the laboring man consume? The gentleman from Alabama says he did not make the tariff high because these luxuries would not then come over. My answer is, They have been coming over under the higher tariff of our present Republican tariff bill. If the wealthy want them, they will buy them. I do not like appeals to different classes in this country. We are one people, bound together by ties of brotherhood, and with common interests to protect. You can not cripple the business of the manufacturer without injuring the laboring man who works for him. You can not crush the American business man without destroying the American farmer. We do not live to ourselves, and when you hurt one man you injure his neighbor, and when, as you propose to do by this tariff bill, you throw almost all American industries into direct competition with the cheap labor of Europe you are injuring every American citizen.

West Virginia cries aloud her protest. The tariff on her earthenware and crockery products has been reduced from 55 to 35 per cent ad valorem; on her hogs, from 13.81 per cent to nothing; on her cattle, from 27.08 per cent to 10 per cent; and by one sweep her wool, her coal, her lumber, her clay, has been thrown into the Democratic hopper of free trade.

There is no doubt in my mind that the present tariff on many articles is too high, but I want to know and not to guess which they are. It should be reduced according to the recommendation of an intelligent tariff commission after thorough investigation. I have no doubt that there are trusts and monopolies that have by their machinations increased the price of necessities to the consumer. If so, those trusts and monopolies should be demolished, their officers prosecuted and be made to obey the law of the land, and, in this connection, we are proud to say that, beginning with the administration of President Roosevelt and coming on down through that and the administration of President Taft, there have been more trusts and monopolies prosecuted and brought to the bar of justice than in all the Democratic administrations put together that this country has ever had.

When the people of this country determined last year that they would, by reason of division in the ranks of the great Republican Party, permit democracy to again assume control of this Government, they did so with the assurance on the part of its candidate for President and its political leaders that no legitimate industry of this country should be harmed. And yet, now in this spring of 1913, only a few months after the termination of that campaign, legitimate industry is threatened as it never was before by the terms of an unfair, illogical, and un-American tariff bill. Our friend, Mr. UNDERWOOD, in the course of his remarks, had much to say of the lemon, and seemed to be concerned as to its growth and production. Let me say that before another year shall roll around our people will be fully convinced that the prize for growing lemons should be awarded to the Democratic Party, because when this tariff bill is passed and signed by a Democratic President, if you will pardon a slang expression, the biggest lemon on record will be handed by this Democratic administration to the American people.

My friends on the other side, beware! There will be no excuse behind which you can hide when calamity spreads over this country as the result of this work here to-day. In 1912, when you were elected, with our bumper crops, our busy and prosperous industries, our plentiful supply of money, we were leading in the march of nations. The fear of your hostile legislation is already having its injurious effect. If you thrust this bitter nostrum down the throat of the American people, and then cast us once more into the dead sea of disaster, you will at the first opportunity be buried so deep that even the call of Gabriel's trumpet can not resurrect you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Kansas has 4 minutes to his credit, which he reserved this morning, and I yield to the gentleman, in addition to that, 24 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 28 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUPLEY].

Mr. RUPLEY. Mr. Chairman, 50 years in the lifetime of the ordinary man means a great deal. A half century does not mean so much to the older nations, but it marks well-defined lines of progress or retrogression in the history of our country. The last 50 years have seen the trial of the protective tariff.

I have listened to learned expositions on this question from gentlemen from all parts of our common country. We have a right to suppose that they, under our system of government, represent the best thought and intelligence of their respective communities and have at heart the greatest good of their constituency and of the Nation as well.

The system of the application of the protective principle by my Republican friends seems to have suffered little change except the tendency to run to extremes, since the days of the great war taxes forced upon the Nation by extraordinary conditions. The war has been over for many years, and yet this unnatural financial condition has been accepted as the rational and right criterion after which to follow. This child born in the throes of necessity has been nourished by all the methods known to skillful tariff doctors and clever surgeons of privilege and power. Natural laws apply to policies as to peoples. The heir of this system has proved a hybrid and a revulsion of the public mind has been the result. This fact is proven by the immense majority on the other side of the floor.

I have heard much about the prosperity due to the high protective tariff, and I am free to confess that it has produced among the favored few who are its beneficiaries an age of discovery, not of the amount invested but of the profits to be secured; and then capitalization, far beyond the investment, based on real earnings. Then we have the golden age of 1896, until when, I ask? All the while capitalizing labor, labor, labor—millions of watered stock, made good by labor. First, the counterfeit stock of the United States Steel. Holding labor to the wheel until this stock produces many fold, and then dividends; first, to holders of the stock; second, to surplus; third, to labor? No; third, a new stock dividend for labor to earn additional dividends upon. Nothing for labor, the producer of it all.

The acid test of this proposition is the amount left over and above the living expenses of the family to contribute to the comfort and the welfare of the home. No one denies it brings prosperity to the rich. I ask you, in all fairness, if you believe the benefits are equitably distributed between the rich man and the poor man?

The scholarly gentleman at the other end of the Avenue, the President of this dominant party in the Nation, upon his nomination found in the platform that old socialistic doctrine—

> It is a system of taxation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Members have grown eloquent over the high wages paid the workingman. There is no proof that this is due to the high protective tariff. The evil of the system lies in the fact that the wages are not in proportion to the living expenses. The purchasing power of a dollar is the thing most important to the workman and his success. It means that he will be able to keep the boys and girls out of the workshop and in the school. That the standard of citizenship is raised or lowered to the standard of his living.

Is there any advantage given the low-priced laborer over the one highly paid? Surely the scrubwoman is entitled to a return on her commodity—her labor—in the same proportion as the man who has his income increased many times over by means of the protective tariff.

Why does the high protective tariff always produce a surplus, and what happens to it? Labor capitalized in billions to earn dividends for the few favored rich.

The manufacturer not knowing how long this condition is going to last, and knowing the great profits to be had, asks his employees for more of their service. He exhausts American labor, he secures foreign labor, and most of our large mills are now only half American and the other half European.

We hear the gentlemen contend that the American workmen will have to compete with the low-priced laborer of Europe, and every day we see our "captains of industry" importing these low-priced laborers as rapidly as they can to compete right here at home with our workmen. [Applause.]

The high protective tariff has been before the bar of judgment of the American people and has not made out its case—it stands guilty as indicted.

Prosperity, about which we prate, has been only the crumbs from the rich man's table. All too late, this fact has taken hold of the Republican wiseacres. Blood letting will not now suffice. Plastering the sore spots will no longer control the malady. The people have diagnosed the case, and they will apply the cure.

Now, what of the gentlemen from the other side of the House? What is the record of their party and their measures? In their platform they say the Republican Party has brought about a condition where "the rich are growing richer and the poor growing poorer," and the last election seemed to show that the people agreed with them.

The answer to my query is read from the page of the history of the United States. They have been forced by circumstances since the war into the positions they have taken. A party of negation and opposition. To oppose a high tariff they propose a low tariff. Cause and effect. During their spasmodic periods of quasi power they never had a real chance to try their steel before it had to ring back into the scabbard of their endeavors. I have no thought but that it, too, would have proved abortive to real and lasting results because based on false premises. Purgatives relieve, but do not cure. Their present tariff bill is an attempt to meet the demands of an aroused public conscience. They realize that the tariff must be revised downward and that nothing else will appease the public's ultimatum.

In following their bill it is interesting to note how far they have wandered from the great apostle of free trade, Senator Walker. The Walker bill of 1846, framed to embrace the suggestions contained in the celebrated Treasury report of 1845, was considered the last word on Democratic tariff policy. They have abandoned free trade in its purity and are endeavoring to pass a bill "to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes." Walker says, "The Constitution does not confer power on Congress to lay tax for protection, but for revenue only," and that only on that principle can any degree of permanency be established.

That last word in the Democratic tariff policy was also in the platform of this scholarly gentleman who is President of the United States and who, in my judgment, is making good before the American people, and it is contained in the first paragraph of the platform framed by the Democratic convention in Baltimore:

> "We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue."

I take it that there is no man to-day of reasonable mind but will grant me that there should be a tariff graduated to the needs of our people and the protection of certain industries. Why this constant harangue and political daubing should be repeated at every change of administration is hard to explain on sensible lines.

The ordinary Congressman knows as little, technically, about the tariff as I do. Why is he asked to take a position regularly without knowing what it all means?

Politics is the science of government; it has nothing to do with the art of securing office or place. Among all the great countries of the world we stand alone as being the only one that has not taken the tariff out of business and politics. Is there any good reason to continue the practice of playing policy instead of attending to the public business? Have we not learned through all these years, with our experience, our trade, our finance, our supposed intelligence, that this is a question for scientific men, specially trained; to be settled far removed from political clamor and the heat of debate?

The results of past tariff legislation have been unsatisfactory and of a patchwork variety, as is evidenced by constant and increasing demands for change. Here we are at the guessing game again. If we guess right on some schedules, we are commended; if wrong on some, we are condemned for all.

I would not impeach the integrity and sincerity of the gentlemen on either side of the House. At the present time they are doing the only thing they can do—the Democrats trying to measure up to the situation in a manner and the Republicans watching their endeavors with the hope of breaking through and profiting by their mistakes. Mark you, the citizens of this great land are awake to conditions.

While I agree that early action should be taken in response to the expressed will of the voters in the last election, I do not agree that it should be taken at the expense of the rights or privileges of any industry or section. You will find that in the Progressive national platform we contend that the tariff question should be controlled absolutely by a nonpartisan, expert commission. This is the safe, fair way to proceed, so that the interests of the poor man may have the same protection as those of the rich man; so that industries needing help may be fostered and those to be curbed can be controlled; that a just relation be preserved between the cost of living and the wage scale; that taxation affecting the necessities of life be reduced to a minimum or removed entirely, and that men and women who work with their hands or their minds may have the same chance to have the comforts of complete living as the favored plutocrat who is living on a part of what these men and women earn and produce.

We are a high-grade Nation in science, in literature, in art, in learning, and the like, yet we fail to keep up the standard in matters political. The national Progressive platform asks for a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission. Not in form—as was Mr. Taft's—but in fact, so that the scales may be balanced in justice between what we eat and wear and what we earn and produce. That the poor man and the producer shall have his exact share of life's benefits as well as those who are favored in worldly goods. This tariff question is not for bickering nor blustering. We are engaged in a serious business. It touches the hearthstones and their happiness in all the many homes throughout the land. The security and safety of our people to enjoy the liberties vouchsafed them under our free institutions of government means much to our Nation in her upward stride. The demand for social and economic justice has called into being the Progressive Party because too long the demon of oppression has held the reins of power and driven the heavy car of despair as it crushed out ambitions and opportunities.

"Suffering makes the whole world kin," and the suffering of the millions is being heard and answered in a movement which has for its purpose the uplift of man and the ultimate happiness of the race.

The home must be the hub upon which all else revolves, and only in its sanctity and security can a nation rise in service to its God.

This movement is going on under all suns and in all climes. It is now the yeast, and it will leaven the loaf. Its instruments are various, yet no less powerful. The statesmen moving policies as pawns, the jurist wise in law, the preacher strong in eloquence, the scientist great in discovery, the journalist virile in expression, the teacher great in thought, all working to the common end that in this age of the world man is indeed his brother's keeper.

The proposition presents different aspects in different countries. In our own great land we have many problems yet to solve. Here our dogma is the doctrine of progress and good will, and we believe that only in adhering to it we will at least be able to make the law of the land more responsive to the will of the people.

John Adams said, "The happiness of society is the end of government." Have we not reached the point in intelligence when we can say that our public servants are our representatives only so far as they are our commissioners? In this connection we hold with Macaulay, "That the cause of all revolutions is that while nations move forward constitutions stand still."

For these evils in our system there must come a remedy if our institutions are to exist in perpetuity. The answer lies with the people.

The line of cleavage is well marked between the reactionaries and the Progressives. I care not to what party they belong, whether they follow the leadership of a Roosevelt, a Beveridge, a Murdock, or under the banner of a Wilson, a Bryan, or a Palmer, they are a different type of men than the servile servant subject to the dictates of the Penroses, the Ryans, the Roots. These two elements can not fuse. They have nothing in common. Their ideas are widely divergent as to the ends of government. The principles for which Progressives stand are too important and far-reaching to neutralize. There is no middle ground to take; no twilight zone between the rights and privileges of men and the power and injustice of organized wealth; no happy medium between life and property when posterity is paid the debt in shekels of human misery.

What has been the result in both the old parties? What has been the product of the system? A condition of one-man power, boss rule, machine politics, corruption funds, high salaries with little work, indifferent citizenship, and the failure of the people to secure representation, and the attendant evils. The times demand a new party of action and of honor. You can not graft progressive policies on the old trunk of reaction. They belong to different families. They may grow for a little while, but their time will be short. A new tree having roots and tendrils planted in every inch of our glorious country has started to grow, and it will take under its protecting shade the memories of the Southland and the hopes of our western prairies and the wealth and promise of our East and North.

Years of apparent prosperity had seemingly lulled our people into sleep, and listening to the siren song they were dashing toward the rocks.

On the scroll of the Pantheon of the future will be written in letters enduring and imperishable the words of the redoubtable Jackson, "Justice for all, privilege for none." Indeed this might fittingly be the creed of each Progressive, for in this life we are of little worth save the service we render our time and posterity. This is not a party of expediency; it is a party of principle.

New times demand new measures and new men,
The world advances and in time outgrows
The laws that in our father's day were best;
And doubtless after us some purer scheme
Will be shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.
The time is ripe and rotten, ripe for change;
Then let it come; I have no dread of what
Is called for by the instinct of mankind.
Nor think I that God's world would fall apart,
Because we tear a parchment more or less.
Truth is eternal, but her effluence
With endless change is fitted to the hour
Her mirror is turned forward to reflect
The promise of the future, not the past.

[Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I believe in a protective tariff, sufficient but not excessive, and it is with regret that I address this body to-day in opposition to a bill reducing the tariff. I believe that many schedules should be lowered. I came to this House of Representatives determined to assist in a proper reduction of excessive tariff rates. Time and again my vote has been cast with the majority side and contrary to the view of many of my colleagues on this side. I voted as I believed I should, voted as I promised, voted as I always will vote for any and every measure I believe right, no matter from what part of the House it comes.

If the reductions in this new tariff bill had been based upon information obtained by an expert tariff commission, or, if in answer to a general demand, moderate and justifiable reductions had been made, I would be favoring it.

But this bill calls for a radical change in our economic policy. It carries tremendous reductions that I feel sure will work out injuriously to the American laborer, the American producer, and the American employer.

This Democratic bill goes so far in its reductions as to change our tariff policy from one protecting the American laborer and producer to a policy near free trade—a tariff for revenue only. I am obliged by my conscience and by consideration for the welfare of the people of the great State of California to protest against enacting any such radical legislation.

I do not ask more consideration for industries in my own State than I am willing should be granted the industries of other States. I have been willing, and I am willing, to take reasonable reductions in schedules affecting California provided a proper reduction can be had in other schedules. I voted for a reduction in Schedule K, notwithstanding California is a great woolgrowing State, but I can not believe that justice is done that industry by placing it on the free list in this bill. [Applause.]

I know how seriously the life of the citrus and sugar industries in California is jeopardized by this bill. I know how much the prosperity and happiness of all who labor in those industries are affected by the unwarranted extent of the reduction in the lemon schedule and by the free list ahead for sugar. If this bill is unjust and unfair to industries of my State, is it not reasonable to suppose that it is also unjust and unfair to other industries in other States?

I would like to vote for an income tax and I would like to vote again for substantial reductions in most tariff schedules, even for reductions on items in which California is greatly interested, but I can not vote for reductions that seem to me to be decidedly unreasonable. I believe the American people are demanding the regulation and improvement of industrial and business conditions, but I do not for one moment believe there is any widespread demand for the destruction of any legitimate American industry.

I am by no means a tariff expert. I know but little compared with what there is to be known. However, I have the knowledge on tariff subjects of the average citizen—perhaps of the average Congressman. I find that to be sufficient to make me sure that genuine experts are needed by Congress when building a tariff structure to serve all interests adequately and deservedly.

I feel sure now, as I did when I first came to Congress two years ago, that a proper downward revision of the tariff will benefit our whole people. I am ready now to vote for any reduction founded on information and warranted by a due consideration of producer and consumer, but I can not vote for this bill, which I believe to have been made without sufficient information and without giving due consideration to the interests of the laborer and grower, the manufacturer and consumer.

Our tariff policy and tariff schedules should be determined by Congress after a careful, adequate, and world-wide study of tariff rates and tariff effects. Beginning at once, each rate should be singly determined and established. Then every separate avenue of labor and industry would not be disturbed, as now, in a general revision. A nonpartisan expert tariff commission should investigate and report to Congress full data on every item of every schedule. It should report the cost of production at home and abroad; the prices received by the grower and manufacturer; the prices paid by the consumer, and the wages and conditions of labor. It should make recommendations. Congress could then work systematically and intelligently on expert, scientific plans, which could be adopted, rejected, amplified, lessened, or otherwise changed.

Congress has passed nearly one-third of its time in the last four years in tinkering with the tariff. Now, we are to be given three or four months of extreme suspense while our tariff boat is turned bottom side up and our respective industries permitted to sink or swim without any regard to those entirely dependent upon them.

It may be that most of our industries will survive four years of Democratic tariff upsetting; but why try such a doubtful experiment? Why not proceed along safe and sane lines to a tariff readjustment through the aid of a nonpartisan expert tariff commission, as proposed and advocated by Progressives from the first. It is through such means that our tariff troubles will be solved aright.

California is hard hit by this Democratic tariff bill. The citrus and sugar industries are perhaps most vitally affected. Two hundred millions of dollars is California's investment in oranges and lemons. Her people have twenty millions in sugar.

There have been fat years in the citrus industry, and there have been many lean ones, but an average for the past 20 years will not show more than a moderate profit. California believes she can supply the whole United States with lemons at prices fair to consumer and grower, if given reasonable time and protection. Only one-fifth of available acreage adapted to lemon-growing is planted in lemons. With protection the acreage in lemons will rapidly increase and every part of our country can be supplied.

The present rate of duty possibly may be too high; the proposed rate is much too low. Who can honestly determine until after full and complete investigation by an expert tariff commission?

The growing of lemons in California is an American industry, owned by Americans, managed by Americans, and furnishing a livelihood to 40,000 families, practically every one of which is genuinely American. Way down deep, my friends, the Democratic Party seems to care more for the mysterious influence of a handful of foreign importers in New York than it does for a home industry in California, owned and cared for by our own countrymen.

Lemons will not average less in price for the next four years because of the removal of two-thirds of the duty. When Sicily has a monopoly, America will pay whatever Sicily chooses to ask for lemons.

To-day I received a wire from California which I wish to read:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS,
United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a Senate joint resolution adopted by both Houses of the Legislature of the State of California, I herewith transmit to you a copy of Senate joint resolution 25, relative to memorializing Congress regarding the citrus-fruit industry of the State of California, and requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to prevent a reduction in duties on citrus fruits below the point where the difference in the cost of production of the same would be equalized.

Whereas the citrus-fruit industry is one of the great and important enterprises of this State, representing an investment of $200,000,000, and materially contributes to the upbuilding thereof; and

Whereas the rates of duty on citrus fruits should equalize the difference in cost of production between the United States and foreign countries; and

Whereas the present rates of duty bring to the Government a substantial revenue that has increased in recent years; and

Whereas a material reduction of the duties on citrus fruits would hamper and retard the growth and development of the State of California: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States not to reduce the duties on citrus fruits below a point equalizing the difference in the cost of production of the same in the United States and foreign countries, and we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use every honorable means to prevent such reduction; be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be requested to appoint five citizens of California to present this memorial to Congress in behalf of this State; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the President and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

I can best tell you what our people think of the Democratic sugar proposals by quoting the following telegrams:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 22, 1913.

Hon. WM. D. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to hand you herewith copy of joint resolution No. 18, adopted by senate and assembly and approved by the governor April 18, 1913. Assembly joint resolution No. 18, relative to the protection of the California beet-sugar industry in the enactment by Congress of laws affecting tariffs on imports into the United States.

Whereas in the process of tariff revision by Congress the indicated tendency is toward an abolition of the duties on imported sugar; and

Whereas such a policy would be calamitous to the cane and beet sugar industry of the Nation at large, and especially to the beet-sugar business of the State of California, which produces 165,000 tons per annum, or one-quarter of the beet-sugar output of the United States; and

Whereas the annual consumption of sugar in our country is now 3,500,000 tons per annum, supplied, viz, from domestic cane grown in Porto Rico, Louisiana, and Hawaiian Islands, 1,100,000 tons; from beet sugar manufactured in 16 States, 650,000 tons; the balance, 1,750,000 tons, being purchased from foreign countries and refined by a few corporations on the Atlantic seaboard, who are clamoring for "free sugar," in order that they may check the further invasion of their markets by the constantly growing beet-sugar industry; and

Whereas our Nation's beet-sugar output has increased from 40,000 tons in 1897 to 650,000 tons in 1912, a rate of increase greater than can be shown in any country in Europe during an equal period of time, while our cane-producing districts have apparently reached the limit of their prosperity; and

Whereas this country should, and can, become self-supplying in the matter of sugar through the development of the beet-sugar industry, now involving the use of only 450,000 acres of land against 274,000,000 acres adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet; and

Whereas the development of the industry is checked by the menace of a free sugar bill, which will subject this product to competition with cane and beet sugar produced under the low-wage conditions in the Tropics and Europe, and at prices delivered at our seaboards lower than, under the conditions, is paid to the farmers of our State for the sugar in the beet before it is manufactured: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California (a majority of all members elected to senate and assembly voting for the adoption of this resolution and concurring therein) request the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington and the President of the United States that due regard be had in the consideration of tariff revision for the claims of the beet-sugar industry, which is so full of promise to our Nation, and that the principle governing the revision of the tariff in this regard be that the tariff should equalize the difference between the cost of production of sugar at home and abroad.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each of the Members of Congress from the State of California to be presented to the President and Congress.

L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk of Assembly.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 9, 1913.

Hon. WM. D. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas proposed new tariff bill which was introduced into the House of Representatives April 7 by Hon. OSCAR UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, and which is now before Committee on Ways and Means of the House for consideration, reduces customs rates on great number California products to such degree that in several instances it will have inevitable result of seriously crippling, if it does not absolutely destroy, great interests upon which depend large numbers of people and the public welfare of the State; and

Whereas present reading of proposed tariff bill indicates that California has been more severely dealt with than other States of the Union, and its products more severely and unnecessarily exposed to foreign competition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, That an earnest protest is hereby made against adoption of the tariff bill in its present form with its severe discrimination against products of the State of California.

The above resolutions were adopted by board of directors at meeting held to-day.

ARTHUR W. KINNEY,
President Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

In addition to the above, I have received more than 2,000 individual letters of protest, appealing to Congress not to make the changes in the sugar duties in the way proposed.

I shall not go further into details of the citrus and sugar industries, for my colleagues, who more intimately represent the citrus and sugar sections, are better able to do so.

Gentlemen, I do not ask for more than is justly ours. I want nothing to which we are not entitled. But I do ask, and I do insist that the growing industries of the United States should be protected to a degree determined by Congress after consideration of reports and recommendations of an expert commission. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member, I shall make my remarks very brief.

I presume it may truthfully be said that there is no Federal legislation which more generally, directly, and vitally affects the people of the country than tariff legislation. It reaches down to the very poorest of our people and up to the richest of them. It not only has its effect on the income of the average citizen, but it determines in large measure the purchasing power of that income. It not only affects the people as individuals, but as groups, families, communities, and the Nation as a whole. There can therefore be no legislation more important than that which is now before us.

The tariff is a legitimate means of raising revenue for the maintenance of the Government, but it should be much more than that. American labor properly looks to the tariff for protection from those conditions which are such a burden to foreign labor. Any tariff which does not primarily disclose its benefits in the pay envelope of the laborer is not an equitable tariff.

I believe that a tariff should extend to the point of protection—such protection as will equalize conditions of competition between the United States and foreign countries, both for the farmer and the manufacturer, and which shall maintain for labor an adequate standard of living.

Believing that there are certain schedules in the existing tariff which are unjust and excessive, I strongly favor tariff revision, and it should not be necessary to add that the revision should be downward.

I have spent much time in studying the pending bill, and have tried to determine whether it bids fair to accomplish the things which I think a tariff bill ought to accomplish. There are over 4,000 items in this bill. Is the tariff which is provided for each of these items the kind of a tariff I have said I believe in and would like to vote for? I presume some of them are, but I feel sure that some of them are not, and I am very much more certain of the fact that, with reference to most of the schedules provided for in this bill, I do not know whether they are right or not, and neither does anybody else [applause], unless he has given the question such study as qualifies him as an expert upon it. The one big fact about the tariff that has been borne home to me as I have studied this bill is the fact that it is absolutely impossible to frame a just and equitable tariff by the log-rolling, I-tickle-you-and-you-tickle-me methods that have characterized tariff making thus far in our history.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I can not yield; I have only a few moments.

Ours is the only Nation in the world to use such methods in framing a tariff. It would have brought certain ruin to any other nation foolhardy enough to try it, and the only reason it has not brought ruin to us is to be found in the fact that because of the great extent of our territory our population is not dense as compared with other nations, and also because our resources have been and still are so vast.

It is high time we changed our methods. It takes long investigation and study—painstaking, thorough, and trained examination of exhaustive data, followed by the careful consideration of a trained, unbiased expert, to get at the real facts connected with any given business or industry, from which we may proceed to reach a correct conclusion on the question of whether or not we shall have any tariff at all on a given article, and if it is concluded we shall have, then what that tariff shall be, in order that it shall accomplish the ends which we believe a tariff should accomplish.

The present bill is not the result of such work, and it is bound, therefore, to be inaccurate, unscientific, and inequitable in many respects. It can not be otherwise unless it is a miracle, and even its own best friends do not expect that of it.

I believe the basis for tariffs and changes in tariffs should be found in the reports of a commission, a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission, reporting both to the President and to either branch of Congress, such reports covering the costs of production, efficiency of labor, capitalization, industrial organization and efficiency, and the general competitive position in this country and abroad of industries seeking protection from Congress; as to the revenue-producing power of the tariff and its relation to the resources of government; and also as to the effect of the tariff on prices, operations of middlemen, and the purchasing power of the consumer.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] who addressed himself to this subject yesterday, that he has missed entirely the idea of the tariff commission as proposed by the Progressive Party. We do believe that the Republican Party of itself can not revise the tariff accurately and scientifically. We do believe that the Democratic Party of itself can not revise the tariff accurately and scientifically. We believe, further, that the Progressive Party of itself can not revise the tariff accurately and scientifically. In advocating an expert nonpartisan tariff commission, however, we of course do not propose to delegate any legislative power to it. The commission is not to formulate or pass laws. That power must constitutionally and properly remain with the Congress. What we do propose is that the commission shall scientifically and accurately ascertain the true and unbiased facts upon which we may base our tariff legislation.

I do not feel, however, that the people of this country should be compelled to await the reports of such a commission before obtaining relief from those of the present schedules generally recognized as excessive. I had hoped that we would have an opportunity to act on such schedules singly and immediately. While the recent Tariff Board may not have proven commensurate with our ideals for such bodies, it did make more or less exhaustive investigations with reference to Schedules I and K, affecting cotton and wool, and submit reports on them, and it seems to me that those reports, such as they are and irrespective of our views with reference to the board itself, give us at least such information and light on those two schedules as, coupled with the burdens to the consumer caused by the existing cotton and woolen duties, requires us to modify those existing duties and specify new tariffs in those schedules which will be justified by the information submitted in those reports. I trust that later on in the consideration of this bill substitutes will be offered for Schedules I and K—substitutes based on the reports of the Tariff Board to which I have referred—and in that case I shall be glad to support them, irrespective of their source. [Applause.]

Of course, the pending tariff bill contains its jokers. Any tariff act framed as this one has been is bound in the very nature of things to be filled with them. Some of those that are in this bill are plain and easily discerned and others are not. One of the most patent is contained in Schedule K. It was eloquently referred to this afternoon by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. In the bill to revise this schedule, submitted by the Democrats in the last Congress when they knew it would be vetoed if passed, Angora wool was given an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. In the pending bill much ado is made of the fact that wool is placed on the free list. But tucked carefully away in Schedule K is a clause, 314, in which our friends the Democrats have provided—and they know now that the bill will be signed when passed—that "hair of the Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and all hair on the skins of such animals" shall have a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem. It should be added here that the center of the Angora goat industry is in the district of one of our friends on the Democratic side of this House who comes from Texas—one of the members of the Ways and Means Committee who participated in the preparation of this schedule. He apparently saw to it that the tariff bill offered by his party did not get his goat.

I favor an income-tax law, and I regret exceedingly that I am not at this time to have the opportunity of casting a vote on such a law unencumbered with this pending omnibus tariff bill. Our friends the Democrats have very adroitly coupled the two together.

Both because of and in spite of these views I hold on these questions, as a Progressive and as one who believes with whole heart in the principles laid down in the platform of that party and who means earnestly to endeavor to live up to those principles here and do whatever possible to carry them out, I must oppose this omnibus bill, for whatever of good there may be in it is completely outdone by the bad, as I am able to see and understand it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY].

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Chairman, when I became a candidate for Congress at the special election held in my district in January, 1912, my platform contained 12 specific promises. Two of these promises—the amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people, and providing for the adoption of a decent pension law—were enacted into law during the last session of Congress, and I expect to have the pleasure of seeing two more promises—one providing immediate reduction of the tariff downward and the placing of trust-made goods on the free list, and the other providing for an equitable income tax, to equalize the burdens of government with those who are best able to bear it—enacted into law during the present session.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been a free trader. I am not a free trader now and, as long as the present condition of affairs continues, have no intention of becoming a free trader. I fully recognize that the tariff is a local issue; that the preparation of a tariff bill represents not the individual wishes or desires of any Member of this House, but is a series of compromises made between the different sections of the country and intending to strike a happy medium according to the ideas of the political party in power. Since the making of a tariff bill thus involves a series of compromises, it is impossible to completely satisfy each Member of the House, but there is so much of good in this bill and so little that is bad that it is entitled to the hearty indorsement of every Member of this body. I am exceedingly glad to know that the Democratic Party, in the preparation of this bill, has adopted its old position of a tariff for revenue tempered with such protection as is made necessary by a changed competitive condition, and that instead of an average tax of 90 per cent, as provided in the Payne law, the burden on the consumers of this country will be lowered to an average of a little less than 25 per cent.

Some of our friends, both Republican and Progressive, are prone to indulge their agricultural and laboring constituencies with fulsome cant relative to the Payne-Aldrich Act, and, lest they forget, I desire to go back and call their attention to the items contained in the free list of this act and make a brief comparison with the items contained in the free list of the pending measure.

We begin at the head of the list with aconite; acorns, raw, dried, or undried but unground; agate; albumen; amber; ambergris; ammonia; analine salts; apatite; arsenic; asbestos—and for the life of me I can not understand why a Republican should desire to place asbestos on the free list unless it was that he permitted his gaze to wander into the political future when he would have need for that particular article, and why our Progressive friends now defend that particular item and insist that it shall be retained, unless they, too, expect to have use for the self-same thing. Asafetida; balm of Gilead; beeswax; bismuth; bladders; and dried blood; Brazilian pebbles; camphor; catgut; whipgut or wormgut, and so forth, ad infinitum; chalk; civet; clay; cochineal; coffee; coir; cotton; cuttlefish bone; dandelion root; divi divi; and dragon's blood. And on down through the list there is ergot; palmleaf fans, to go with the asbestos; felt; fibrin; fishskins; and fossils—and why on earth should the Republican Party insist that fossils come in free when they have the splendid example of fossilized ideas in the preparation of this bill? Gambier; glass enamel; glass plates; grease; fat; guano; gutta-percha; hide rope; hones and whetstones; ice; india rubber; iodine; ipecac; jalap; jet; joss sticks; old junk; kindling wood; lac; lava; leeches—plenty of them after this bill was in operation; lime; litmus; loadstones; manuscripts; meerschaum; oakum; oil cakes; oleo stearin; paper stock; phosphates; plumbago; potash; pulu; quinia; radium; and old rags—not new rags, my friends; not the things that go to make clothing that living men, women, and children wear to protect them from the elements, but old rags, discarded and useless, come in under the beneficent provisions of that bill absolutely free of duty. Rennets, raw or prepared; salicin; salep; sausages; sheep dip; silkworm eggs; skeletons; soda; spunk; storax; tamarinds; tapioca; teeth; terra alba; tobacco stems—not the tobacco; they made the tariff on that from 35 cents to $2.50 per pound; but you were looking out for the best interests of the poor man whom you gentlemen talk about so touchingly, and so you made it possible for him to take his dear Jimmy pipe, go back into a corner of his home, fill it with tobacco stems, and enjoy himself to his heart's content. Turpentine; turtles; vaccine virus; wax; whalebone; wafers; and that closes the list. Made up almost entirely of druggists' sundries, there is only one item in general use that comes in free under the terms of your bill. What a confession for the man who defends it. No wonder tears come to the eyes of gentlemen who support that bill, gentlemen who have talked so eloquently and plead so earnestly for the farmer, for the laboring man, for the man who toils, and give as their sole reason for voting against this measure that it does not protect his interest; that it fails to bring to him that measure of benefit that is his by virtue of his being a citizen of this country. Not only do you tearfully plead now for your fattened industries, but "having ears you have heard not." And your next plea must be to your constituencies whom you have thus betrayed. My prediction is that your next lachrymal demonstration will compare with this, as does a thunderstorm to an October mist.

This bill places agricultural implements, including plows, harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, thrashing machines, cotton gins, wagons, carts, and all other agricultural implements of every kind and description, including their repair parts, now taxed 15 per cent ad valorem, to go on the free list; cash registers, linotype and typesetting machines, sewing machines, typewriters, shoe machinery, cream separators, tar and oil spreading machines, used in the construction and maintenance of roads, including their repair parts, all of which are now taxed at 30 per cent ad valorem, go on the free list; gloves, made wholly or in chief value of leather, from horsehides, pigskins, and cattle hides, now taxed at from 75 cents per dozen to $4.75 per dozen, go on the free list; leatherboard or compressed leather, leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps, or other forms suitable for conversion into boots and shoes, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather, leather shoelaces, finished or unfinished, harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or parts, now taxed from 5 to 20 per cent ad valorem, go on the free list; cut nails, cut spikes of iron or steel, horseshoe nails, hobnails, and all other wrought-iron or steel nails, not specially provided for, wire staples, wire nails made of wrought iron or steel, spikes, horse, mule, or ox shoes, and tacks, brads, or sprigs, all now taxed at four-tenths of 1 cent per pound, go on the free list; barbed wire, galvanized wire not larger than No. 6 or not smaller than No. 14, commonly used for fencing purposes, galvanized wire fencing of the same size, together with baling wire, all now taxed at from three-fourths of a cent per pound to 1¼ cents per pound, together with an additional tax of 35 per cent ad valorem, go on the free list; hubs for wheels, posts, head bolts, stave bolts, last blocks, wagon blocks, and so forth, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber not further manufactured than sawed, planed, and tongued and grooved, and now taxed at from 50 cents per thousand feet for rough lumber to $2 per thousand for dressed lumber, go on the free list; clapboards, now taxed at $1.25 per thousand, go on the free list; laths, now taxed at 20 cents per thousand, go on the free list; pickets, palings, staves, and so forth, now taxed at 10 per cent ad valorem, go on the free list; and shingles, now taxed at 50 cents a thousand, to come in free of duty.

I can understand why gentlemen now representing manufacturing interests that have fattened for years at the consumers' expense would oppose this free list containing these items, but I confess I am wholly unable to see how the man who represents a farming or a laboring constituency, or a constituency that is progressive and believes in honest and fair competition, can vote against this reduction that places the trusts manufacturing these articles of daily necessity on the free list and make his peace with his people by handing them the time-honored buncombe of protecting home industries—industries that have long since grown rich and powerful through their privileges at the people's expense.

In 1902 the International Harvester Co. was organized under the laws of New Jersey by the consolidation of the following concerns: The McCormick Harvesting Machine Co., the largest of these concerns with respect to assets and volume of business, organized September 11, 1879, and having a factory at Chicago; the Deering Harvester Co., second in importance, organized in 1899, with its factory at Chicago; the Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Co., manufacturer of the "Champion" line of harvesting machinery, organized October 18, 1886, with its factory at Springfield; the Piano Manufacturing Co., organized March 3, 1881, with its factory at Piano, near Chicago, but later moved to West Pullman, Ill.; the Milwaukee Harvester Co., organized December 15, 1881, with its factory at Milwaukee.

This combination was brought into existence by J. P. Morgan & Co., and its appraised assets, amounting to $67,076,229, was immediately inflated by its incorporators until its capital stock amounted to $192,000,000, and upon this sum the combination thus formed began to base its profits, its prices, and to frame its competition. It has gradually extended its operations until at this time it controls some twenty-odd subsidiary companies, and is complete master of the American market. The net earnings, dividends, additions to surplus, capital stock, together with rate of net earnings on capital stock and surplus, and rate of dividends on capital stock from the years 1903 to 1911, inclusive, is shown by the following table:

We people in the State of Kansas have had some experience with this same concern. Our attorney general brought a suit to oust them from the State because they were engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of trade, constituted a combination in violation of the Kansas law, and in the Eighty-first Kansas State Report, on page 612, the court in considering that matter found that the practical effect of the merger of these concerns that I have named into the name of the International Harvester Co., of New Jersey, had been to regulate and control the retail and wholesale prices of harvesting machines in the State of Kansas and to secure to the defendant, the International Harvester Co., approximately 85 per cent of the total business within the State. The court further found:

So strong is this monopoly that the testimony in this case discloses that its power to regulate and control the price of machinery throughout the civilized world where such machinery is used has a strong, if not controlling, force in the fixing of prices and the regulation of trade in such commodities, and that under the evidence a complete forfeiture of the defendant's charter and right to transact business within the State of Kansas would be justified.

Proceeding further, the court says:

It is prohibited from using exclusive contracts with its agents and dealers in this State, restraining or restricting them from handling or selling goods or implements of the nature sold by the defendant in this State other than those obtained from the defendant. And it is restrained and prohibited from making any unfair discrimination in the sale of its goods in this State against any section, community, or city, or between persons, for the purpose of destroying competition.

I am amazed that Members of this House, despite this report made by the Department of Commerce and Labor which I have quoted, and despite the finding of our court that this organization constitutes a trust and monopoly in restraint of trade, restraining trade throughout every section of the United States, should still insist upon gentlemen representing the State casting their votes against the users of agricultural machinery and in favor of this concern. I hope no Kansas Representative will dare vote against the bill that tends to free his constituents from the control of this merciless combine, and I am sure his constituents will rebuke him should he do so.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEELEY. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand the gentleman to imply that the International Harvester Co. or other manufacturers of agricultural implements of that kind are objecting to having their products on the free list? I have in my district two large manufacturers of agricultural machinery in competition with the International Harvester Co. I have not heard a word from them, but one of them told me a while ago that they did not care.

Mr. NEELEY. I have heard their sponsors on this floor protest in this House time and again and ask that these rates be maintained, and that this tariff be maintained, in behalf of the American manufacturer.

Mr. PLATT. Recently? Was it in these recent hearings?

Mr. NEELEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. PLATT. Has the gentleman heard that statement made recently by those manufacturers?

Mr. NEELEY. I heard the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] make an appeal of that kind. It has not been over 15 or 20 minutes ago. It is the same appeal that every special interest makes, to stand by the home industry.

Mr. PLATT. The manufacturers of agricultural machinery that I know do not care. They would just as soon have their products placed on the free list as not. They ship a large part of their products abroad, anyway.

Mr. NEELEY. I hope, then, that the gentleman will not vote against this bill.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEELEY. Certainly.

Mr. LOBECK. And when they ship harvesters abroad they sell to the Australian and Argentinian farmer for $80 what they charge the Kansas or Nebraska farmer $135 for, and thus put those wheat raisers abroad on a better basis and in a position of greater advantage to meet the cost of production.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should be fair, because he is mistaken about that.

Mr. LOBECK. Well, I am not mistaken, because I have seen it from letters, and have had some statements in which the claim is made that that is true.

Mr. NEELEY. I think that is correct, and I think that is not all of it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. NEELEY. I can not yield now. I understand that a wagon that is sold in Kansas for $75 to $80 is shipped across the ocean and sold in Germany, France, or Russia for $65; that a mowing machine that retails for $45 with us is sent to Europe, Asia, or Africa and sold for $35; and that other things are exported and sold in proportion.

Mr. LOBECK. F. o. b.?

Mr. NEELEY. Yes. I am sure my farmer friends will not object to the placing on the free list of cut nails and cut spikes of iron or steel, horseshoe nails, hobnails, and all other wrought-iron or steel nails, wire staples, wire nails made of wrought iron or steel, spikes, and horse, mule, or ox shoes, and so forth. I hope my friend who attempts to justify a vote against this bill will remember, too, that these items are controlled by a trust almost as powerful as the Harvester Trust, and that they will doubtless give this bill the same support the Harvester Trust gives the plan to reduce the tariff on agricultural implements.

And in that connection it might be proper to suggest that, notwithstanding the cry to protect the Nail Trust, in 1910 the total importation of cut nails and cut spikes into the United States amounted to 37,196 pounds, of the total value of $877, while the exports amounted to $407,904, and the amount consumed in the United States amounted to $1,811,000.

Horseshoes and hobnails imported in the same year amounted to 14,829 pounds, of the value of $2,162; the total consumption being of the value of $2,209,162.

Of wire nails the import was 8,648 pounds, of the value of $209, while the export was $1,705,026.

In 1910 we imported 642 pounds of horse and mule shoes of the total value of $105. We consumed that year $8,219,000 worth of these articles. We also imported 517 pounds of tacks, brads, and sprigs of the value of $22, while the exports were $613,004, and yet our Republican friends representing consumers of agricultural implements, barbed and fencing wire, lumber, laths, shingles, nails, and the other articles placed in this free list have the temerity to flaunt in the face of their constituents in this progressive year of 1913 an argument that means a vote to maintain these monopolies. Each of these industries has not only become great and powerful as monopolies at home, but they have so extended themselves that they can go into the home of the foreigner, compete with him on his own soil and against his own labor and machinery. None of these countries into which these trusts have gone and built up their splendid trade have subsidized them by paying them any duty on their imports, thus proving that during every minute of time they have been competing with the foreigner on his own soil they have been filching and robbing the consumer at home, and when you gentlemen on that side return to your farmer constituents to tell them the story of your vote against this bill I trust that you will then explain to them why it was you helped Andrew Carnegie and his associates in the construction of libraries and other philanthropic institutions in your districts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, it is too late for us to discuss the issue of changing from the protective system to a revenue system in this House. Our Democratic majority in control of the House have assumed that they have that commission and that we have no authority to combat it; that the commission came from the people, and that we must obey what the people have said.

I take issue, and I say that the people did not in the election decide against the protective system, because the majority vote of over 1,000,000 in this election was upon platforms that pronounced in favor of the protective system. And if that had been an issue where the people could vote "Yea" or "Nay," there is not any doubt in my mind as to what would have been the result of the election.

Yet I am not going to contend here that the Democratic majority should not push this issue to the last limit; but I am going to take the opportunity of saying that if this Democratic measure goes into effect there certainly must be a reversal of public opinion, and that will certainly come in a very short time—just as soon as the people can register their will. My judgment is that few things will be more sought after than a chance to vote.

We are here discussing whether this country, that has constantly profited under the protective system, shall now abandon that system and go on a revenue basis, a basis under which this Government never yet has prospered. Need I refer to national conditions preceding eras of tariff legislation in contrast with those following such legislation? No thoughtful student will deny that seasons of depression called for stimulation of business which was furnished by the system of protection, which in turn were followed by seasons of great business revival. It was true in the McKinley bill of 1890, the Dingley bill of 1897, and we are now, under the present bill, with a volume of trade unequaled in history. The opposite effects are shown in the experiment of revenue tariffs, such as the Wilson bill of 1894.

If proof for these utterances are desired, consult the volume of business transacted, ask the capitalist about the demand for his goods, ask the laborer about the certainty of his employment and the amount of his wages, ask the farmer to contrast the price of his produce sold from the farm in the periods of the protective system as compared to those of the revenue system.

When our Democratic friends were looking for an issue to go to the people in 1884 they saw a full Treasury, a surplus, under a Republican administration, which they seized upon and charged the party in power with the crime of being too prosperous. They declared that they would reduce the surplus if they but had a chance. One of these strange freaks of human conduct caused the people to reject the peerless leader of Maine to accept his opponent, Grover Cleveland. Four years of experience were sufficient, when the same people rejected the Cleveland message of 1887 and its author and commissioned the party of protection to reinstate the system under the McKinley bill. Most of us remember the challenge of that rare leader when in his place in this House he challenged the Democracy upon item after item, in which he urged that the Nation be given a chance to develop her resources on the basis of American wages, and "We will not only supply our own people but we will soon help to supply the world." I heard him declare we could produce all the tin we needed if a duty, protective in character, were allowed. He even challenged the opposition by writing into law that if within a certain time under the law we did not produce one-third of what we used the law was to be invalid. What followed? Tin mills were erected, millions of our own capital were invested, thousands of our own laborers were employed at good wages, tin was placed on the market, and in time prices went down to the consumer below what they were before the duty had been levied; and now consult the Democratic handbook accompanying this Underwood bill for the amount of tin we are exporting. And yet with the tariff on wages are still up while prices of tin are down. This is the American system.

Misrepresentation as well as willful denunciation opened the way for the application of the revenue system which bears the name of Wilson. I have heard upon this floor the declaration that that law was the best tariff law ever placed upon the statute books of any nation. Again I would recommend that men would consult the movement of business, the loss of wages, the destruction of capital, the paralysis of general industry, and the foreclosure of farm mortgages, with no price for farm products with which to pay expenses of living. This may be the measure of good law by some men, but it is not a Republican measure.

If Republican theory of protection means anything, it means to encourage American enterprise by inviting capital to remunerative investment and the employment of labor at American wages, on the theory that home competition will ultimately reduce the price to the consumer below that which he was paying before the industry was established. After this the duties can be lowered. This theory has been pursued by the Republican Party. The Morrill tariff was revised, and we got the McKinley law. Then came the Dingley law, and later came the Payne law. In many items the latter law was not a satisfactory downward revision. At the same time, the free list was increased and duties much reduced. Under it abundant revenue is afforded for the expense of the Government, business has never been better, labor was never more steadily employed or at better wages and under better conditions, and our exports surpass anything known in the past. But the Democratic Party undertook to prove the Nation was hopeless, business was inequitable, the consumer was ground to earth, prices were out of sight, of course, due to the tariff, and the country at large was generally on the verge of ruin. Apropos to this we experienced an unfortunate division in our ranks, which split our party in twain, in which not all the fault was on one side. This permitted a party casting less by 1,300,000 votes than the protective parties to ride into power. Here they are, in control of this floor. Here is their proposed law, designed to go to a foreign country to buy with American money goods made by European labor, instead of investing that money here, employing our labor here, and thus keeping both capital and labor here.

The protective system looks to the employment of American labor and not to the employment of European labor. The protective system looks to a wage that is a living wage and not to a wage on the basis of Europe. When you produce a thing in this country you employ American capital; you invest American capital in the employment of American labor, and if you purchase the goods from our own manufacturers you keep the money here instead of sending it to Europe, and that is the whole situation.

I have heard here time and again, from men for whose judgment I have the greatest respect and for whose courtesy I have equal regard, that we ought to go to Europe for the purchase of our goods rather than stimulate their production at home. I say, gentlemen, that whenever we can make two blades of grass grow at home where one grew before, that is American; and where we refuse to grow the two blades but choose Europe for the second one, that is not American. The man who says, for example, that the sugar industry is not legitimate because it needs the protecting, fostering care of this Government is unscientific and against true Americanism. For if this country can produce the sugar we need by a little fostering in the beginning, it is not only our duty but it is patriotic Americanism to stimulate that industry in the investment of our own capital, in the cultivation of our own fields, and in the employment of our own labor. This will not only tend to do so, but will keep American labor and capital both at home and make this Nation industrious instead of looking to the industry of Europe built upon a European scale of wages. [Applause on the Republican side.] We can produce in this country every pound of sugar we need. We are informed by experts like Dr. Wiley, whose judgment my Democratic friends opposed to this principle will respect, that America has sufficient acreage of sugar-raising lands, if properly cultivated, to produce every pound of sugar we need in this country. A moderate estimate fixes this amount at 278,000,000 acres, enough to produce double our needs. I know of no better practical illustration for our purpose than that furnished by sugar.

The German chemist extended his knowledge to the German beet field and proved that the beet was not only a good sugar-producing plant, but a splendid soil fertilizer at the same time. Our own agricultural experts insisted and still maintain that what Germany is doing we can do. Farmers knew that they could raise beets, but they could not dispose of them. It was impossible to export them to the German beet-sugar plants, and there was no American plant. No sugar plant costing over $1,000,000 would be built until there was some assurance that its product, made by American labor at American wages, would not come into open competition with cheap European labor costing one-third as much.

The Republican leaders, satisfied that we had the ability to produce our own sugar, gave capital the protection necessary to pay American wages. When was it done? In 1904. What is the result? More than 70 great sugar mills, many superior to anything in Germany, costing nearly $100,000,000, employing thousands of laborers on farm and in factory. What has this industry done? It produces now 600,000 tons of sugar, which sells to-day in our own markets for less price than before duty was levied. What is our contention? It is better to produce here than to go abroad. It is better to pay our producers than European producers. It is better to employ our labor than that of Europe.

Give our sugar producers assurance for a time and you will increase the acreage of beets, enrich the soil by the root plant, multiply the mills, increase the demands for labor, and you will promulgate a true Americanism. Now, my friends, I insist that it is true Americanism to stimulate the industry of sugar producing, and ultimately we will produce all we need. This is the protective policy and it is the American system.

The authors of this bill have dealt a deathblow to the sugar industry, especially that of Louisiana. When questioned "Why this course?" the reply came that sugar was not a legitimate industry. This position is based upon the theory that the same land could be employed more profitably in some other commodity.

For the same reason a similar stroke is dealt the woolgrowing industry of the country. The United States does not produce all the raw wool we need for our woolen mills. However, we do produce 65 per cent, and look to other lands for the remaining 35 per cent. The contention of this bill on this matter is, since we must purchase some wool abroad, it is wrong to levy a duty to protect that produced at home. In other words, the Democrats say it is better to seek the 35 per cent produced by cheap labor in foreign wool-producing countries, such as South America, South Africa, Australia, and Russia, than to stimulate home production by home capital and home labor. So it goes on the free list. Ohio, my State, the third woolgrowing State in the Union, with her 4,000,000 sheep producing the finest grade of wool in the world, must surrender this industry. This Nation, producing 328,000,000 pounds of wool, 65 per cent needed by our numerous mills, must surrender this industry. This bill justifies this vandalism on the basis that our people should cease the futile effort, as they style it, to raise wool and seek it in the markets of Australasia, South America, and South Africa. In other words, destroy one of the most important industries of the farm to justify a theory of tariff.

At a time when prices of meats are high and still increasing, because of the shortage of cattle raising, when common sense would urge the stimulation of sheep raising, not only for its wool product but its mutton value, thus reducing the price of meat by the increase of the supply, we have this freak bill to further embarrass the meat situation, and it is offered as a panacea for high cost of living. This is done in the face of facts produced by the Tariff Board that the sheep countries of the world outside of the United States will not greatly increase the world's product. If this be true, and it is not refuted, how long will it be after the destruction of the industry at home and we are dependent upon the outside world until the foreign monopoly will dictate prices to the American consumer? Why would it not be better to care for the home production, the 65 per cent of our needs, under which system each farmer could stock his farm with a growing flock which could live on forage much of the year at comparatively small expense, which will not only clean up the farm but would fertilize it to better production of other products. Why would it not be better than to look to the world for the 35 per cent by a policy that will ultimately increase this foreign need by 100 per cent and reduce this great Nation to a totally dependent one in the matter of wools, mutton, and lamb?

I hold such a raid upon such an established industry is unpatriotic and un-American. Here is an industry in which 600,000 producers and millions of consumers are directly interested, so individualized that no trust can be formed. It is particularly an industry of the farm, and since it is grown on land worth more than land is worth in South America, South Africa, and other countries, it must be abandoned. This is done in the interest of the consumer. What will be the consumer's chance when we must depend upon the foreign country for our needs? Who will control the price we shall pay? In the case of wool we shall fare as we will in the case of sugar when our prices are fixed by the importer, whose entire interest is in the amount of his imports, of his sales, and the profit. Wool can not be produced profitably with a less duty than 18 cents on scoured wool. This duty will not materially affect the price of clothing to the consumer, since 6 to 9 pounds will make the suit. A difference of $1 or $1.50 on a suit will be absorbed by the middleman, and the consumer will not secure the advantage. In order to save an imaginary sum the Democratic Party proceeds to destroy one of the country's best industries. I repeat that any raid upon an important industry such as the wool or sugar that will ultimately destroy it is not patriotic in this nor in any other country, and the time will inevitably come when the man who votes thus to destroy will hear a voice that is louder and more determined than any heard in this hall; and I am sure the time will not be long delayed if this measure goes into effect.

One argument oft repeated on this floor is that the protective system depletes our resources. I take issue on this statement. We ask protection for the woolgrower. One consideration is the value of sheep raising to the soil of the country. No farm was ever depleted by a flock of sheep, but invariably benefited.

For the same reason we ask for protection for the sugar beet as a root-producing crop, which as such is a great fertilizer of the soil as scientifically demonstrated in the agricultural laboratories and experiment stations of Germany and this country. A similar argument by our opponents printed in their handbook is to the effect that our system is designed to continue old, worn-out machinery that should be discarded and which must be discarded if we were on a free-trade basis. This statement was made by the distinguished floor leader of the majority, the author of this bill.

Let us examine the facts. I take it if the machinery of production is depleted and worn-out, production must either stand still or decrease. It surely would not increase. Is this true? Take my own State as an example. The last census compares the figures of 1909 with 1904. We have 15,138 manufactories in Ohio, in which are engaged 523,000 persons, representing a capitalization of $1,301,000,000. In 1909 this capital employed 446,934 wage earners, expending in wages $317,597,000. The products amounted to $1,437,936,000, to produce which materials costing $824,212,000 were utilized. The value added by manufacture was thus $613,734,000. When these figures are compared with the year 1904, the census reports the following increases: The increase in number of manufacturing plants was 9.8 per cent. The increase of wage earners was 22.7 per cent. The increase of products, which is the real test of the machinery, was 49.2 per cent. In the face of these figures, what becomes of the contention of the Democratic policy of depleted machinery? In this case, as in all others, facts and figures are your greatest enemies, but mere denouncement or loud declamation does not serve as a substitute for the census report. The increase in the iron and steel industry from 1899 to 1909 was in laborers 35.4 per cent and product 99.6 per cent. In the same period the meat business showed an increase of 144.6 per cent. In the five years from 1904 to 1909 the flour milling business showed an increase of 16.5 per cent. In the same period the clothing business, which represents $45,000,000, increased 38 per cent. The State shows similar growth in printing and publishing business; in automobiles, in which Ohio stands second; in the boot and shoe business the increase reached 22.6 per cent; in the clay products, in which the State ranks first, the increase from 1899 to 1909 was 85.2 per cent, being 18.1 per cent of the total product in the United States. Ohio also stands first in the manufacture of carriages, wagons, and so forth, this industry alone representing, in 1909, $21,949,000.

There is not a single industry of farm or factory, mine or manufactory, in my great State that is not seriously crippled by this proposed Underwood bill. What has this bill done for the farmer? In the desire to decrease the price of his produce in the belief that this price is the cause of high cost of living, his crop must be placed on the free list. In other words what he has to sell must come down in price, no matter what he must pay for what he buys. Wool, with 11 cents protection, must go on the free list—sugar receives like treatment. Corn, now protected with 15 cents per bushel, goes on the free list. Broom corn, now protected by $3 per ton, goes on the free list. Buckwheat, with 15 cents protection, also goes on the free list. Potatoes, now protected by 25 cents per bushel, go on the free list. Swine protected at $1.50 per head, also goes on free list. Like treatment is accorded lard, meats, milk, cream, rags, rye, seeds, and many other products.

What has not been robbed of all protection has been fatally reduced. Horses, protected at $30 per head, are to have $10 duty. Sheep, with a duty of $1.50 per head protection, reduced to one-third or 10 per cent ad valorem. Oats, with 15 cents protection, is reduced to 10 cents. Wheat, with 25 cents duty, is reduced to 10 cents, while flour, the finished product of wheat, goes on the free list. Butter, with 6 cents protection, is reduced to 3 cents. Beans, with protection of 45 cents per bushel, are reduced to 25 cents. Hay, with $4 per ton protection, reduced to $2 per ton. This is sufficient to show the viciousness of this measure as applied to the producers of wealth of the country.

The reasons offered for such reduction as announced by the brilliant floor leader of the majority, who has won the admiration of both friend and foe by his winning personality, was that first, protection is unconstitutional; secondly, it is the chief cause of high cost of living; and thirdly, it is the mother of trusts. If the protective system is unconstitutional surely Hamilton, Madison, and Washington, all of whom were protectionists, and each of whom was a member of the convention that framed the Constitution, would have known it. I place the judgment of the framers of that instrument against the modern Democratic free trader.

If protection is the cause of high cost of living, how does it appear that high prices are on the unprotected articles as the protected, and that high prices rule in free-trade countries the same as protected countries? If protection is the mother of trusts, what explanation have we of the existence of trusts in articles not protected, such as oil, salt, etc.? Or why do trusts thrive in free-trade England? The facts are that great combinations are the result of modern business methods for the sake of saving expense of operations. Where combination is possible, competition is impossible. This is not a subject of the tariff, but a subject of regulation and control.

High prices should be interpreted the "cost of high living" rather than the "high cost of living." It is due to many causes. First, the well-to-do situation of the average man has placed him in a position to gratify increased demands. He is becoming more extravagant. He wants more and his standards of living are gradually increasing. Secondly, the drift of population from country to city disturbs the balance between production and consumption. It increases the demand for consumption more rapidly than the supply of production. This also causes prices of products to go up. Thirdly, the multiplication and improvement of facilities for communication, making the world but one neighborhood, has a like tendency upward in prices. Fourthly, the increase in number of the middle men between the original producers and the ultimate consumer compels an upward trend of price to the consumer, though it might not change it for the producer. The farmer who sells his fat cattle at a price that steak could sell at 15 cents will see the steer go through a half dozen different hands, each of which must have a margin, so that when it reaches the hotel table it will command more than three times the original price. Fifthly, another cause of high price is the great bulk of money in circulation in our country. These causes are conditions of industry and not results of tariff duties.

This legislation is a playing of the town and city against the country. It goes upon the basis that it is in the interest of the consumer at the expense of the producer. The Democratic leaders say the consumer must always be considered before the producer. This is the sheerest demagogy. Who is the consumer, and who is the producer? How can you separate them in their interests? How can you benefit the consumer unless you also benefit the producer?

Wise legislation will look to the production in order that consumption is possible. The vast proportion of the consuming element is made up of men and women who have nothing with which to buy production except the wage they earn. Legislation that does not look to the supply of this wage is un-American. The chief thing in the mind of the consumer is not the price for which the producer sells his articles of necessity but whether he has the money with which to pay the price. The legislation that does not provide wages is bitter enmity to the consumer, no matter how loud its devotees profess that they are looking to the consumer and not to the producer.

If protection stands for anything, it is for the welfare of the consumer. It looks to building up industry here. It invests all our capital at home. It employs all our labor at home at wages on an average of double those paid in other countries.

Put this proposed tariff legislation into effect, remove the protection from the producer, seek the supply of your needs in foreign markets, then note the effect of your law upon the consumer, for whom you are now agonizing. Every dollar's worth of goods you purchase from abroad that could be produced at home you take from the labor at home and give to the labor abroad. Every dollar you send abroad for goods you could have purchased at home you reduce the business at home for the sake of the business abroad.

Put this proposed law into force by which you remove the protection of our farms, our manufactories, and industry in general, and one of two things must follow: Either the business must be seriously crippled, if not ruined, in all the various operations, or else labor here must be reduced to the basis of the labor in the countries with which you propose to compete. In either case, what becomes of the consumer? Oh, yes; we have heard it said that wages will not be lowered, that business will not be hurt; that when we remove the tariff we will invade the markets of Europe, which will increase the demand for our goods, and thus prices of both goods and labor will increase. This is placed on the basis that prices are ruled by the principle of the law of diminishing returns. That threadbare argument used by the author of this bill sounds very sophomoric, as it has the odor of the classroom of the college professor. The price of a thing is not determined by the cost of it. The price at which a thing sells does not measure the desire for it. The price of an article is always determined by the ability of the consumer to pay for it. I make an article, it costs me so much. My friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] makes the same article. It costs him less. Both articles are sold in the market. What I get does not depend upon the cost to me. It depends entirely upon the ability of the consumer to pay. If he can not pay, I can not sell, no matter how much or how little the thing costs. And I say here and now the man who constantly talks of the consumer, losing sight of the consumer's power to buy, which is his employment, determined wholly by the ability of the producer to pay wages with which consumption is made possible, that man is wrong. One will say, oh, it is a matter of production; the other will say, no, it is a matter of consumption. I do not care about the juggling of words. If we are out in a boat and it capsizes, we will not dispute whether we went down or the water came up. The effect is just the same. The sensible thing in legislation is to see that the producer can make it possible for the existence of a consumer. That is what the protective policy is pledged to do. Oh, but, you say, we want to open the markets of the world to our goods, as if the world's markets are not open now.

Has there ever been a period in the history of any country like ours at present? Where is the capital that can not find investment? Where is the laborer who can not find employment? Where is the man whose station is not better to-day, so far as common weal is concerned, than at any period past? If you have anything to sell, you can find a market. If you wish to buy, you have the money, or if you do not have it you do have the opportunity to work for it. The volume of trade, both domestic and foreign, is stupendous, unlike any other period. Consult statistics. Our foreign commerce is four and a quarter billion of dollars and our domestic trade is the wonder of the world. Our exports for nine months ending the month of September were as follows:

1911	1,428,710,426

For the seven months ending January the exports were as follows: 1911, $1,239,615,111—more than nine months in 1909; 1912, $1,289,855,419—more than nine months in 1910; 1913, $1,506,461,628—more than nine months in 1911.

This marvelous export trade is under the protective system, which our friends, the Democrats, say closes the foreign markets to our goods. I am not averse to opening up the markets to the sale of our goods. That has been done, as the figures show. But I am averse to opening up the markets for the purchase of foreign goods which we can produce at home.

The plea of the doctrinaire that we should proceed on the broad plane of cosmopolitan philanthropy which includes in our scope the whole world has no hold upon me if it means detriment at home. Free trade means equality of conditions. Europe does not give her labor the same chance we give ours. I am ready to open the gates when Europe lifts her labor to our plane, but I will not vote to lower our labor to her plane. That is the entire contention in this proposed legislation.

In conclusion, I am opposed to this proposed bill because it seriously cripples the agricultural interests. It strikes a death blow at two most valuable products—wool and sugar. It undertakes to benefit the resident of the city at the expense of the farmer. It proposes duties that will seriously cripple every woolen and cotton manufactory in the country. Its policy toward the boot and shoe trade, toward the earthenware industry as well as the glass industry is most hurtful. Not a schedule is touched that is not in danger of serious crippling. The first party to feel the hurt will be the laborer. While all will admit that duties when unnecessarily high should be reduced, which has been the history of the Republican Party, I believe the majority of the people will reject this revenue tariff measure, which is professedly an abandonment of our protective system.

If this measure becomes a law—and I am frank to say I expect the Democrats to pass it—we will see whether history will repeat itself. It is only 16 years from a former Wilson bill, which most of us still remember.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. ADAMSON, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3321—the tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARL L. COOPER.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

House resolution 79.

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, Carl L. Cooper be authorized to act as special employee of the House of Representatives and receive compensation at the rate of $1,800 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the employee that it was understood by the House should be given to the leader of the Progressive Party on the floor?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the recognition of the gentleman's party in his portion of the employees of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MURDOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 62. Joint resolution making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 9 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 26, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Eugene H. Chamberlain; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 4024) to correct the military record of Charles J. Lanning; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 4289) for the erection of a public building at Linton, Ind.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 4290) to provide an allowance for loss of distilled spirits deposited in internal-revenue warehouses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GOOD: A bill (H. R. 4291) providing for the erection of a public building at Marion, Iowa; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HOUSTON: A bill (H. R. 4292) providing for the registry of officers, clerks, and employees in the Federal service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada: A bill (H. R. 4293) to establish a botanical laboratory at Reno, Nev.; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. GARDNER: A bill (H. R. 4294) providing for the erection of memorials to Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. JONES: A bill (H. R. 4295) to establish the Fredericksburg and Adjacent National Battle Fields Memorial Park in the State of Virginia; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 4296) providing for the creation of a commission to be known as the Mississippi spillway belt commission, defining its power and duties, and making an appropriation for its expenses; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 4297) authorizing additional desert-land entries; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BLACKMON: A bill (H. R. 4298) granting an increase of pension to widows of all soldiers of the Mexican War; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4299) to require all common carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce to collect, accept, receive, transmit, and deliver all express packages not exceeding in weight 50 pounds; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 4300) to prohibit interference with commerce among States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4301) to amend section 57, subsection n, of the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4302) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat., 820); to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 4319) granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way in, over, and through certain public lands, the Yosemite National Park and Stanislaus National Forest, and certain lands in the Yosemite National Park, the Stanislaus National Forest, and the public lands in the State of California, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DALE: Resolution (H. Res. 76) to appoint John O. Snyder a special messenger to serve in and about the House; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. CARY: Resolution (H. Res. 77) directing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to report on holding corporations in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 78) authorizing and directing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions of transportation to Mount Vernon, Va.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BLACKMON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 76) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to accept the title to 4,000 acres of land at or near Anniston, Ala., for the purpose of establishing maneuver camps, rifle and artillery ranges, etc.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CURLEY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Massachusetts, relative to the sale of certain land by the United States to the city of Chelsea, Mass.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Massachusetts, relative to the price of coal; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Massachusetts, relative to the sale of small fruits; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. KAHN: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, relating to the preservation of the natural conditions of Lake Tahoe and of establishing by judicial decree the conflicting claims to the use of the waters thereof; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, relative to making investigations and experiments as to nature and cure of tuberculosis; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, protesting against the proposed reduction in the duty on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 26, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father Almighty, humbly and reverently do we bow in Thy sacred presence, realizing how utterly dependent we are upon Thee for life and all its attendant blessings. Thou hast anticipated all our needs, our longings, hopes, and aspirations; yet how often in the stress of life, its cares, and temptations do we forget the mind that conceives, the heart that loves, the hand that would guide us to better thoughts, nobler living. Strengthen our minds, purify our hearts, and make us willing to be led in Thy ways, after the manner of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the credentials of Hon. JOHN J. MITCHELL, of Massachusetts, properly certified to by the governor of the State and the secretary of the Commonwealth, and Mr. MITCHELL will come forward and be sworn. If there are any other gentlemen who have not been sworn they will please come forward.

Mr. JOHN J. MITCHELL appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office. [Applause.]

ASSAULT ON REPRESENTATIVE SIMS.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the special committee appointed under resolution 59, I desire to present a privileged report and to give notice that it will be called up as a matter of privilege immediately upon the conclusion of the tariff bill. I also desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia, chairman of the special committee, sends up to the Clerk's desk a report and asks that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Excluding the testimony, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Excluding the testimony, and the gentleman gives notice that he will call it up immediately after the disposition of the tariff bill by the House.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, does the testimony accompany the report?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The testimony accompanies the report, but it is not desired to print that in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. And that will be printed as a part of the House report?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. It is to be printed as a substantive part of the report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed in the RECORD and the report and the accompanying evidence will be printed as a separate document.

Mr. MANN. And I take it that it will be referred to the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. And will be referred to the House Calendar.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 6, Sixty-third Congress, first session.]

IN THE CASE OF CHARLES C. GLOVER FOR ASSAULT UPON REPRESENTATIVE THETUS W. SIMS.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, from the select committee appointed pursuant to House resolution 59, submitted the following report:

The select committee of the House of Representatives appointed pursuant to House resolution 59, and charged with the duty of investigating the alleged assault committed on Friday, April 18, 1913, by one Charles C. Glover, a resident of the city of Washington, upon the person of Representative THETUS W. SIMS, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee in the Sixty-third Congress, begs leave to report that it met on Monday, April 21, 1913, requested Representative SIMS to be present at a hearing on Tuesday, April 22, 1913, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., and notified Mr. Glover of the time and place of the hearing, also informing him that he could be present in person or by counsel and make any statement to the committee which seemed to him or his counsel to be proper. The committee also caused to be issued the summons of the House of Representatives to several actual witnesses of the alleged assault upon Representative SIMS by Mr. Glover.

The committee met for the hearing on Tuesday, April 22, 1913, at 10.30 a. m., and from the testimony adduced found the facts of the assault as follows:

FINDINGS OF FACTS.

"That Representative THETUS W. SIMS while on his way from his residence in the city of Washington to the Post Office Department on official business on Friday morning, April 18, 1913, was accosted in Farragut Square, in the city of Washington, by Charles C. Glover, who, after applying to him certain epithets, assaulted him by striking him in the face.

"That the said Charles C. Glover committed the assault upon Representative SIMS because of statements made by Representative SIMS in debate on the floor of the House of Representatives at several times during the session of the House in the Sixty-second Congress, in which Congress the said Representative SIMS was also a Representative from the State of Tennessee."

While Mr. Glover did not appear at the hearing either in person or by counsel, he sent a letter, which will be elsewhere set out in full in this report. In that letter is contained the following statement, admitting the assault upon Representative SIMS:

The preamble of the resolution sets forth with substantial accuracy the facts of the incident therein referred to. It is true that in a moment of passion, moved by what I deemed to be an extraordinary provocation, I, who have the most profound respect for the law, took the law into my own hands. It is needless to say that in so acting I had no intention to invade any privilege of the House of Representatives, or of any of its Members as such; nor, indeed, did I at the time understand that any claim could be made that I was so doing.

By the said House resolution 59 your committee was charged with the further duty of reporting—a course of procedure to be followed in dealing with the said C. C. Glover, to the end that the rights and the privileges of the House of Representatives and its Members should be maintained and protected.

The performance of this duty has necessarily involved a consideration of the privileges of the House of Representatives and its Members and of the powers of the House in relation to them. After giving to these topics such consideration as the time allowed by the House for the making of this report has permitted, your committee has reached, upon reason and precedent, the following conclusions:

First. That for the purpose of this inquiry it is not necessary to consider what privileges, if any, the House of Representatives or its Members may possess other than those expressly stated in the Constitution.

By section 6 of Article I of the Constitution it is provided inter alia that:

They (the Senators and Representatives) shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place.

The scope of this immunity was discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), to which we will later refer. The court said:

Mr. Justice Story (sec. 866 of his Commentaries on the Constitution) says:

"The next great and vital privilege is the freedom of speech and debate, without which all other privileges would be comparatively unimportant or ineffectual. This privilege also is derived from the practice of the British Parliament, and was in full exercise in our colonial legislatures and now belongs to the legislation of every State in the Union as matter of constitutional right."

It seems to us that the views expressed in the authorities we have cited are sound and are applicable to this case. It would be a narrow view of the constitutional provision to limit it to words spoken in debate. The reason of the rule is as forcible in its application to written reports presented in that body by its committees, to resolutions offered, which, though in writing, must be reproduced in speech, and to the act of voting, whether it is done vocally or by passing between the tellers. In short, to things generally done in a session of the House by one of its Members in relation to the business before it.

It may be thought by some that the constitutional immunity implied in the words "for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place" relates merely to lifelong immunity from legal proceedings against the Member. The term "questioned," however, has always been construed liberally. In Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra, the court quotes with approval from an English case, Stockdale v. Hansard (36 Common Law Rep., 67):

For speeches made in Parliament by a member to the prejudice of any other person or hazardous to the public peace, that member enjoys complete immunity.

This complete immunity guarantees exemption from questioning not only within but also without the courts. Obviously, if one may not question a Member for words spoken in debate under the processes of law, he can not do so by taking the law in his own hand.

In Wilson's Lectures on Law, delivered by Mr. Justice James Wilson, of the United States Supreme Court (vol. 2, p. 156), it is said:

The Members of the National Legislature * * * shall not for any speech or debate in either House be questioned in any other place. In England the freedom of speech is, at the opening of every new Parliament, particularly demanded of the King in person by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The liberal provision which is made by our Constitution upon this subject may be justly viewed as a very considerable improvement in the science and the practice of government. In order to enable and encourage a representative of the public to discharge his public trust with firmness and success it is indispensably necessary that he should enjoy the fullest liberty of speech, and that he should be protected from the resentment of everyone, however powerful, to whom the exercise of that liberty may occasion offense.

Second. An assault upon a Member of the House of Representatives for words spoken in debate is a breach of its privileges and a contempt of the House.

This has not only been the uniform opinion of the House of Representatives from the earliest times, but is necessarily true because of the reasons which lie at the foundation of the constitutional provision. As just stated, it was conceived that absolute freedom of speech and of debate in the Legislative Assembly was essential to the public welfare, and it was intended that the voice of a Member, and of his constituents speaking through him, should not be silenced by any fear of legal or personal consequences. A Member, of course, may plead his constitutional privilege in bar of any action based upon his utterances, but unless his person is likewise immune from attack for the same cause, the purpose of the Constitution would be but half accomplished.

Nor is the House as a collective whole less concerned in preserving this freedom of debate than are the individual Member and his constituency. In order that the final action of any deliberative body may represent the joint wisdom of its members, there must be unrestrained exchange of thought and opinion, and whatever tends to silence one subtracts just so much from the efficiency of the whole. A breach of a Member's privilege of unconditional freedom of debate therefore reacts upon the House; and the House in treating it as a contempt against itself does so with no desire to magnify its office nor to vindicate its wounded dignity, but to preserve and defend its legislative integrity and power. Of this legislative integrity and power it is the sole guardian, and it may at all times protect that integrity and power by appropriate action taken for and by itself.

CONGRESSIONAL PRECEDENTS.

There are parliamentary precedents for the conclusion that an assault upon a Member of the House of Representatives for words spoken in debate is a breach of its privileges and a contempt of the House.

During the first session of the Twenty-second Congress, in 1832, an aggravated assault was made by Samuel Houston upon William Stanberry, a Member from the State of Ohio, for words spoken in debate; and after full hearing and exhaustive discussion this was held by the House of Representatives to be a violation of its rights and privileges, authorizing the arrest and reprimand of the offender at the bar of the House. (1st sess. 22d Cong., Journal, pp. 590 et seq.; 2 Hinds' Precedents, 1616 et seq.)

During the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress (1857) there occurred the regrettable assault by Preston S. Brooks, a Member of the House from the State of South Carolina, on the person of Charles Sumner, a Senator from Massachusetts, because of language used by the latter in debate. A special committee of the Senate having been appointed to investigate the occurrence, reported the Senate powerless to proceed in the matter against a Member of the House except by making complaint to the House of the assault. In their report the committee said:

We have examined the precedents which are to found only in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, the Senate never having been called on to pronounce its judgment in a similar case. In the House of Representatives different opinions have at various times been expressed by gentlemen of great eminence and ability, among whom may be mentioned the late President of the United States, Mr. Polk, the late Judge Barbour of the Supreme Court, and Mr. Beardsley, of New York; yet the judgment of the House has always held an assault upon a Member for words spoken in debate to be a violation of the privileges of the House. (2 Hinds' Precedents, 1622.)

In the second session of the Thirty-eighth Congress (1865), one A. P. Field, in an attempt to intimidate and deter William D. Kelley from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a Member of Congress in voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation, made an assault upon Mr. Kelley, which the House held to be a breach of its privilege and caused the offender to be brought before the bar of the House and reprimanded. (2d sess. 38th Cong., H. Rept. 10; 2 Hinds' Precedents, 1625.)

Third. Such an assault, when committed on the person of a Member for words spoken in debate, constitutes a contempt of the House in which he is then sitting, although the words may have been spoken in a prior House.

It will be observed that the speeches made by Representative SIMS in the House of Representatives which Mr. Glover admits constituted the provocation for this assault were delivered by Representative SIMS during the Sixty-second Congress; but, while this raises a question not discussed in earlier precedents, it does not change, in our opinion, the status of the case. This becomes clear when we contrast the individual privileges of the Member and the collective privilege of the House.

It is obvious that the Constitution, in providing that Senators and Representatives shall not be questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House extends an immunity unlimited as to space and unrestricted in point of time. One who has been a Member of either body, whether longer so or not, can nevertheless plead this constitutional immunity against any attack which may be made upon him at any time by reason of any speech or debate which took place during his service. The shield of the Constitution, once extended, protects him so long as he may live.

The House, on the other hand, being simply the aggregate of its membership, is itself concerned with those things which affect the freedom and efficiency of its constituent Members. A Member of the Sixty-second Congress, for instance, who enters the Sixty-third Congress brings with him his constitutional immunity against question for his action in the former body; and in order that he may be free to perform, without fear or hindrance, his duties in the latter, it is both its right and duty to resent as an attack upon itself any violation of his constitutional privilege. Its attention should properly be directed, not to the time when this privilege accrued, but to the time when it was violated.

Fourth. The House of Representatives has power under the authority of the Constitution to punish as a contempt against it such a breach of its privileges as is involved in the assault upon Representative SIMS by the said C. C. Glover.

Both parliamentary precedent and high authority support this power. In addition to those precedents we have previously mentioned, there are the proceedings had by this House in 1795, in the first session of the Fourth Congress, against Robert Randall and Charles Whitney for attempted bribery; in the same Congress, against James Gunn for challenging a Member to a duel; in 1818 against John Anderson, in the first session of the Fifteenth Congress, for attempted bribery; in 1857, in the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, against James W. Simonton for contumacy as a witness; in 1874, in the second session of the Forty-third Congress, against Richard B. Irwin for a similar offense; and on the part of the Senate of the United States, in the first session of the Sixth Congress, against William Duane for a libel on the Senate; in 1848, in the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, against John Nugent for the publication of a secret treaty.

In the second session of the Forty-first Congress (1870) one Patrick Wood so assaulted Charles H. Porter, a Member of the House from the State of Virginia, in the city of Richmond, that the latter was delayed in returning to the House, although it did not appear that the act was done by reason of any words spoken by Porter in debate, but nevertheless it impeded the return of the Member to his place in the House and was held to be a breach of its privileges and a contempt. The offender was accordingly arrested and subjected by warrant of the House to three months' imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia. (2 Hinds' Precedents, 1626 et seq.)

As further illustrating not only the right but the power of the House to protect the constitutional privileges of its Members, the case of Charles V. Culver, a Representative in the Thirty-ninth Congress, should not be overlooked. The House having been advised of his arrest and detention under civil process in the hands of the sheriff of Venango County, Pa., issued a warrant to its Sergeant at Arms directing him to take Mr. Culver from the custody of the sheriff, which was accordingly done.

In the letter of Mr. C. C. Glover to this committee, in which he admits the assault upon Representative THETUS W. SIMS, but challenges the power and authority of the House to take notice of his act or punish him for it, he relies upon the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S.), already referred to in this report, as a warrant for a denial of the power of the House to deal with contempts of its privileges. It is therefore important to make a somewhat critical examination of the cases in the courts affecting the question.

JUDICIAL PRECEDENTS.

ANDERSON V. DUNN (6 WHEATON, 204).

This case grew out of an attempt upon the part of Col. Anderson to bribe Hon. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Claims. Upon a statement of the facts to the House, a motion was made directing the Speaker to issue a warrant for his arrest, and the identical question here involved was at once raised in the House.

Mr. Terry, of Connecticut, inquired whether, according to our forms of proceeding and to our constitutional provisions, a general warrant as proposed could be issued. Was it not opposed in itself and in its nature to the principle of civil liberty? The Speaker observed that in the practice of the House, happily, instances were extremely rare where such warrant became necessary. No such occasion had occurred within his observation. But there could be no doubt when an offense was committed against the privileges or dignity of the House it was perfectly in its power to issue a warrant to apprehend the party offending.

This question, pro and con, was debated very extensively and very ably in the House for many days, and it was contended on the one hand that Congress was given by the Constitution no power to punish for contempt, and that it especially had no power to punish for acts not committed in its presence. On the other hand, it was contended that the House had an inherent and implied power to protect the dignity, freedom, and self-respect of the House and to punish those guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House and of a high contempt of the dignity and authority of the same. After a very full consideration of this question, the House, by a very large majority, decided it had the power to punish for contempt, whether committed within the walls of the House or elsewhere, and Mr. Anderson was arrested and punished. He afterwards sued the Sergeant at Arms, Mr. Dunn, for trespass in executing this warrant, and raised the specific question that it was issued without authority and hence constituted no protection. The case was tried in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, which court held that the House did have the power to punish for contempt and that the possession of this warrant issued by the House constituted a complete defense to the action of the plaintiff. Mr. Anderson appealed this case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision of that court is found in 6 Wheaton, page 204. There the identical questions raised in the House were again insisted upon. It was there contended that the Constitution gave no express authority to either branch of Congress to punish for contempt, and that our institutions forbade its exercise as implied authority. The court says:

It is certainly true that there is no power given by the Constitution to either House to punish for contempts, except when committed by their own Members. Nor does the judicial or criminal power given to the United States, in any part, expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House, or any one coordinate branch of the Government. Shall we, therefore, decide that no such power exists? * * * But if there is one maxim that necessarily rides over all others, it is that the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers which the people have intrusted to them. The interests and dignity of those who created them require the exertion of the powers indispensable to the attainment of the ends of their creation. Nor is a casual conflict with the rights of particular individuals any reason to be urged against the exercise of such powers. * * * That "the safety of the people is the supreme law" not only comports with but is indispensable to the exercise of those powers in their public functionaries, without which that safety can not be guarded. On this principle it is that courts of justice are universally acknowledged to be vested by their very creation with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum in their presence and submission to their lawful mandates, and, as a corollary to this proposition, to preserve themselves and their officers from the approach and insults of pollution.

It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested by express statute provision with power to fine and imprison for contempts; but it does not follow from this circumstance that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute or not in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend. On the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution or a legislative declaration that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment.

But it is contended that if this power in the House of Representatives is to be asserted on the plea of necessity, the ground is too broad and the result too indefinite; that the executive and every coordinate and even subordinate branch of the Government may resort to the same justification, and the whole assume to themselves, in the exercise of this power, the most tyrannical licentiousness.

This is unquestionably an evil to be guarded against, and if the doctrine may be pushed to that extent it must be a bad doctrine, and is justly denounced.

But what is the alternative? The argument obviously leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts, and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy may meditate against it. This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberative assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people, and charged with the care of all that is dear to them; composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great Nation whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire; that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested. And accordingly, to avoid the pressure of these considerations, it has been argued that the right of the respective Houses to exclude from their presence and their absolute control within their own walls carry with them the right to punish contempts committed in their presence, while the absolute legislative power given to Congress within this District enables them to provide by law against all other insults against which there is any necessity for providing.

It is to be observed that, so far as the issue of this cause is implicated, this argument yields all right of the plaintiff in error to a decision in his favor for non constat from the pleadings, but that this warrant issued for an offense committed in the immediate presence of the House.

Nor is it immaterial to notice what difficulties the negation of this right in the House of Representatives draws after it when it is considered that the concession of the power, if exercised within their walls, relinquishes the great grounds of the argument, to wit, the want of an express grant, and the unrestricted and undefined nature of the power here set up. For, why should the House be at liberty to exercise an ungranted, an unlimited, and undefined power within their walls any more than without them? If the analogy with individual right and power be resorted to it will reach no further than to exclusion, and it requires no exuberance of imagination to exhibit the ridiculous consequences which might result from such a restriction imposed upon the conduct of a deliberative assembly.

Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within the district. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes and was intended by the Constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the General Government; but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet "contempt" might be reasonably applied.

This decision clearly and unequivocally sustains the doctrine that the House has the implied right to punish for contempt, whether committed in its presence or elsewhere.

NUGENT V. BEALE (SMITH'S DIGEST OF DECISIONS AND PRECEDENTS, 601).

The next time this matter came up for judicial determination was in the case of Nugent v. Beale in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia. This case grew out of a breach of the rules of the Senate by Mr. Nugent. A warrant was issued and placed in the hands of Beale for service and a writ of habeas corpus was asked, bottomed on the proposition that the Senate had no power to arrest or punish for contempt. The court said:

The jurisdiction of the Senate in cases of contempt of its authority depends upon the same ground and reasons upon which the acknowledged jurisdiction of other judicial tribunals rests, to wit, the necessity of such jurisdiction to enable the Senate to exercise its high constitutional functions—a necessity at least equal to that which supports the like jurisdiction which has been exercised by all judicial tribunals and legislative assemblies in this country from its first settlement and in England from time immemorial.

IRWIN V. ORDWAY (SMITH'S DIGEST OF DECISIONS AND PRECEDENTS, 520).

In 1874 one Richard B. Irwin was held in contempt of the House for a refusal to answer certain questions before a committee of that body, and having been presented in custody of N. G. Ordway, the Sergeant at Arms, he applied to one Arthur McArthur, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon hearing, the writ was refused, and in refusing it the court said:

There can be no doubt that either House of Congress has the right of committing for contempts all contempts which infringe upon the order, dignity, or the purity of their legislation, and for this purpose it is not denied but that they have the power of examination, of investigation, and of calling witnesses into their presence or before their committees and of administering oaths and putting inquiries, and of punishing at refusal to answer. These powers of the House are so very clearly established now that the learned counsel has not impeached them unless Congress, by the enactment of 1857, has abrogated this almost indispensable power of Congress. It is to be observed that the statute applies to only a species of contempt; that is, the witnesses who refuse to answer questions upon subjects of legislation before Congress or before its committees. * * * The power of the House to punish for a contempt extends only to confinement and terminates with the session of Congress. If a party were found guilty of a contempt 24 hours before the period of adjournment, that must be the limitation of the punishment. Now, this might be a very inadequate protection to the House and a very inadequate punishment for a party in contempt. I have no doubt that Congress intended recusant witnesses or witnesses refusing to answer pertinent inquiries upon proper subjects of investigation should be punished beyond the power of the House to reach them; and that they therefore created the offense a misdemeanor to be punished by fine and imprisonment in the courts of justice. This statute can by no means purge the contempt or abolish the power of the House to protect itself in this respect, as it is able to protect itself from every other species of contempt.

KILBOURN V. THOMPSON (103 U. S., 168).

The next time that this question was discussed was in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson. This was a case wherein one Kilbourn refused to answer certain interrogatories propounded to him by a committee of the House of Representatives. This opinion, written by Mr. Justice Miller, undoubtedly controverts some of the reasoning contained in the case of Anderson against Dunn, and by some is thought to overrule the fundamental principle involved in that case, namely, the implied power of the House to punish for contempt. But a careful reading of the case will show that that is not true. After having given expression to much dictum on this subject, it finally bases its opinion upon another and entirely different proposition. The court says:

Nor, taking what has fallen from the English judges, and especially the later cases on which we have just commented, is much aid given to the doctrine that this power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully their function of legislation. This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case, because we are able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function.

Then, after defining the express powers of the House to punish its own Members, the court continues:

Whether the power of punishment in either House by fine or imprisonment goes beyond this or not, we are sure that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House unless his testimony is required in a matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire, and we feel equally sure that neither of these bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen.

It will thus be noticed that in the Kilbourn case the Supreme Court bases its decision upon the proposition that Congress has no power to punish a contumacious witness for refusing to answer questions in regard to matters about which the House has no jurisdiction to inquire—namely, the private affairs of individuals or corporations. It does not even decide that Congress has no power to punish a contumacious witness for refusing to answer questions concerning which the House did have the right to inquire. It did not overrule the case of Anderson against Dunn; at most, it only limits and defines the doctrine of that case.

IN RE CHAPMAN (166 U. S., 661).

The last time that this question was before the Supreme Court was in the case of Elverton R. Chapman. This is a case where prosecution had been had against Chapman under the statute for punishing contumacious witnesses. Application was made to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus. The contention was made in that case that Congress had undertaken to delegate its power to the courts of the District of Columbia and this statute was, therefore, unconstitutional. The court, in passing on that question, said:

While Congress can not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the inherent power to punish for contempt, it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto shall be a misdemeanor against the United States.

And further on the court says:

Nevertheless, although the power to punish for contempt still remains in each House, we must decline to decide that this law is invalid because it provides that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto shall be a misdemeanor against the United States, who are interested that the authority of neither of their departments, nor of any branch thereof, shall be defied and set at naught.

This case in all of its reasoning clearly recognizes and sustains the doctrine that each House has the inherent power to punish for contempt.

As a result of this analysis of the judicial precedents it seems clear that it has been established by the highest court of the land that either branch of Congress has the implied power and authority to punish those guilty of a contempt of the authority of either House by a breach of its privileges whether the breach is committed within or without its Chamber.

In view of the expressed desire at the time the resolution under which this committee is acting was passed, a somewhat extended examination of the matter of the privileges of the House has been made. In addition to the privileges expressly stated in the Constitution there is warrant for the claim that the House of Representatives possesses such additional and inherent privileges as are necessary for the preservation of its own integrity and the due performance of its legislative functions. Such are, for instance, the right to protect itself from the offer of bribes, to punish contumacious witnesses, and to put down tumult or riot within its walls, or so near thereto as to disturb its deliberations; but for obvious reasons it has always been deemed unwise to attempt a catalogue of these inherent privileges and powers, and so long ago as 1837 the House of Representatives expressly refused to proceed with a bill defining the offense of a contempt of the House and providing punishment therefor.

Upon the question of inability to define breaches of privilege and contempts of the House the Supreme Court itself has said:

> Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within the District. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes, and was intended by the Constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the General Government; but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts, and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet "contempt" might be reasonably applied. (Anderson v. Dunn, supra.)

The existence of the inherent power in the House of Representatives to determine and punish contempt against its privileges is most cogently stated in Rawle on the Constitution, as follows (p. 48):

> It would be inconsistent with the nature of such a body to deny it the power of protecting itself from injury or insult. If its deliberations are not perfectly free, its constituents are eventually injured. This power has never been denied in any country, and is incidental to the nature of all legislative bodies. If it possesses such a power in the case of an immediate insult or disturbance, preventing the exercise of its ordinary functions, it is impossible to deny it in the other cases which, although less immediate or violent, partake of the same character by having a tendency to impair the firm and honest discharge of public duties.

That learned jurist, Mr. Justice Story, strongly sets forth the same views thus (Story on the Constitution, vol. 1, sec. 847):

> This subject has of late undergone a great deal of discussion both in England and America, and has finally received the adjudication of the highest judicial tribunals in each country. In each country upon the fullest consideration, the result was the same, namely, that the power did exist, and that the legislative body was the proper and exclusive forum to decide when the contempt existed, and when there was a breach of its privileges; and that the power to punish followed, as a necessary incident to the power to take cognizance of the offense.

The committee also believes that in reporting on such a grave subject it ought to say that while freedom of speech and debate is a great vital privilege, and without that freedom to an unconditional extent all the other privileges of either of the Houses of Congress would be practically ineffectual, yet the very existence and extent of the privilege demands the greatest restraint in its exercise. No man, even under the cloak of public necessity and parliamentary power, ought to have the right wantonly to defame another.

As Mr. Justice Story very pertinently says (Story on the Constitution, sec. 866):

> Every citizen has as good a right to be protected by the laws from malignant scandal, false charges, and defamatory imputation as a Member of Congress has to utter them in his seat. If it were otherwise a man's character might be taken away without the possibility of redress, either by the malice or indiscretion or overweening self-conceit of a Member of Congress.

The House of Representatives is vitally concerned with the safeguarding of its privileges and the preservation of its legislative integrity and dignity. It is just as seriously concerned, however, with the maintenance of such a course of conduct on the part of each of its individual Members as will assure to every citizen in the land protection from defamation on the floor of the House. The power of the House over its Members is of the broadest character. The breach of the privileges of the House by a Member gives to the House ample power of punishment. It must become to be understood, therefore, that as the privileges of the House in so far as the public is concerned will be enforced by prompt punishment for contempt in the event of their breach, the House, in the future, as often in the past, will also fully protect all citizens from unjust assaults upon their character by censure or other punishment administered to an offending Member.

The committee calls attention to the written communication received from Mr. Glover, which will be found in full in the appendix containing the testimony accompanying this report.

This letter, it will be observed, contains a frank avowal of fault and a voluntary disclaimer of any intentional contempt toward this body. The testimony, however, establishes the fact that his act was the result of some premeditation and design extending over a period sufficiently long for him to have informed himself, if ignorant, of the privilege of the House; and his disclaimer, while full and free in form, is accompanied by a challenge, though without discourtesy, of the jurisdiction of the House in the premises. Under the circumstances, therefore, your committee recommends the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant at Arms commanding him to take in custody wherever to be found the body of Charles C. Glover, of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and the same in custody keep, and that the said Charles C. Glover be brought to the bar of the House of Representatives on a day to be fixed in said warrant to answer the charge that he, on Friday, April 18, 1913, in the city of Washington, D. C., committed an assault upon the person of Representative THETUS W. SIMS, a Representative in the Sixty-third Congress from the State of Tennessee, because of words spoken by the said Representative SIMS in debate on the floor of the House of Representatives while the House was in regular session during the Sixty-second Congress, and that in committing said assault Charles C. Glover has been guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives; and that the said Charles C. Glover be furnished with a copy of this resolution and a copy of the report of the select committee of the House of Representatives appointed to investigate the charge made against him in the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That when Charles C. Glover shall be brought to the bar of the House to answer the charge of having violated the privilege of the House of Representatives by having made an assault upon Representative THETUS W. SIMS, of the State of Tennessee, for words spoken by said Representative SIMS on the floor of the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall then cause to be read to the said Charles C. Glover the findings of facts by the special committee of the House charged with the duty of investigating whether or not the said assault had in fact been committed as alleged, and whether or not the said Charles C. Glover had violated the privileges of the House of Representatives by said assault. The Speaker shall then inquire of the said Charles C. Glover if he desires to be heard, and to have counsel, on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives for having violated its privileges. If the said Charles C. Glover desires to avail himself of either of these privileges, the same shall be granted him, if not the House shall thereupon proceed to take order in the matter.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321—the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321—the tariff bill—with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] such time as he desires to occupy. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, for many years those who believe in justice in taxation have been striving to secure the adoption of a national income tax. The United States Supreme Court first blocked the way by their decision in the Pollock case. During the period that followed this decision, surprising as it was disappointing, its friends continued undismayed to advocate this wholesome doctrine and watched every opportunity to secure its enactment into law in some form. During these dark years of reverses and failure the Democratic Party was considerate enough of the rights and interests of the people to write in its quadrennial platforms a ringing declaration in favor of this doctrine. The Nation-wide sentiment to this effect, which was thus kept alive, grew until in 1909 a Republican Congress found itself confronted by the alternative of accepting a comprehensive income-tax law or a less broad provision limited to corporations. Being wedded to class taxation, they chose the latter as the lesser measure of relief which the country would receive. The friends of this tax also wrung from that unwilling Congress the submission of an amendment to the Constitution which when ratified would uproot and overturn the Pollock decision and again restore to the people and their representatives in Congress every phase of this just power of taxation.

I congratulate the American people upon the fact that they ratified that amendment, wiped out all judicial obstructions, and cleared the way for comprehensive, honest fiscal legislation. The people's representatives in Congress, no less alert, no less mindful of the public welfare, now propose to write into law the great principle which the people forever wrote into the Constitution. The general uprising throughout the country in behalf of this tax is due to the long-standing dissatisfaction with existing tax conditions and to the belief, which long since became a conviction, that the masses were being grossly discriminated against through the agency of our tax laws. Every citizen realizes that the General Government is obliged to secure revenues to defray its necessary expenses, and that in doing so it takes annually from the property of the American people in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000. This can only be accomplished by means of taxation of some kind and in some form. Voluntary contributions, both to the state and the church, as practiced in the early colonial days, are no longer made. No matter how imposed, taxes are never welcomed except to the extent that they displace a more undesirable method of taxation. I should say that there is one exception to this universal rule of human nature. Our manufacturing friends, who have been in a tariff partnership with the Government for more than half a century, strongly favor the high protective-tariff tax for revenue only—not Government revenue, but revenue nevertheless.

During recent years there has been a general agitation and demand in almost every State in the Union and almost every country in the world for intelligent, fair, and practical reforms and readjustments of their tax systems, to the end that every citizen may be required to contribute to the wants of the State or Government in proportion to the revenue he enjoys under its protection. To this end the doctrine of equality of sacrifice or ability to pay is being universally invoked. A glance at the fiscal history of all countries shows a constant struggle on the part of the wealthy and more powerful classes to shift the chief weight of Government taxation to the shoulders and backs of those weaker, poorer, and less able to protect themselves from the injustice and oppression inflicted by disproportionate tax burdens. This conflict has been and is to-day being waged in the United States.

All taxes in this country, whether for National or State and local purposes, fall upon the American people; however, the gross inequalities and injustices resulting from tax evasion by those most able to pay and the shifting of the tax burden to those least able to pay is seen alike in connection with both national and local taxation. This is the result of unequal and unjust tax laws. As stated, the General Government must annually take from the property of the people about $1,000,000,000, while the States and their subdivisions must annually take a still larger amount in taxes. Let us glance for a few moments at the effect and operation of our National and State tax laws. The States, as a rule, have sought to maintain the general property tax system.

A few instances will sufficiently disclose the inefficiency and unfairness arising therefrom and the consequent failure and virtual breaking down of these systems. The State Tax Commission of Massachusetts, according to its published report, recently estimated the value of personal property in Massachusetts that is subject to taxation at over $5,600,000,000, of which less than one-fifth is taxed. The commission also found that the greater part of this remainder, viz, $4,646,265,000, is intangible personalty subject to taxation, but which is not taxed, because its disclosure has never been compelled. By the United States Census inquiry of 1904, New York had $5,500,000,000 of personalty, whereas by the tax returns she had only $1,500,000,000. According to the published report of the special tax commission of that State in 1907, in which the disparity between the assessed and real value of personalty was placed at much wider figures, the following, among other, conclusions were reported:

1. That the richer a person grows the less he pays in relation to his property or income.

2. Experience has shown that under the present system personal property practically escapes taxation for either local or State purposes.

The comptroller general of South Carolina, in his recent report for 1912, indicates that the small property holders pay the bulk of the taxes of the State. One real estate firm of Columbia, according to this report, published at the close of 1912 that their real estate sales during the year in that city aggregated over $4,000,000, whereas its assessed valuation was $400,000, or 10 per cent of the price it brought, while the assessed valuation of all property, both in that city and county, was only $10,685,000, although tax assessors assumed to assess it at 50 per cent of it actual value.

According to the recent report of the Kentucky Tax Commission, the amount of deposits in the banks of the State on the 1st of January, 1912, was given in for assessment by the taxpayers at $12,847,868, whereas, according to the reports of the banks to the State commission and to the Comptroller of Currency at Washington, the amount of deposits on that day was, in fact, $133,339,871.

The mayor of Philadelphia recently stated in the press that the undervaluation of property in that city is more than $300,000,000.

To further illustrate our State and local tax systems by an individual instance, the published reports show that Mr. Andrew Carnegie for many years only paid taxes upon a personal assessment of something over $5,000,000, although it has recently been raised to ten million. It may be safely said that with a few notable exceptions, the conditions I have described exist in the State and local tax systems in relative proportion throughout the Union. The small property owner, who can not hide his property nor shift his tax burdens, constantly feels the crushing weight of taxation, while the rich investor in securities, the money lender, and the wealthy business and professional men cover up most of their taxable property, as well as much of their city realty, when the assessor comes around. Intangible personalty, including stocks, bonds, and other securities, almost entirely escape taxation everywhere. A report of the Census Office shows that in the year 1904, while the true value of all property was $107,104,192,410, the ad valorem assessment of this property was only $38,963,381,000; that the true value of personalty was $44,762,719,000, while it was only assessed at $8,873,562,000, and the assessment of realty was less than 50 per cent of its true value.

Turning to our present system of national taxes, we find a still worse condition with respect to our customhouse taxation. Our internal-revenue taxes offer no special ground for criticism. Under this system Illinois paid $51,600,000 to the Government for the year ending June 30, 1912; Kentucky, $31,177,000; Indiana, $30,000,000; Missouri, $12,000,000; New York, $43,800,000; Pennsylvania, $25,600,000; and other States likewise paid in smaller amounts. Our system of high protective-tariff taxation violates every canon of taxation and is outrageous in its operation and effects. It is conceived upon the idea that the people should be taxed, not according to their ability to pay, but according to their needs and, practically, their poverty. No civilized or humane people can longer tolerate this system of diabolical extortion. In contributing three hundred millions to the Federal Treasury the American consumer is compelled at the same time to hand over at least $1,500,000,000 as a bonus to those select individuals given special favors by the high protective-tariff tax. During recent generations our high tariff taxes have degenerated into a system of special privilege, such as has never before been revealed in the annals of our fiscal history. It is no longer justified either in law or morals. The public conscience revolts against it and modern civilization turns away from it. This doctrine of taxation, the plain and palpable effect of which requires one citizen to bestow as a gift portions of his hard earnings upon another citizen, has become insupportable here and everywhere, and whatever may be the future developments of the economic policy of the United States, the period of high protection has reached its end. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The present average protective-tariff rates appear to be in the neighborhood of 40 per cent, but in fact, when we consider the innumerable rates that are absolutely prohibitive, the average rate must be near 60 per cent.

The temptation to discuss at length the evils and unfairness of our high tariff taxes, and the splendid reductions carried in the present bill is very great, but I shall forego this for the present, in order to consider other phases of our proposed tax system. The American people have completely learned that they are not being taxed either fairly or honestly; they are demanding that the inequalities, abuses, and injustices of our present system of high tariff taxation shall be eliminated, and that a new system of taxes, fair and equitable, embracing a strictly revenue tariff and an income tax, shall be devised. The experience of all countries with respect to every form of taxation has resulted in the universal conclusion that the fairest and most just of all taxes is that which is levied upon the citizen according to ability to pay, and that this result can best be accomplished by imposing a tax on net incomes.

Fifty-two countries and States have taken this step, and wherever given a reasonable trial this form of tax has never been repealed, save in the United States.

England, the seven States of Australasia, and most of the other English colonies, Prussia, and the numerous other German States, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Hungary, Greece, Japan, Denmark, Austria, and numerous other important countries have this tax in operation, while France is on the verge of adopting a comprehensive income-tax law in lieu of numerous other taxes. In many or most cases other countries have adopted and maintained this tax for the twofold purpose of securing revenue and equalizing the burdens of taxation.

In no other way could the burdens be equalized and the rising tide of unrest, discontent, and socialism be so successfully met. By this method alone could every citizen see and know that taxes are being imposed equitably and according to ability to pay.

The very fact that this is a just tax means that it will meet with opposition; the beneficiaries of unjust taxation and many who have measurably escaped all taxation will always be found opposing an honest and fair tax upon selfish grounds. Under the present high tariff tax system a poor man with a large family pays more taxes than a rich man with a small family. Hence the man of weath who is too selfish and too unpatriotic to pay taxes will vigorously oppose the imposition of any just tax, as will any creature of class or privilege taxation.

The pending measure has already met with the specious suggestion that it is class legislation, and makes a distinction between citizens of large means and those without particular means. It may be replied that the very purpose of the measure is to reach for taxation those who have escaped taxes and who are most able to bear the same. Suppose the bill in chief measure exempted this class of citizens, as other laws have done and now do; the tax would continue to be paid, as heretofore, by the middle and poorer classes. The very purpose of a combination of just tax laws is to reach every citizen in fair proportion. The masses of the people are now paying most of our $312,000,000 tariff taxes and most of our State and local taxes, save in a few States. Then where is the injustice of requiring the receivers of incomes over $4,000 to equalize in some measure these tax burdens by contributing less than $100,000,000 to the Federal Treasury?

The objection is also offered, in a tone of injured innocence, that the proposed tax would be sectional in its effects. This measure certainly is not sectional in its terms, and should it be sectional in effect it would be due to the fact that wealth has first made itself sectional. It would be monstrous to say that the receivers of great incomes which are drawn from every section of the country may segregate themselves and upon the plea of segregation or sectionalism successfully exempt their entire wealth from taxation. They should invoke the plea of segregation and not sectionalism.

The very nature and purpose of the income tax is fairly to reach and successfully to cope with such conditions, for long experience everywhere has demonstrated that the only means of getting at the financial resources of the country in fair measure, and taxing classes of persons who would otherwise escape taxation or nearly so, is to levy a tax on incomes. To illustrate the importance of this tax, during the parliamentary debate of 1909, Mr. Lloyd George said:

> The income tax is in reality the center and sheet anchor of our financial system.

Mr. Gladstone characterizes it as an engine of gigantic power for great national purposes.

This tax in England now produces about two hundred millions of revenue annually, and according to universal testimony gives the taxpayer as little trouble as any form of taxation. The complaint of inquisitorialness has now almost completely disappeared.

I shall not consume the time of the committee in commenting upon the results of the operation of this tax law in the various foreign countries, except to say that the masses everywhere have a deep-seated conviction that it is fair alike to every citizen and is the only effective method of equalizing tax burdens.

This tax, in addition to being fair, is productive and responsive to changes in rates, and is cheap of collection.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. In paragraph B and paragraph C of section 2, the income-tax section, it would appear that a holder of municipal bonds or State bonds would be exempt from payment of tax.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will pardon me now, I will come to an anaylsis of the bill within a few moments.

Mr. MOORE. Very well. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but the point is very much inquired about, and I would like to have the gentleman explain it.

Mr. HULL. No honest taxpayer has anything to fear. The fact that difficulty in administering the proposed law is sometimes experienced is due to the persistent efforts of dishonest or evasive taxpayers to shirk and evade their proper share. No law that would effectually reach this class of taxpayers can be devised and successfully enforced without more or less difficulty in some instances. The administration of the present National and State tax laws is more inquisitorial and difficult if enforced.

Every good citizen should not only be willing to contribute according to ability to the needs of the Government, but to this end should be willing to devote a brief time during some one day in the year, when necessary, to the making up of a list of his income for taxes. The Government asks this of him in return for the many blessings and benefits he receives. It is gratifying to find during recent years the large number of our wealthiest citizens who heartily favor the proposed tax and cheerfully agree honestly to abide by its provisions; those who do not subscribe to this patriotic view may realize later their shortsightedness. The intelligence of the American people has rapidly increased, until to-day the overwhelming majority of the masses in every section of the country, whether in the valleys or in the mountains, are keenly alive to existing financial, industrial, and social conditions, and realize fully the great disproportion of governmental burdens which rest upon them.

The masses leave their homes and families and imperil life and body to fight the battles of the country in time of war, and none realize better than they that by reason of discriminating laws and governmental policies they are required to support the Government in chief measure in time of peace, and in addition constantly to make unjust contributions to the favored class of their fellow citizens.

It is sometimes sought to prejudice persons against this tax by asserting that it is a tax upon thrift and industry. It may be replied that the tariff is a tax upon consumption, want, and even poverty and misery. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In any event, the proposed tax is measured by net profits or gains, and is not imposed upon gross income nor capital nor other property. If a citizen has not been successful in his efforts to accumulate profits he is not required to pay the tax, but if he has prospered he is required to contribute to his Government, not the scriptural tithe, but a small percentage of his net profits.

The proposed tax is the outgrowth of centuries of tax legislation throughout the world. Those who have been the victims of our intangible and invisible tariff taxes, with all their features of spoliation and plunder, without being able to know the extent thereof, should and will welcome the proposed tax; the receivers of large incomes and the owners of great wealth should prepare to accept it as a permanent tax, for, in my judgment, it has come to stay. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Responding to the manifest interests and desires of the American people and to the fiscal needs of the American Government, the Democrats of this House propose to incorporate, along with honest tariff revision, an income-tax provision permanently in our tax system, the effect of which will be to displace about $70,000,000 derived from the most vicious portion of custom-house taxation, to the end that this country may in the future have justice in taxation, flexibility and stability of revenue, and economy in expenditures. This provision goes hand in hand with genuine tariff reform.

I desire now to give a brief outline of the pending measure. Instead of comprising 100 or more pages, containing in detail all the methods of administration, such as European and other laws present, this measure briefly but succinctly prescribes each essential rule and method with respect to the levy, assessment, and collection of the tax, and leaves to be embraced in the regulations to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury the manner and details of carrying out the provisions of the law. These regulations will make clear to the taxpayer the scope and application of each feature of the law with respect to every class of taxpayers and business.

It should be borne in mind that paragraphs A to G relate exclusively to the imposition and collection of the tax of individuals or persons, whereas paragraph G embraces corporations.

Paragraph A imposes a tax of 1 per cent per annum upon the annual net income of every individual over $4,000. In addition to this normal or basic tax of 1 per cent, which applies alike to all individuals and corporations, as aforesaid, a graduated additional tax is imposed upon the total annual net income of every individual derived from all sources, including corporate dividends, exceeding $20,000. Instead of making this additional tax a flat rate, the same is graduated in its application to incomes from $20,000 to $100,000, thus leaving a flat rate of 3 per cent additional upon that portion of any income exceeding $100,000. Paragraph B and those following, down to G, relate to the assessment and collection of the normal tax of 1 per cent imposed upon persons.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman at all to ask him a question in reference to the proposition that he is now discussing, for information?

Mr. HULL. I will suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be best for me to conclude my attempt to analyze the bill, then I shall be glad, as best I can, to answer any question that may be asked.

Mr. MANN. This will be a very simply question.

Mr. HULL. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Suppose during the year a man holding a piece of real estate sells it, is there any attention paid to the amount of the proceeds of the sale, so far as his income is concerned, under the provisions of the bill? My recollection is it refers to profits.

Mr. HULL. Just a little later I will make a statement on that point.

Mr. MANN. I thank you.

Mr. HULL. Each individual to whom the additional and graduated tax will apply makes a personal return in every instance of his total net income from all sources. He will compute it by taking his net income as computed for the purpose of the normal tax and substituting the exemption of $20,000 for the normal tax exemption of $4,000, and then adding, first, the amount of his net income upon which the normal tax was withheld and paid at the source by another for him; and, second, the amount of dividends or other net earnings received or receivable by him from corporate sources. No part of the additional tax imposed is collected at the source of the income. This method enables the Government to reach all large incomes exceeding $20,000 by assembling the same in the individual to whom it ultimately goes and taxing it as a whole.

The proposed law should be construed as similar laws have been construed by the courts with respect to the application of the tax, and that is that the income in question shall be the measure of the tax and not the specific fund out of which the tax is necessarily payable; the bill takes as the measure of the tax the net income of the preceding year. Paragraph B defines the net income of a taxable individual or person. Income as thus defined does not embrace capital or principal, but only such gains or profits as may be realized from rent, interest, salaries, trade, commerce, or sales of any kind of property, and so forth, or profits or gains derived from any other source.

It would be impossible here to undertake to explain the application of this provision of the bill to the innumerable transactions arising in this country. The rulings of the Treasury Department and the decisions of the courts of this country with respect to similar provisions of the old income-tax laws, and also the English rules of construction, all essential portions of which will be embraced in the Treasury regulations, will make clear the distinction between taxable profits or income on the one hand and capital or principal on the other. The proceeds of life insurance policies paid on the death of the person insured are expressly exempted; likewise the return of any part of principal invested in insurance during life, as distinguished from the earnings upon same, would not be taxable.

Bequests, devises, and so forth, are not considered as taxable income; an inheritance tax applicable to them would naturally contain rather highly graduated rates, so that this tax would properly be contained in a separate enactment. The second division of paragraph B prescribes the deductions allowed in computing net income for the purpose of the normal tax. Most of these deduction clauses have heretofore been construed both by the Treasury Department and the courts. As to losses, these provisions primarily contemplate allowance for losses growing out of the trade or business from which the taxable income is derived, and generally termed trade losses, as distinguished from losses of capital or principal or losses incurred entirely apart from business transactions from which income is derived. A similar rule governs deductions for expenses. In thus computing net income the taxpayer does not embrace any portion upon which the tax is stopped at the source; but in all cases where taxable income arises from an annual business relationship, but does not exceed $4,000, and so the tax is not withholdable at the source, the same must be embraced in a personal return, and also if such income is uncertain or irregular in the amounts or time of its accrual, and so is not derived from a business relationship extending through the year, it likewise shall be embraced in a personal return, and no tax would be withheld at the source. This latter would embrace all taxable profits or income derived from trades, professions, and other businesses embracing promiscuous transactions and the accrual of profits in uncertain amounts and at irregular times, as distinguished from business relationships running through the year and the fixed income therefrom. The amount received by the individual taxpayer from the net earnings of a corporation subject to like tax will not be embraced in his personal return of income for the purpose of the normal tax. The normal tax of 1 per cent that would otherwise accrue against the owners or stockholders of the corporation is paid for them by the corporation upon its net earnings.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose the gentleman himself had $5,000 he wanted to invest, and did invest the $5,000 in the bonds of some corporation, and that the tax was taken by the corporation from the interest coupons on these $5,000 of bonds—suppose the gentleman had no other money in the world except the $5,000. Would the company that issued the bonds that he had his money invested in be allowed to deduct the tax from the interest due on the coupons on these bonds?

Mr. HULL. The taxpayer, if he desired his $4,000 exemption in that case——

Mr. MADDEN. But here is a case where there is only $250 income.

Mr. HULL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he said $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. He has an investment of $5,000 with an income of $250, and that is all the investment he has in the world. How does the gentleman provide for the payment of tax on these coupons?

Mr. HULL. The corporation would withhold the tax, unless the bondholder should file his affidavit claiming his exemption, and if he should, unless the amount of interest exceeded $4,000, no tax would be withheld.

Mr. MADDEN. But suppose the gentleman did not have business knowledge that would enable him to understand all these things. Lots of poor widows and orphans already have such investments as I have described, and they do not understand the situation, and will not understand it, no matter what happens. What protection have they?

Mr. HULL. Well, I would say in reply to that that under existing conditions most of the present corporate bonds draw interest, which is represented by coupons. Those coupons are payable to bearer. They circulate promiscuously and pass currently all over the country in all kinds of trade and business. It is a question of whether the Government will adopt the only possible way to reach the income derived from the interest on these bonds by providing that the tax shall be withheld at the source of payment, or whether it will abandon any purpose effectively to tax the income derived from the $28,000,000,000 of corporate bonds on account of the fact that there may be a limited number who may not, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] suggests, understand, at least at the very beginning of the operation of this law, that they would be exempt entirely under $4,000, provided they filed notice to that effect.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose, for example, that a man has coupons in the course of a year to the amount of $500 and that is his total income. At present, if he collects those coupons, payable to the bearer, he deposits them in a bank and gets credit for the amount. Now, under the scheme that is proposed, how would that operate?

Mr. HULL. It would operate this way, that the holder of corporate bonds can always have the benefit of his exemption of $4,000 and his deduction; that is, the owner of the bonds can, provided he presents them or has them presented for collection himself. But if he trades them to other people and parts with title to the coupons, then that privilege would not lodge in the other persons, because such coupons would be capital and not income in the hands of other taxable owners.

Mr. MANN. Practically, then—I ask for information—under this proposition the owner of these coupons of small amounts could no longer deposit them in banks, but would have to send them by registered mail or by express to the headquarters of the company, with an affidavit stating that that was the amount of his income or that the income was less than $4,000.

Mr. HULL. They could mail them directly to the headquarters of the company, and claim exemption, and receive full payment of the interest.

Mr. MANN. Would it be practicable under the bill to deposit them in a bank, with an affidavit as to the amount of income?

Mr. HULL. It would be practicable if the holder of the bonds retained ownership and did not part with them, as he would with any other negotiable instrument.

Mr. MANN. Of course he could not put them through the bank unless he parted with title to them.

Mr. HULL. He could for purposes of collection.

Mr. MANN. Even then he would have to assign his title to the bank, as a negotiable instrument. That was not worked out before under our law, but how does that work out under the English law?

Mr. HULL. Under the English law the corporations retain the tax on the interest and pay it to the Government, and the taxpayer presents to the Government any claim, either for deductions, abatements, or for the $800 exemption which exists over there, instead of the $4,000 exemption here.

Mr. MANN. Of course there are a large number of people either holding a small amount of bonds or a small number of shares. Of course the shares would not make so much difference. But there are a large number of people who hold a small amount of coupon bonds now. I think the universal custom is that those are collected through the banks by deposit. Is there any way of making an arrangement by which that could still continue? It is a matter of very great convenience.

Mr. HULL. I would suggest to the gentleman that coupon bonds, issued by well-established business concerns, are exchanged generally in trade, and, of course, as the gentleman well knows, they pass current like any other negotiable instruments.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but they could not under this plan where anybody desires to have an exemption.

Mr. HULL. Well, this plan, I will say to the gentleman, gives the taxpayer two or three opportunities to claim his exemption. In the first place, if the taxpayer receives the principal part of his income from a source at which it is proper to withhold the tax, he may present his claim for exemption—he would be required to present his claim for $4,000 exemption there in order that it might accompany the bulk of his income, which would be large enough to permit the deduction of the $4,000. Otherwise he can claim his exemption in his personal return of other income than that on which the tax is withheld. But if he desires several hundred dollars of deductions, for expenses, or indebtedness, or taxes paid, and has an amount of income from other sources which is larger than the amount of his deduction, he can make return to the collector of the district in which he resides. But if his income from sources other than that at which the tax is being withheld is smaller than the amount of his deductions, then he would naturally find it necessary to consolidate both his taxable income and his deductions so that they could go through one channel up to the office of the Internal Revenue Commissioner as a whole. To that end he would file claim for deductions and return of his additional income, either with the district collector in the district in which his chief income was being returned, or, if he preferred he could file it with the person whose duty it is to make the return for him as to the bulk of his income.

Mr. MADDEN. If his income was less than $3,500 he would not have to make any return at all, would he?

Mr. HULL. He would not.

Mr. MADDEN. But if he wanted to place himself within the deduction on the interest from his coupons, he would be required to make a statement under oath to the company whose bonds he held, would he not?

Mr. HULL. He would be required to file his application for the $4,000 exemption. And I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that this is simplicity itself, compared to the English system on the same subject. They have thousands of applications for deductions and abatements and other modifications, either of the assessment or refund of the tax, that are constantly being shifted back and forth between the Government and the taxpayer. This method, in my judgment, places the collection of the tax in the most expeditious form, and one that will do no injustice either to the taxpayer or to the issuer of the bonds.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. While the bill provides that it shall apply to all citizens at home and abroad, it is true, is it not, that this bill does not apply to the President of the United States or to Federal judges?

Mr. HULL. I will reach that in a very few minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Before the gentleman proceeds with that, will he yield for one question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Taking the case cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], where a person might own bonds to the amount of $5,000, paying 5 per cent interest, which would be $250, and suppose the interest is payable semiannually, and that is the entire income of the person holding the bonds, would he have to claim the exemption each time that he presented the coupons for payment as they matured—that is, every six months—or is there a way provided by which, so far as such a person is concerned, one exemption would be sufficient?

Mr. HULL. The $4,000 exemption would cover both payments.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman consider my question now?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will pardon me one moment——

Mr. MOORE. It bears on this question.

Mr. HULL. Just in that connection, first, in order to reach the income derived from our immense amount of corporate bonds, three methods might be adopted. In the first place, we could allow the corporation to pay the interest to the individual taxpayer entitled to it, and then depend upon him to make the personal returns, just as we depend upon taxpayers to make personal returns of their property in the States now under the State tax system. The result of that would be, as I have pointed out here, that they would return probably $1 out of $10, judging by the experience of the States; so that that method is as faulty as the State tax systems to which I have directed attention.

Another alternative would be to allow the corporation to withhold the interest only in cases where it exceeds $4,000—that is, withhold the amount of the tax upon it; but when we undertake to carry this rule entirely through the bill in that respect—and we do that, except in this case and that of United States bonds—we are confronted with the fact that all or most of this interest is represented by coupons payable to bearer; so that the holder of $100,000 of these coupons, when tax-paying time came around, could distribute them, if he desired, into sums of less than $4,000 and send them through 25 different channels for collection; and by distributing and scattering them he could always measurably evade the tax. So that the only method of really getting at the tax with a minimum of inconvenience both to the Government and the taxpayer is that proposed in the bill. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Under the exemptions provided for in paragraphs B and C, is it not possible for a rich holder of bonds or stocks of an industrial nature to sell out and transfer his holdings to municipal or State or Federal bonds, and thus escape the very object of the bill? I want to explain that that question has been brought up to me by some who have said this bill was easy, that it was full of loopholes, and that so far as some of the idle rich, so called, were concerned they could simply transfer their holdings from industrial stocks and bonds to municipal, State, and national bonds.

Mr. HULL. In the first place, the whole amount of State and municipal bonds is two to three billion dollars, and $750,000,000 of the municipal and State bonds are owned by small mutual savings banks. There are $28,000,000,000 of corporate bonds.

Mr. MOORE. I only called the gentleman's attention to the fact that a shrewd man might in that way evade the law, and if the test came they would simply transfer their holdings from industrials and other taxable stocks to municipal, Federal, and State bonds that would be exempt.

Mr. HULL. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. As an illustration, suppose application is made in a mutual insurance company for a prospective dividend which is paid afterwards. Suppose the applicant pays $20 and at the end of the fiscal year $12 is returned to him as a dividend. That assessment is made on the estimate as to the earnings of the company in the past years, and the company collects this $12 out of the individual. It does not belong to the company but belongs to the individual. I would like for the gentleman to explain fully if that $12 is taxed in this bill. It is claimed by the Southern Mutual Fire Insurance Co., which does business in my State, one of the most prosperous in the country, and which does that kind of business, that you tax them for the assessments they have collected out of the applicants.

Mr. HULL. There is no tax imposed on the policyholder. It is proposed to place a tax of 1 per cent on the net earnings of all insurance companies. But I will discuss that later on.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am not claiming that there is a tax imposed on the policyholder. There is a tax imposed on the company which collects an advanced payment out of the policyholder and returns to him at the end of the fiscal year that advanced payment. It belongs to the individual and not to the company.

Mr. HULL. The amount of the dividend returned to the policyholder has been represented to come out of the surplus of the company, but in any event it would not be reduced any more than the 1 per cent which the corporations now pay reduces the dividend to the stockholder. One ninety-ninth of the net earnings from all sources has thus far had no effect on it. This tax has never affected the policyholder heretofore.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. A great many people have asked me whether a man owning a life insurance policy will under the provisions of this bill be allowed to charge the annual premiums he is required to pay against his income.

Mr. HULL. I will deal with that in a few moments if I can proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. And I would also like the gentleman to answer another question, whether a widow will be required to pay an income tax on the money secured as the result of her husband's death, or whether that money will be considered as property?

Mr. HULL. It never was contemplated to tax the proceeds of life insurance policies.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not very clear in the bill.

Mr. HULL. The last print of the bill before it was introduced was by inadvertence a little obscure on that point.

Paragraph C exempts from the law salaries of State and local officers and interest upon State and local bonds. The Supreme Court has often held that under our form of government the States have no power to tax the instrumentalities of the Federal Government, and conversely that the Federal Government has no power under the Constitution to tax the instrumentalities of the States; not desiring to raise any constitutional question, or to arouse the antagonism of any of the States, this provision was inserted.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is a fact that in my State and in a number of other States, when this amendment was up before the legislature for adoption, many people opposed the adoption of the amendment because there was nothing specifically said in the amendment that excepted State, municipal, and other subdivisions of State bonds from taxation under the proposed amendment; but the friends of the amendment felt justified in assuring them that except in great stress, except in time of war, Congress would never think it wise to tax the bonds of the State or the subdivisions thereof.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the gentleman is entirely pertinent.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, the people were assured by the friends of this measure that it would be only in rare cases that Congress would ever be called upon to enact any law which would tax the instrumentalities of a State or a subdivision thereof.

Mr. HULL. I do not undertake to express an opinion either way upon the power of Congress to impose such tax by virtue of the recent constitutional amendment. It does not necessarily arise in view of the provision in the bill.

The salaries of the present President and the Federal judges now in office are exempted for another constitutional reason. As construed heretofore the constitutional provision to the effect that the salaries of these officials can not be diminished during their terms of office has been held to exempt such salaries until their successors assume office, when the tax would apply. This is a constitutional provision independent of any taxing provision in the Constitution. During and subsequent to the Civil War period it was held that salaries of these officials during their respective terms of office could not be diminished for any purpose, taxing or otherwise, and it was so held with respect to an attempt to assess them for income tax. In view of the very small amount involved, together with the fact that it was not desired to raise any constitutional argument over so small a matter, it was thought wiser to allow the successors of Federal judges and of the present President of the United States to assume this tax rather than provoke an argument by undertaking to impose it now, should we even have the power to do so.

Paragraph D provides for three kinds of return of income for taxation:

First. Return of an individual for himself.

Second. The return of a guardian, executor, and so forth, for the person for whom he acts.

Third. The return of any person or corporation for a taxable individual upon whose income such person or corporation is required to withhold and pay tax to the Government.

As I indicated a few minutes ago, while England collects about two-thirds to three-fourths of her entire $200,000,000 at the source, I think that, under the proposed measure, probably in the neighborhood of two-thirds of the tax, including, of course, that which would result indirectly from the individual, but which is paid by a corporation, as to the normal tax—at least two-thirds would be collected at the source of the income, and this would insure to that extent the collection of the full tax without trouble to the taxpayer, and without temptation to him to conceal or evade or withhold any portion of his taxable income.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman describes a case now where the corporation pays the tax, and where the stockholder who would get dividends from the company would not be required to return his dividends as part of his income.

Mr. HULL. Of the normal tax.

Mr. MADDEN. But the surtax he will be required to pay.

Mr. HULL. As to the additional tax, every individual makes personal returns of all of his income from every source, corporate or otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. Deducting the amount of the original tax of 1 per cent paid by the corporation in which he is a stockholder.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I undertook to state a while ago the method of computing his income for the purpose of the additional tax, and I would prefer not to go over it again just now, if the gentleman will pardon me.

This paragraph also directs the exemption of $4,000 to every individual taxpayer. The exemption of $4,000 was fixed for a number of reasons. In the first place, as already stated, the people with incomes below $4,000 pay the principal part not only of our tariff taxes, but of the State and local taxes, and there is no injustice in requiring those with higher incomes to bear the amount of taxes this bill would impose; again, an exemption of this amount made it possible to omit a number of deductions which are allowed in other countries, and which would be allowed here, with a lower exemption, such as a certain amount for premiums paid on life insurance policies, allowances to a person with a large family, or to a person supporting indigent relatives, and so forth.

In other countries that have $200, and in most cases not over $800 exemption, their laws provide these special deductions, but in a law that allows $4,000 exemption it is not necessary to mention these items of expenditures specifically.

Furthermore, like any new tax law, it will be necessary for the people to become acquainted with the proposed law and for it to become adjusted to the country before extending its classifications, abatements, deductions, exemptions, and so forth, to that extent which in all respects would make it as comprehensive as it should later be made. It was therefore deemed sufficient at present that while the bill should contain the essential features of a modernized income-tax law, no attempt should be made to write into it the comprehensive system of rates such as is found in other countries, like England. With the English rates this bill would yield probably $400,000,000.

The Treasury regulations will classify the character of income and the persons or corporations in all cases where returns are required to be made for another and the tax withheld at the source. As I have indicated, the tax will only be thus stopped at the source of annual income which is fixed or determinable and is derived from yearly transactions or continuous business connections or relationships extending through the year. This will largely embrace income from interest, rent, and salaries, dividends not being included in return of income for the purpose of the normal tax. All other classes of income accruing during the year will be embraced in a personal return of the taxpayer. The work of administering the proposed law will be done by the Internal-Revenue Department. In making returns the taxpayer, or the person or corporation making return for him, will pursue very much the same course practiced with respect to the assessment of State or local taxes. The Internal-Revenue Department will send blank return to each person supposed to have net income over $4,000 and to each person or company through whose hands a like sized income is supposed to pass. Should such taxpayer be overlooked it would be his duty, as in the case of State taxes, to request a blank return and execute and file with the district collector of the district in which the taxpayer resides. A person or corporation required to withhold tax and make return for another only returns the income in his or its hands and makes no inquiry as to other income of the taxpayer, the latter being a matter between the taxpayer and the Government. All returns shall be made and filed by March 1 next and subsequent to December 31. The tax accrues to the Government after December 31, and the machinery for its assessment and collection extending over some months is only one means of getting the tax into the Treasury.

Paragraph E prescribes the time and manner of paying the tax as computed upon each of the three returns heretofore described. Any person or corporation required to withhold and pay for a taxable person would not withhold any tax until the annual payments exceeded $4,000, except where the same is derived from interest on corporate or United States bonds; neither would the tax upon incomes from net earnings of corporations subject to like tax be withheld. No part of the tax imposed on corporations is stopped at the source. In many cases the taxable person will receive income from several sources at which the tax will be withheld, and, in order that one of the persons or corporations so withholding may understand that the taxpayer shall be allowed his $4,000 exemption thereon, the taxpayer is required to claim the same by filing affidavit to that effect within 30 days next before return is to be made for him. The other persons or corporations likewise withholding tax upon the income of the same taxpayer would understand, in the absence of such claim for exemption, that when the income exceeded $4,000 per annum they would retain the taxes due without including any exemption. In cases where tax is stopped at the source, as I have described, if the taxpayer has deductions for expenses, interest, taxes, and so forth, which he desires to have the benefit of, he may file the same with the collector of the district in which he resides if he has other income exceeding those deductions, otherwise he would be obliged to file the same either with the collector of the district in which his income is returned by another for him and the tax withheld or with the person or corporation whose duty it is thus to make return for him. This will be optional with the taxpayer. These two latter methods would bring his entire income and claim for deductions together in the hands of the district collector, so that when the same reached the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for assessment all the facts pertaining to the same would be together.

The first proviso in paragraph E requires the tax to be withheld from income derived from interest upon corporate and United States bonds and other indebtedness, even though the income does not exceed $4,000. This is the only available means of collecting taxes from this source of income. The interest on most corporate bonds is represented by coupons payable to bearer. Any holder of those coupons, no matter how large the amount, could easily divide them into amounts under the exemption of $4,000 and send them through different sources for collection or otherwise dispose of them so that when they reached the corporation owing the same no appreciable tax could probably be collected therefrom.

The latter part of the proviso I have mentioned simply contains a provision of the English law designed to intercept the tax from income of a taxable person derived from the dividends upon the stock or interest upon the bonds of foreign corporations doing business in foreign countries, the same being payable outside of the United States. This provision likewise relates to interest on bonds of foreign countries payable outside of the United States.

Paragraph G imposes a like normal tax upon the net profits, gains, or income of corporations without exemption. The provisions and administrative machinery of the present corporation-tax law are, in the main, reenacted. However, the language imposing the tax is made more comprehensive so as to embrace all corporations and joint-stock companies or associations, whether or not having capital stock. A large number of corporations that should be subject to tax have escaped under the present corporation-tax law. The dividends received by one corporation from the stock of another corporation are not exempted from the tax. This provision was based upon the policy that if a corporation desires to hold stock in another corporation, with all the corporate and business advantages arising therefrom, it should not object to paying taxes accordingly. Upon this ground no provision is made for exemptions to individual taxpayers deriving income from corporate earnings.

Labor, agricultural, charitable, and other organizations and societies exempt under the present corporation-tax law are likewise exempt from taxation under the proposed measure. Mutual savings banks not having capital stock represented by shares would also be exempt.

With respect to mutual fire insurance companies, a slight relaxation of the corporation-tax law as construed by the Treasury Department is made in the proposed bill. It is represented that factory mutual fire insurance companies require a premium deposit of from ten to twenty times as great as experience shows would be needed to pay the fire losses and all their expenses of the year. This presents a different state of facts from those relating to mutual insurance companies who seek exemption, in effect, from the operation of the proposed income tax.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that time does not permit me to go further into the details of this measure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose one has an income of $5,000 from either dividends or interest payable by corporations, and that that is his entire income, made up, say, $500 from one company, $600 from another, $700 from another, $800 from another, and on up enough to make $5,000. How does he get his exemption of $4,000 and in which company?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will recall that where a taxpayer's income is derived in small amounts at different times from different sources he makes a personal return of it as a whole. If he receives an annual income from one source exceeding $4,000 the tax upon the excess over $4,000 is withheld at the source and paid, except as to the interest on the bonds of corporations. I want to say with respect to the difference between the amount of taxes paid by a person whose income is derived from other than corporate sources there is some little distinction.

The stockholder in the corporation who receives $100,000 income as dividends would pay $40 more than a bondholder or person whose income was derived from any other source. That is due to the fact that where individuals prefer to invest their wealth in corporations as stockholders, so far as this normal tax is concerned, with all the business and corporate advantages accruing to them, under this system of requiring the corporation to pay a tax for all its stockholders upon all the entire net earnings before dividends are declared, they are not permitted their exemption. That makes a difference of $40 in incomes up to $20,000,000, or any other amount derived, on the one hand, from dividends upon stocks, and upon the other from any other source.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps I did not make myself quite clear. Where the income from interest coupons, say, from different corporations, makes an income of $5,000, is not the person entitled to the exemption of $4,000, or only pay the income tax on $1,000?

Mr. HULL. Except where it is derived from dividends.

Mr. MANN. Well, I say interest; it is not derived from dividends; the person is then entitled to pay tax only upon $1,000 of that income?

Mr. HULL. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Yet the corporation is required to deduct the tax from the amount paid as interest. Now, how does the man get his exemption of $4,000?

Mr. HULL. He would make claim for his exemption to the district collector in the event the sources of his interest were many and were situated in different localities and no one source exceeded $4,000. He would bring it in those few instances, like they do in hundreds of thousands of instances in England, where, as a rule, he makes his application to the collector either for an abatement of the assessment or a refund of whatever amount of taxes might be paid.

Mr. MANN. If he makes the application, is there authority for him to make application for a refund and then for the Government to pay him back the income tax as to the $4,000?

Mr. HULL. All the authority of the present internal laws is given the taxpayer for remedies and relief, both as to corrections or abatement of the assessment or a refund of the tax.

Mr. MANN. It is not an abatement of an assessment, it is a question of paying back a refund to a man which has been paid by somebody and which he is entitled not to have charged to him.

Mr. HULL. The taxpayer would have all the remedies and the gentleman from Illinois, of course, is entirely familiar with the numerous remedies of the taxpayer with respect to remedying any incorrect assessment or to secure a refund of any amount of taxes that have been paid.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of this fact, that it is a very difficult thing to obtain a refund of the amount of internal-revenue taxes which have been paid in many cases, as the gentleman will readily recall by an examination of the Private Calendar of the House. However, I suppose there can be a remedy applied and in the case named that would require the Government to make an investigation as to how much had been paid in each instance by each corporation as interest to this person.

Mr. HULL. The taxpayer would simply file his claim for $4,000 exemption. He could also file his claim for a deduction, should he desire such. In any event he could file his claim for this exemption along with verified facts as to the amount of taxable income on which the tax was withheld at the source.

Mr. MANN. Very true; but his tax has been paid by the corporation. He files a statement or claim to have that refunded to him. Certainly the Government would not admit that statement as true without investigation. Now, is the Government provided under the bill with means or ability to go to the source of the payment of the tax in each instance and ascertain whether or not the corporation has paid for this individual?

Mr. HULL. I think the fullest opportunity is given to the taxpayer in every case to secure redress and to secure whatever amount of exemption or deduction he might claim. In this instance he could have the assessment abated. As I stated in the beginning, it will be, of course, utterly impossible to take up the thousands of business conditions of this country and off hand apply the most expeditious method of dealing with them and apply this law to them, but, like any other tax law, the regulations of the Treasury Department will be prepared so as, without injustice, to meet and apply the law to the business conditions as they exist in such innumerable forms.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. HARDY. In connection with the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I do not know as I understand the workings of the bill, and I am asking simply for information. As I understand it, if you have a number of dividends from corporations which pay 1 per cent at the source, amounting to, say, in six different dividends, to $5,000, all of which paid 1 per cent when the corporation paid taxes on their income before the dividend is turned over to the stockholder, as I understand the bill, in that case there would be no rebate. The party would receive $5,000 income.

Mr. HULL. That is true. The gentleman from Illinois was discussing interest derived from corporate bonds.

Mr. HARDY. I thought he had reference to income and dividends.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. BATHRICK. On page 139, the second proviso, line 8, it seems to exempt the incomes derived from dividends upon stocks and corporations which have paid the corporate tax. Is that true?

Mr. HULL. That relates to the 1 per cent normal tax which applies to corporations as a separate taxable entity, just as it applies to individuals; and when the tax is first paid by the corporation on its net earnings, then the stockholder who is to receive a dividend out of the earnings that have paid the tax would not duplicate the tax by paying it again.

Mr. BATHRICK. Suppose in this income tax there is a tax on incomes of over $4,000; when it arrives at $20,000 there is a higher tax, is there not?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Suppose there is an income derived by some person in excess of $20,000, which I believe is where the tax increases, is it not?

Mr. HULL. That is where the additional tax first applies.

Mr. BATHRICK. Suppose he has an income of $25,000, $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 from dividends, does not he pay under the graduated rising tax?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes. As I have stated, the law undertakes to assemble in the hands of every individual who receives an income exceeding $20,000 from every source, corporate or otherwise, the amount of his income, and fastens this additional graduated tax upon him.

Mr. BATHRICK. Notwithstanding the corporation has paid 1 per cent on the $4,000?

Mr. HULL. There is no relationship between the normal tax of 1 per cent and this graduated tax. It is simply added for the purpose of graduation.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I would impose on the committee by consuming the time that it would be necessary to dispose——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman was discussing the matter of income at the source. The gentleman will remember in the case of a bond issue of a corporation doing a commercial business, or a railroad, the bonds issued are not payable to any particular party, but payable to bearer, and the interest generally paid at the stated periods, say every six months, represented by coupons which are cut off at the interest-paying period. Now, you can not compel the railroad company or corporation to pay the income at the source of all the people who own these bonds. Now, the railroad company which issues the bonds, or the manufacturing company which issues them and puts them on the market, does not keep any list of those who own them. They pass from hand to hand like a dollar bill or a hundred dollar bill. In other words, they pass current. Now, how is the railroad or other obligators of the bond to know what person they are to take the income from? The coupon is cut off and carried by the owner of it to the bank and deposited, and these coupons are generally payable in New York, Chicago, or other places. How is the obligator in the bond or the Government to determine whether that particular man has paid the tax or is due to pay the tax under this bill?

Mr. HULL. As I stated awhile ago, unless the actual owner of the bond presented the coupons for payment himself, or it should be done for him, the company would withhold the tax for the reason that so long as these negotiable instruments are in general circulation it is utterly impossible, as I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will agree, to reach them for taxation in any other manner. These coupons are not taxable income, but capital, when they pass to new owners and from the bondholder.

Mr. BARTLETT. Unless a man swears to a falsehood, you can reach him.

Mr. HULL. Well, I have pointed to the fact before that if you depended on the individual taxpayers, as we do in the States, to get returns of our concealed personality, it would amount to only about $1 in $10, as a rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then there may be a case arising where the tax due upon one particular security will be two or three times paid. A man may pay it and present it to the bank, and it may pass from hand to hand, and each one of the persons to whom it passes may have paid it except the last one. The obligor of the bond will hold it at the source for the man who last presents it, whereas the Government will get the honest man's return of it who makes the return and pays the tax on it; and if this last man is a dishonest man and tries to evade the tax, the Government will get it from the source once and from the honest people every time. So that it looks to me as if it will depreciate the value of these securities very much on the market—the manner the gentleman has suggested of collecting the tax at the source.

Mr. HULL. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, this method is not only feasible, but it is the only feasible method of dealing with this situation as it relates to corporate indebtedness, and it is far more simple and far more expeditious than any other method in use in other countries. The corporation owning the bonds would only retain the tax once. The coupons are taxable income in the hands of the bondholder, but no subsequent purchaser could claim any exemption or deductions with respect to them, because they then become principal.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Perhaps the gentleman explained it when I was out, but I do not know. Why were not the Hawaiian Islands included—citizens of the Hawaiian Islands? The citizens of Porto Rico and of the Philippine Islands are included, but not the citizens of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. HULL. In the first place they have an income tax of their own, and this bill simply extends the tax to the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico for their exclusive benefit and taxation. Of course, they become the beneficiaries of the revenue derived. This was done, as I understood, at the request of officials connected with the islands. The Hawaiian Islands, already having an income-tax law of their own, would naturally not want another one embraced in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. But there are a number of States of the Union that have income-tax laws.

Mr. HULL. I know; but I understood the question applied to these insular possessions that do not occupy the category of States.

Mr. MADDEN. Would there be any difference in fact between a State and the insular possessions? If the citizens of a State pay an income tax as citizens of the State, and are then required to pay an income tax as citizens of the United States in addition, is that any different from the case of citizens of the Hawaiian Islands being obliged to pay an income tax in Hawaii and then to pay also an income tax as citizens of the United States?

Mr. HULL. I do not think that question arises in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. It discriminates against the people of the States in favor of the people of Hawaii.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I simply wanted to state to the gentleman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who spoke of Hawaii as an insular possession, that Hawaii is a Territory of the United States, and I suppose it would be treated on the same basis as the States of the Union.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman about another matter which might have been discussed during my absence. If that is so, I do not ask the gentleman to repeat it. But there is a provision requiring a lessee to make returns of tax in all instances where the amount paid by the lessee would be in excess of $4,000, as I recall it, and the lessor is entitled to an exemption only in case he has filed with the lessee a statement showing his entire income from all sources, and that shall be made a part of the return to be made by the lessee to the Government. Now, if I am correct in my statement of what the law provides, I want to ask the gentleman what he has to say as to the disadvantage to the citizen of being thus compelled to make public, not to the Government, but through the lessee, his entire private affairs touching his income, and so forth?

Mr. HULL. I tried to explain that at a former stage. But to use figures, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it, suppose a taxpayer receives an income of $10,000 from a certain corporation. The tax is withheld by the corporation and paid to the Government, or to be paid to the Government after tax return and assessment. This taxpayer has $3,000 of income derived from other scattering sources. He has $2,500 of deductions, expenses of his business, interest on his indebtedness, and taxes paid to the State. He wants the benefit of those deductions. Now, he can do one of three things under those circumstances. He can file a return of his own with the district collector in the district where he resides, containing the $3,000 income and the $2,500 deduction, and that will be disposed of in the usual way. But if his deductions were $3,000 and his income on which the tax was not withheld at the source was only $2,500, then he would not have enough income from that source from which to subtract his deductions. So that he is obliged to consolidate them at some point between him and the internal revenue collector's office where the tax is assessed—consolidate it with his aggregate income. In that event he would send to the district collector, where the return was made for him by the corporation on the $10,000. He need not go to the corporation. It is optional with him to send to the district collector the return of the $3,000 deduction claimed and the $2,500 income. Then the $10,000 income would be returned for him to this same collector by the corporation, and they would merge in the office of the collector and go up together to the internal revenue commissioner's office, as I have said, with all the attendant facts and be assessed upon the whole facts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me see if I understand the gentleman. Suppose a man has an income from three pieces of property, and in each instance he gets $5,000 income. It is the duty of the lessee to hold out the tax, is it not, and send it in to the collector?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The lessor gets his exemption of $4,000 only in the event that he gives to the lessee information touching his entire income.

Mr. HULL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not at all correct.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. HULL. The taxpayer is given the fullest discretion in making claims for deductions—to file the same either with the district collector or with the person who returns his tax, as he sees fit. The $4,000 exemption alone would be claimed at the source.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me ask you some questions. Suppose he does not give notice to the lessee at all. Is it made the duty of the lessee in each instance to hold out the tax and pay it to the Government? Is that true?

Mr. HULL. After it reaches $4,000 he would hold out the entire tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand. Now, I have stated a simple case, where a man owns three pieces of property. He leases each of those three, and his income from each is $5,000. Now, he does not give notice to the lessee. Is it not the duty of the lessee to hold out the tax of 1 per cent in each instance and pay it to the Government?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. That being so, how does the lessee get his exemption? Is there a provision whereby the Government returns to him the excess tax that has been paid him by each lessee?

Mr. HULL. I will try to come to the gentleman's point.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can not the gentleman answer me directly?

Mr. HULL. I want to see whether I understand the gentleman's position. If the taxpayer receives an income from three or four sources——

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us take the case I have stated.

Mr. HULL. He receives $5,000 from each source. Each of the other gentlemen is required to withhold the tax for the taxpayer. Now, unless he notifies one of them of his claim for exemption, neither one of the three would know which one should make the request for his exemption in withholding the tax. So that the taxpayer is required, if he desires the benefit of an exemption under those circumstances, to make his claim with some one of the three.

Mr. SHERLEY. Otherwise he would not get back the excess. Is that true?

Mr. HULL. That is true so far as the tax collected entirely at the source is concerned.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right. I want to present to the gentleman the situation. Suppose, instead of taking the man who has simply three pieces of property, take the great Astor estate, which is largely an estate invested in real estate. As I understand, in order to get the exemption, it would be necessary to give to one of the lessees from whom you are to get the claim of exemption the entire private history of your income.

Mr. HULL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; you do not give a history of anything. The exemption is $4,000, and you merely file your claim for exemption, and that is all that there is involved.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will find that the section goes very much beyond that.

Mr. HULL. The person who is required to withhold the tax at the source——

Mr. SHERLEY. I will read the provision on page 142 of the bill.

It requires the person to—file with the person who is required to withhold and pay tax for him a true and correct return of his annual gains, profits, and income from all other sources, and also the deductions asked for, and the showing thus made shall then become a part of the return to be made in his behalf by the person required to withhold and pay the tax——

Mr. HULL. Go on and read the balance of the sentence.

Mr. SHERLEY (continuing the reading):

or such person may likewise make application for deductions to the collector of the district in which return is made or to be made for him.

But I ask the gentleman where there is a case in which the payments are all made at the source, the man in that instance must expose to some one of the source-paying persons or corporations his entire income.

Mr. HULL. I assure the gentleman that if I know anything at all about this language he is in error. He confuses deductions with exemptions. There is one statutory $4,000 exemption that must be claimed of the person who withholds the tax at the source in cases where one's taxes are paid at the source. His deductions for expenses, losses, and so forth, which the gentleman seems to have in mind, are left to the taxpayer to be claimed to the district collector, or, if he should prefer, through the person or corporation withholding his tax at the source of his income.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is provision made for the collector to return to the person the excess of tax which has been collected at its source?

Mr. HULL. No tax has been collected up to the time the gentleman seems to refer. This is only for the purpose of assessment, and, as I stated awhile ago, both items merge in the office of that collector. They then go up to the office of the internal-revenue collector, who assesses the tax, computes the sum due, and then sends notice of amount due to those whose duty it is to pay the tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not state what I understand to be the requirements of law. The law says that the lessee or corporation shall withhold and shall pay. Now they actually pay the tax to the Government. What I want to know is whether there is any method whereby if a man does not desire to make a disclosure of his deductions he is entitled to to a private individual—is there any method by which the Government can repay to him the excess tax that has been collected at the source?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's question assumes that the taxpayer is obliged to disclose something relating to his business to some other individual, which is entirely inaccurate. It is optional with him.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right. Suppose he does not do it to an individual, but does it to the Government; the tax has all been paid at the source. What I want to know is what provision is there whereby the Government, getting the information directly, can return the deductions, can repay the excess collected at the source?

Mr. HULL. In the first place, the tax has not been paid at all at this stage. This results merely in an assessment of the tax, a preliminary stage occurring some time before the tax would necessarily be paid. It relates to the determination of the amount of the tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, am I correct in assuming that the gentleman implies that, these deductions coming to the knowledge of the Government, it shall then be the duty of the Government to inform the lessee in the particular case cited that the man is entitled to certain deductions?

Mr. HULL. To be sure; that is, in the sense that the Government would notify him of the amount of the tax, which would show that deductions had been allowed.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that, therefore, he, the lessee, is to pay to the Government only a certain proportion of the tax?

Mr. HULL. They would send back to the lessee, to take the gentleman's case, along with the statement of his own taxes, the amount of the assessment on the return he had made for this other person.

Mr. SHERLEY. But do they give to the lessee knowledge of deductions that the lessor is entitled to, so as to enable the lessee to pay a less tax than he would ordinarily pay for the lessor; and if so, where is the provision in the law for it?

Mr. HULL. I am sorry that I can not make myself clear to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. HULL. There is no embarrassment whatever.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not asking for the purpose of trying to confuse the gentleman or tricking him, but this matter has been discussed considerably in the press. It is a very important question in that unless provision is made by which the excess of tax can be refunded, or not collected at the source, an individual may have to disclose his entire private concerns to another individual.

Mr. HULL. The law, as the gentleman read it there, is as plainly in the alternative as it can be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; that is all right; but does not the man get penalized, in taking one alternative, by not getting his rebate.

Mr. HULL. The sole purpose of that provision is to give him his rebate or deduction. Otherwise the provision would not be there.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering if there ought not to be some means by which the individual who receives the income should be permitted to pay his own tax in the case of property rent. Why should a lessee be authorized to pay taxes for you as a lessor?

Mr. HULL. That is, in effect, a practice even now in a great many States. The tax imposed upon individuals is also paid by some other person, as in the case of the tax on shares of banks for its shareholders. I believe that is the law in the gentleman's State.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me cite this case. I own a building in which there are 50 tenants. The income from that is, say, $6,000 a year. I do not undertake to say what it is. How would the tenants in that case be authorized to pay the tax on the revenue that I was to receive from the building?

Mr. HULL. No person is to withhold the tax for another unless he owes that person exceeding $4,000 arising from an annual transaction.

Mr. MADDEN. Owes him $4,000; but the rule is that where a man leases a building or a piece of property he gets his income monthly, and it is not at all likely that any person leasing a building would owe $4,000 at the end of any fiscal year.

Mr. HULL. Then a personal return would be made if the annual rental should be less than $4,000. If the rent, based on a yearly contract, should in the aggregate amount to over $4,000, even though payable at shorter periods, the lessor would begin to withhold the tax whenever the amount paid exceeds $4,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have received, and I presume every other Member has received, more or less complaints—criticisms—of the bill so far as it affects insurance companies—life insurance companies, mutual fire insurance companies, and so forth—and the criticisms are based, as I understand it, upon the provision in H. R. No. 10, and I understand that in the pending bill there have been some changes made. Will the gentleman state to what extent the bill as it is now before the House differs from the provisions in the bill No. 10?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will oblige the gentleman as to this entire insurance controversy as best I can, although I feel I am imposing very much on the committee.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman perhaps did not quite understand my question. I am laboring under the apprehension that the provision which the gentleman has just been discussing in the pending bill has been changed in some respect from what it is in House bill No. 10.

Mr. HULL. It proposes simply to impose a tax on the net earnings of insurance companies without permitting them to have deductions for these dividends, which they declare annually to policy holders, in computing their net income, which is the construction that has been placed on this law by the Government during the last few years.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand, but I will ask the gentleman again. Is the pending bill the same in this respect as the bill H. R. 10? Has there been some change?

Mr. HULL. The only change is that we have attempted to make the language a little clearer, and the language is specific enough to prevent the companies from shifting these earnings from one category to another if they should be inclined to do so, and in that way escape the tax.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Whatever criticism has been made has been on the provision in H. R. 10. Now, the pending bill having modified that to some extent, I was desirous, if possible, to ascertain whether the change had met any of this criticism, so that the criticism no longer lies. In other words, I am anxious to know in just what respect the provision in the pending bill differs from the way the provision appears in H. R. 10.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman it is simply an issue whether the company shall pay the tax on their annual net earnings without making deductions as they have claimed heretofore in this controversy.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield? In order that I may be able to write clearly, I want to see if I can write in condensed form. As I understand, the gentleman does not think this bill levies any tax on the proceeds on death payment of the policies?

Mr. HULL. That is expressly stated.

Mr. HARDY. And in no case it exempts no tax on death dividends and annuities. On that portion, the death dividends and annuities, the experts shall determine. So death receipts are placed on the same basis as other taxes?

Mr. HULL. There is no tax proposed, except on the net earnings of insurance companies——

Mr. HARDY. I understand that many insurance policies are in the nature of an investment, and if there is an earning, that earning is taxed.

Mr. HULL. That is true.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I understand the gentleman to say this amount that is paid in case of an emergency by mutual fire insurance companies is returned to the policy holder, and is not taxed in this bill?

Mr. HULL. That is taken care of——

Mr. TRIBBLE. In the present bill. That is the point I wanted to know.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, there is no distinction made between the so-called mutual companies and the profit-making insurance companies?

Mr. HULL. No. They are taxed on their net earnings.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not understand that the question, either by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] or the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], disclosed fully what was sought to be brought out. My understanding was that the criticism of H. R. 10 before the caucus was that it seemed a tax was levied upon an insurance policy if paid during the life of the holder and upon the beneficiary of a policy, after death, and that in the caucus the language was straightened out so as to show clearly that no tax was levied upon the beneficiary of a policy or upon the amount paid, such as on a 20-year policy, but that the net earnings of the company or any other net earnings were continued to be taxed under the bill? That is my understanding.

Mr. HULL. That is substantially as it is. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PHELAN. Is there any provision in the case of life insurance companies whereby what is directly an overcharge shall not be taxed when it is returned to the policy holder?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman of course it is utterly impossible to write provisions in a general law that would specifically apply and govern every phase of the hundreds of thousands of different kinds of business transactions in the country. I would say, however, that companies have been paying dividends, according to their own admission, out of actual profits, in sums far greater than any kind of premium savings. If the companies persist in mixing the smaller amount of premium savings in these undisputed profits, then no distinction is made.

Mr. PHELAN. That is what I meant. There is nothing which would prevent a life insurance company from figuring what is strictly an overcharge when they make their premium, and deducting that, and not including that in their entire net earnings. There is nothing to prohibit that in this bill?

Mr. HULL. Well, to the extent that excess of premiums are collected and blended with profits, the same rule would apply as to tax.

Mr. ROGERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. If I understand the provision of paragraph B, on page 134, correctly, it defines that income as including gains, profits, and incomes, among other things, from sales and dealings in property. Now suppose a man should buy 100 shares in one company and 100 shares in another company, and at the end of the fiscal year he should find one of that block had gone up 20 points and the other had gone down 20 points, do I understand he would have to pay on the profit he had made without receiving any benefit on the loss he had sustained?

Mr. HULL. Where he is conducting two separate businesses, or where he is conducting one business consisting of different branches, he would deduct from his aggregate profits the losses that were incident to the business out of which the profits grew.

Mr. ROGERS. Here, for example, we have a man investing in the securities of two entirely distinct companies, one of which goes up in value and the other goes down. I can not read in the law anything that takes care of the man and gives him a set-off on the securities on which he has been at a disadvantage.

Mr. HULL. I sought to explain that situation briefly a while ago. Of course it is impossible to take up all the different and countless illustrations that any gentleman might suggest and dispose of them in short order. But I undertook to say that the losses and the expenses that are ordinarily considered relate to those growing out of the particular business which secures to the individual his income, or from which his income is derived. Of course any loss foreign to that, or any expense entirely different from that, would not be considered as a part of his trading loss.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman think that in the case I have put there would be an allowance for the deficit which the individual had sustained in the less fortunate security?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman means in case of a broker who invests, or just an individual not regularly in the business?

Mr. ROGERS. No. Suppose the gentleman or myself or anybody should invest in 100 shares of one security and in 100 shares of another security and one goes up and the other goes down. Under the act, unquestionably, other things being sufficiently high, he has to pay an income tax on the fortunate security.

Mr. HULL. Yes; if he is simply making a casual investment of that kind now and then, or here and there, I think he would report his gains for taxable purposes, and probably would be allowed for his loss. It would not be a trade loss, but set off against the particular gain from the other stock transaction.

Mr. ROGERS. That might, of course, be a very important matter for a man who was doing a good deal of buying and selling in the stock market in a perfectly proper way, not as an operator or speculator, but as a man who buys when an opportunity presents and sells when he sees another opportunity.

Mr. HULL. The question would arise whether he is making that a business. There are ample adjudications as to all these kinds of transactions, which will make it easy, I think, for the Secretary of the Treasury to make the taxpayers acquainted with their exact application and relation to the tax.

Mr. MANN. Another question occurs to me right there, if the gentleman will permit. Perhaps the gentleman can answer. I do not criticize him if he can not. Suppose a man bought a piece of property some years ago for a small price and sells it during this year after this bill takes effect, or even this year before this bill takes effect. Does he have to account for the entire profits as income based upon the original cost, although the property last year may have been worth as much as he sells it for this year?

Mr. HULL. Of course that raises a very broad field of consideration. The laws have been construed heretofore to the effect that the taxpayer is expected to return the profits that accrued to him during the calendar year or the taxable year. Profits on the sales of property which was purchased in connection with the business which a man is carrying on from year to year would be reported for taxation for the year of their accrual, such as any regular trade or business, even though the property was purchased during the preceding years. As to abstract or occasional cases, such as the gentleman suggests, apart from that class that I have described, sometimes each one might depend upon its own state of facts. But at any rate the entire profits that accrue during the year in connection with trade or commerce or business regularly carried on from year to year, no matter when the property was purchased, would be reported.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can readily see that that question is certain to arise in many cases.

Mr. HULL. Yes. I may say to the gentleman that at present, as the corporation-tax laws are enforced, if a man bought some property, it may have been 10 years ago, for $10,000 and sells it for $20,000 now, he would return the average annual increase for one year, which would be $1,000, as a part of his annual profits for this year. Now, it was not attempted to get into the field of unearned increment in this measure, and if you go too far along that line you will get into it.

Mr. MANN. Are you not in it now? That is what I am getting at. Are you not in it if you have to make return on the property or increment, with no further distinction?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman frankly that it has been held, in construing all these laws that I have observed, that unless the unearned increment is expressly made income, it is not considered income in any sense of the word, but simply increase of value or capital.

Mr. MANN. Very true; but your bill specifically provides, as I recall it, that you are to treat as income profits on the sale or use of real estate.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know; but profits on the sale arise from the differences between what it costs you and what you sell it for. That is the measure of the profit.

Mr. HULL. That would not necessarily raise the other question. It would in some cases and would not in others.

Mr. MANN. What I really wanted to get at was not that, but whether it would relate back so as to cover all profit. Suppose a man bought property many years ago which probably last year was worth as much as it is this year. He sells it this year. What are his profits? How does he arrive at what his profits are?

Mr. HULL. My judgment would be that as to an occasional purchase of real estate not by a dealer or one making the buying and selling a business this bill would only apply to profits on sales where the land was purchased and sold during the same year.

Mr. MANN. I hope that statement will remain in the RECORD.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire before closing to allude to the merits of the proposed tax of 1 per cent per annum upon the net profits of insurance companies. I presume that most of the Members of this House are policyholders. I may say that I, and doubtless every Member of this House, feel most kindly toward the policyholders of this country, and feel no prejudice against the insurance companies. In disposing of the merits of the proposed tax I am satisfied no Member has the slightest desire to even remotely do injustice or injury to any company or policyholder.

I recall when the income-tax law of 1894 was enacted these companies came down here and stirred up a great deal of sentiment and excited the policyholders and procured their exemption; but after the matter was fully understood by the country it was the occasion of about the most severe criticism there was to the bill. Now, some of the companies have sent out alarming circulars to the stockholders, which are calculated to impress upon them that they are about to be outraged or in some other respect seriously injured by some of the provisions to be found somewhere in the pending measure. As a matter of fact, there is no tax, as I said, upon the proceeds of life insurance policies paid at the death of another. There is no tax imposed upon any individual with respect to the return of any sum or amount invested in insurance as a business proposition during his life. Of course, if there should be actual earnings coming back to him along with a return of a portion of the investment, as in case of an annuity, for instance, then as determined by the expert knowledge of the actuary it would constitute actual earnings such as would arise from the interest on a promissory note on a loan, and the individual would be expected to keep that in mind as a part of his taxable income, if the company had not already paid the tax. As to the third proposition, I explained that the $4,000 exemption which is granted, three times as much as that of any other country, allows for an item of expenditure such as premium payments without mentioning them separately; and, finally, the mutual insurance companies desire to have themselves entirely exempted as to their net earnings from the 1 per cent normal tax imposed upon corporations. Now, when this corporation-tax law was enacted four years ago it was drafted by a very skillful hand; its chief author was reported to have been Attorney General Wickersham, a gentleman who had intimate knowledge of the nature and character of the business of these insurance companies and of the different classes and kinds of net earnings and accumulations that arise during the year; and it was expressly provided in that law that insurance companies, mutual or otherwise, should not be permitted, in computing their net income, to make deductions for dividends paid to policyholders. The word "dividends" was expressly and definitely inserted there upon the broad ground of public policy and of justice; that when insurance companies pay dividends out of the accumulations of the character that these companies have they should pay the tax of 1 per cent imposed on all corporations; but they come in and say that that should be stricken out; that whenever they declare a dividend to the policyholder it is simply a return of the premium savings and constitutes in no sense net earnings in the way of interest savings or in the way of excess of the mortuary fund or from the other sources from which actual accumulations or profits arise.

When the corporation-tax act had gone into effect, some of the insurance companies acquiesced in this insurance clause as just, others objected to paying the full amount of the tax. Treasury decision No. 1743, which I will publish at the end of my remarks, shows that hearings were had covering a period of almost six months, during which almost all the companies affected were heard in person or by brief. After a full consideration of the facts the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reached the conclusion that these companies had made it a rule of their business during past years, through their literature, advertisements, agents, and solicitors, to represent to the public whose business they solicited, that each policyholder at stated periods shall be entitled to a dividend out of the surplus of the company; that the amount of the dividend was generally made the most prominent feature of their advertisements and solicitations for business; that their policy contracts designated such amounts paid as dividends; and that in their sworn reports to the States the word "dividend" in its ordinary commercial sense was to all intents and purposes always used. It is clear from these recited facts, as found by the department, and which have not been denied to my knowledge, that the term "dividend" as thus used by the insurance companies had long existed in the insurance world as embodying this term in its broad commercial sense. It was known that at times, at least, some companies had heretofore permitted profits to accumulate permanently to a large extent in the hands of the companies. For the first time, however, when they came to offer objections to the payment of the corporation tax, these companies, or most of them, undertook to disclaim or rather to deny the accuracy, not to say truthfulness, of all the representations they had been making to the public, as I have described. If these companies had from the beginning represented to the public whose business they solicited that they would collect excessive amounts as premiums and would return such premium overcharges to the policyholders from time to time, instead of representing that they would pay dividends out of profits, then both Congress and the country would have better understood the real nature of their business.

The companies now ask Congress to say to the country what they refused to say for themselves until recently and long after this tax was enacted in 1909, viz, that they only make returns of premium savings to their policyholders growing out of excessive charges on premiums. However, there are various sources of earnings with respect to insurance companies; they derive savings from the amount set apart for expense of conducting the business; they derive a considerable sum from excess of the mortuary fund, as I understand; gains or savings from lapses and surrenders is another source of profit; excess of interest earnings is still another. It is generally understood that the premiums assessed upon policyholders are based upon an assumption of mortality, which is about 30 per cent less than actually occurs; nevertheless the full amount is collected, so that the excess goes to profit accumulations unless returned. Again, it is assumed that the companies can only earn from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent upon the reserve, when in fact they earn far more than this amount, as is shown by interest rates in their reports to the different States. No one can question the justice of a nominal tax upon these classes of accumulated profits, which are in excess of current needs. Of course the companies can blend the earnings I have described with premium overcharges and then insist that no tax should be laid. I do not pretend, as none except an expert would pretend, to be well versed in all the intricacies of the insurance business; however, by reason of profits derived from the sources I have mentioned many companies have made surprising showings. One hundred thousand dollars of stock in the Equitable Co., of New York, has sold for $3,000,000. It has assets amounting to more than $400,000,000. One-hundred-dollar shares of stock in the Aetna Life are reported to be worth more than $10,000; $100 shares of Metropolitan Life, $15,000; $100 shares of the Prudential, $17,000. Several companies have assets amounting to $500,000,000 or $600,000,000. Several of these large concerns, with their huge aggregations of property, are among the most powerful factors in the financial world. Yet, enjoying, as they do, the protection of the Government; being permitted, as they are, to amass these enormous accumulations of property, and to hand it or its equivalent down from generation to generation under the management of a few individuals, loud complaint is offered when the General Government proposes a nominal tax of 1 per cent per annum upon their net profits.

The entire amount of tax involved is perhaps not over $1,000,000. Even if the companies could and should pass it down to the policyholder, it would amount to only 15 to 20 cents each. Hundreds of thousands of circular letters have been scattered all over the country with a view to arraying the policyholders against the proposed tax and the effect of which is to prejudice them most unjustly against the entire income tax proposed. One of these circulars complains at the "heavy burden of taxation now borne by the policyholders"; the circular then gives the amount of taxes paid by the company during the past five years, which is an average of $1,171,633. This would amount to about one-fifth of 1 per cent. But why do the companies pay this tax to the States? Why have not they procured their exemption from State taxation, as they are now proposing, with respect to this nominal Federal tax? I have yet to hear of any suggestion that the States should exempt them. My judgment is that the accumulations of these companies, which arise from savings in expenses, savings in mortality, savings from lapses and surrenders, and profits from excess interest earnings, when considered in the aggregate, are clearly of such a character as to merit the payment of the proposed tax. But when it is proposed to impose the tax, the question of premium overcharges is now brought up for discussion. It would seem that the interest of the policyholder would be better served by leaving with him substantially the amount of this sum overcharged as premiums, in view of the fact that many of the companies are able to pay dividends amounting to several millions, which amount was derived from the sources of gain I have described. If the companies would keep the question of premium assessments and overcharges strictly within a category to themselves and not mix and confuse them with the profits derived from the sources I have enumerated, I think it would then be possible for the law to deal with the one without affecting the other. It would seem that many or most of the companies are in a position to declare a dividend in the strict commercial sense, and I should say that the courts now construe the language of this bill so that if the so-called "dividends" are actual premium overcharges no tax would apply, so that the tax would only go to profits of other kinds. While the mutual companies seek entire exemption and controvert the views I offer, yet I can see no theory of fair dealing upon which the tax is unjust, or would reduce the dividend or increase the premium of any policyholder. Everybody will seek exemption if we exempt these huge corporations owning several billion dollars of assets.

Now, Mr. Chairman, apologizing to the committee for the length of time I have used, I want to say in my judgment this is simply——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Pardon me, but I want to conclude my remarks.

Permit me to say, in conclusion, that laws similar to the income tax proposed in this bill have operated and are now operating successfully and satisfactorily in a large number of instances throughout the world. There is no reason why its administration should not be even more successful in this country.

The American people will experience a saving from tariff reductions, which the proposed income tax makes possible, immeasurably greater than the amount of the tax. The American people understand the nature of this tax, and by their recent action have shown their desire for its enactment into law.

In view of the experience of other countries, it is confidently believed that when the measure now pending becomes a law and becomes adjusted to the country and understood by the people the universal judgment will be that it equals in its satisfactory operation and excels in its justice, flexibility, and productiveness any tax law on the statute books. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX A.

(T. D. 1743.)

Special excise tax on corporations.

Dividends declared by insurance companies are the dividends referred to in section 38, act of August 5, 1909, as not being deductible from gross income, and when such dividends are applied to the payment of renewal premiums, to shorten the endowment or premium-paying period, to purchase paid-up additions and annuities, etc., they must be included in and accounted for as income.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1911.

SIR: Section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, provides that every insurance company now or hereafter organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory of the United States, or under the acts of Congress applicable to Alaska or the District of Columbia, or now or hereafter organized under the laws of any foreign country and engaged in business in any State or Territory of the United States or in Alaska or in the District of Columbia, shall be subject to pay annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such insurance company equivalent to 1 per cent upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it from all sources during such year. The act referred to provides that such net income shall be ascertained by deducting from gross income received within the year from all sources (first) all the ordinary and necessary expenses actually paid within the year out of income in the maintenance and operation of its business and properties, including all charges, such as rentals or franchise payments, required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property; (second) all losses actually sustained within the year and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, including a reasonable allowance for depreciation of property, if any, and, in the case of insurance companies, the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts, etc.

In the administration of this law the questions of what was meant by the use of the word "dividend" and the status of dividends declared by insurance companies have arisen. These questions have been receiving most careful consideration in this office for the past six months. Many hearings have been had on this subject, at which have appeared officers and counsel representing nearly all of the insurance companies interested. In addition to elaborate arguments, a number of briefs have been filed and this office has on its own account made careful and painstaking investigations.

Reduced to final analysis, the contentions of the various companies are chiefly two:

First. That dividends declared by mutual and participating companies are not dividends in the commercial sense of the word, but are simply refunds to the policyholder of a portion of the overcharge collected from such policyholder at the time the annual premium of the policy contract is collected, which overcharge is merely held in trust by the company issuing the policy, and annually or at stated periods all, or a portion thereof, is returned to the person holding the policy.

A careful consideration of the language used by Congress on this subject; a consideration of the provisions in the policy contracts relating to dividends; the statements of the insurance companies to their policyholders; the statements made by the insurance companies to the public generally through their authorized advertisements, their literature, and by their agents; and the sworn reports of the insurance companies made to the various State authorities show that this contention is untenable.

The language in the various policies differs a little, but the contract itself sets out specifically that the policy shall entitle the holder annually or at stated periods to a dividend which shall be the distributive share of the policy in the surplus of the company, the amount thereof being fixed by the board of directors or in some other designated method.

In the authorized literature sent out by each of the various companies the amount of the dividend is in general made the most prominent feature, and, as is a matter of common knowledge of every person who has reached the age of maturity, each and every one of the agents of these companies presents a mass of alleged facts and figures showing the financial benefits to be derived by taking a policy in any given company on account of its large annual surplus and the dividend to be declared on the policy as a result thereof. In fact, in the current magazines, street car advertisements, etc., one is confronted with allegations set forth in attractive type of the dividends earned and declared on the policies of one or another of these companies.

In all of the policy contracts and in the literature and representations of the agents and officers of the respective companies the amounts thus paid to the policyholder are designated dividends, are treated as dividends so far as appears both by the companies and the policyholders receiving them, and an examination of the sworn reports furnished by these insurance companies to the various State officers discloses the fact that these amounts are still called dividends and treated as dividends, and in the face of these facts it becomes an impossibility for this office to rule that such dividends should be considered under any other designation or that the amounts so paid should be deductible from gross income in making the returns of annual net income.

It was vigorously contended by counsel, representing certain of these companies, that it was necessary at the outset to disregard entirely the policy contracts, the published literature, the representations of officers and agents, the sworn returns to State authorities, and to consider the proposition only after these items had been eliminated; that owing to the exigencies of business and the competition of insurance companies it was necessary, in order to secure new business, to convince the prospective policyholder of the desirability of the same, and that this commercial necessity had resulted in the companies making misrepresentations of facts as to dividends to their prospective purchasers of insurance, and that names and designations having a single specific meaning in the commercial world, and which were therefore attractive to prospective policyholders, had been adopted to represent transactions which they now hold are entirely different from what their name implies and represents and from that which the policyholder himself believed he was receiving, and that business necessities had caused a continuance of these misnomers. It was represented that, in fact, there were no dividends, but merely a refund of overcharges, which, for reasons above stated, were usually referred to as dividends.

It appears, however, from the investigations of the books themselves, that in many cases the earnings of the companies from previous investment and holdings are nearly, if not quite, as large as the amounts which are annually distributed as dividends, and while it may be true that the dividends in whole or in part might be distributed from premiums rather than from these earnings, it does not appear that a separation of sources of income is made for the purpose of ascertaining the funds available for dividends. The insured is not promised a refund, but a participation in the surplus or profits is promised, and the plea that the dividend declared is a refund of a portion of the premium heretofore paid, rather than a distribution of the actual surplus of a company derived from all sources, does not appear to be consistent.

It does not appear, therefore, that the facts warrant the contention of the counsel that dividends are refunds of premium payments, but, on the contrary, it appears that most of the companies are in a position to declare a dividend which will conform to the commercial definition of dividends urged by counsel as the correct definition.

The language of Congress relative to deductions from gross income is as follows: "And in the case of insurance companies the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts," and there is no clearer or more reasonable rule of construction than that every clause or word of a law should be presumed to have been intended to have some force and effect.

When all the facts are borne in mind and it is remembered that such facts were all before Congress at the time the specific language was adopted that an insurance company should be entitled to deduct "the sums other than dividends paid within the year on policy and annuity contracts and the net additions, if any, required by law to be made within the year to reserve funds," it is clear that by "dividends" Congress had in mind the same thing that the insurance companies themselves have been designating as dividends, and that whether such dividends are dividends in the commercial sense or not they constitute what Congress specifically prohibited from being deducted.

Second. The second contention, and the one most vigorously advanced by many of the companies, is that granting that dividends paid to policyholders in cash are dividends within the intent of the statute, when such dividends are applied to (a) the payment of renewal premiums; (b) applied to shorten the endowment or premium-paying period; (c) applied to purchase paid-up additions and annuities, they are not dividends but refunds applied as stated. The contention is that the company does not actually receive the money and that it is not therefore to be taken up in the income accounts, but that owing to provisions of local statutes over which they have no control they are forced against their will to take up these items on their ledger accounts and on their sworn statements as income.

A careful consideration would appear to show the complete fallacy of this contention. It is not disputed that when the dividends shall have been declared and the ratable distribution determined by the duly constituted authority of the company, the title to the ratable share is thereby vested in the policyholder. Such being the fact, the company is thereafter the mere custodian of the amount of dividend thus declared and agrees as agent to make disposition of such amount in accordance with the direction of the owner thereof. This is specifically set out in the policy contracts, and the disposition of the dividend is determined solely by the election of the policyholder himself.

The insurance company declares a dividend and the policy contract gives the insured, in whose favor the dividend is declared, the absolute direction of its disposal. He may direct that it be paid to him in cash or he may direct its disposal as hereinbefore stated, by the company, which acts as the agent of the policyholder in applying the dividend as he may direct. The dividend having been regularly declared, the amount belonging to each policyholder is entirely within his control in accordance with the terms of his contract, and he may and must direct its disposal as stated. For purpose of illustration, suppose a policyholder elects to direct the disposition of his dividend to the part payment of his next renewal premium.

The company contends that such an election on the part of the policy holder is a rebate on the part of the company. When we consider, however, that the title to this dividend has already vested in the policy holder, it would appear that there is no abatement of premium, but that the policy holder who pays a continuing annual premium remits to the company a certain portion of that premium in cash and directs that the company take the amount of dividend due and payable to him and add it to the amount remitted in cash in payment of the premium then due to the company. The policy contracts of the companies themselves, the receipts for premium payments, and the whole transaction appear to establish this beyond any question.

The contention that the company does not receive the amount of money belonging to the policy holder which is in the physical possession of the company, and which the policy holder directs to be taken and added to the amount which he remits and thus pay his premium liability, is, moreover, not acceptable as an accounting proposition.

Nor can this office concur in the proposition that the company can, at the direction of the owner of a sum of money in its custody, take such sum and make a part payment on an obligation therewith and then contend that out of its liberality it has abated a portion of the obligation exactly equal to the amount of money in its possession thus applied at the direction of the policy holder.

The second and third allegations as to disposition of dividends declared fall indentically within the reasons set forth, and a further detailed discussion thereof does not appear necessary. It appears clear, therefore, that under the language of the law the dividends excepted from deductions are the amounts disbursed annually by the various companies as dividends, and that after the dividends are once declared, and by the direction of the policy holder are transferred back to the company for the purpose of paying premiums, purchasing additional insurance, or shortening the term of insurance, the amount of dividends so retransferred to the company constitutes income in every sense identically as though the actual cash was paid therefor, and such items shall be so treated and accounted for. The contention of the insurance companies that their ledger accounts and sworn statements are untrue and incorrect as to the item of dividends can not be accepted.

Certain decisions of State courts appear to lend color to the position assumed by the various companies. It should be borne in mind, however, that the various statutes construed or referred to in these decisions differ both in language and intent from the statute now under consideration, and without raising the question as to the extent to which these various State decisions are binding, it is clear from a careful consideration thereof that they do not furnish a safe guide to follow in determining the intent of Congress as evidenced by the language now under consideration.

The various agents will, therefore, continue to make up the returns from the ledger accounts of the insurance companies, recommend disallowance of any deduction claimed on account of dividends, and report as items of income all dividends declared by insurance companies and repaid to the insurance companies by direction of the owner thereof, even though the physical possession of such dividends shall have continued with the company.

The matter of amortization of bonds has already been the subject of an official ruling. The various items of depreciation claims and of certain questions relative to reserves are not sufficiently general for a ruling to be made thereon, and such questions will, for the present, be made the subject of individual consideration.

Respectfully, ROYAL E. CABELL, Commissioner.

Mr. JOHN W. SINSEL,
Internal Revenue Agent, New York.

APPENDIX B.

Synopsis of Paragraphs A to G relating to the tax upon individuals or persons.

INCOME TAX—PERSONAL.

INCOMES COVERED.

Those of all citizens of the United States residing at home or abroad.

Those of all persons residing in the United States although not citizens thereof.

All net incomes from property owned and from every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing elsewhere.

NORMAL TAX.

One per cent per annum upon the amount of net income over $4,000.

ADDITIONAL TAX.

One per cent per annum upon the total amount of net income from all sources over $20,000 and not over $50,000 per annum.

Two per cent per annum upon the amount of net income over $50,000 and not over $100,000.

Three per cent per annum upon the amount of net income over $100,000.

NET INCOME INCLUDES.

All gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services of any kind and however paid.

Professions or vocations.

Business, trade, or commerce.

Sales or dealings in property, real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of, or interest in property, real or personal.

Interest, rent, dividends, or securities.

Transaction of any lawful business carried on for gain or profit.

Gains or profits or income derived from any source whatever.

Income, but not the value, of property acquired by bequest, devise, or descent.

DEDUCTIONS ALLOWED.

Necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on any business.

All interest accrued and payable within the year on indebtedness.

All national, State, county, school, and municipal taxes.

Losses actually sustained during the year, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, arising from fire, storm, or shipwreck.

Debts actually ascertained to be worthless, and charged off during the year.

A reasonable allowance for the exhaustion or wear and tear of property arising out of its use or employment in business.

All income the tax upon which has been paid at the source.

Amounts received as dividends upon the stock of any corporation, etc., which is taxed upon its net income.

DEDUCTIONS NOT ALLOWED.

All personal, living, or family expenses.

Taxes assessed against local benefits.

All expense of restoring property or making good the exhaustion thereof, for which an allowance has been made.

Amounts paid for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments made to increase the value of any property or estate.

EXEMPTIONS.

Interest upon the obligations of a State or any political subdivision thereof.

Interest upon the obligations of the United States the principal and interest of which are now exempt from Federal taxation.

The compensation of the present President during the term for which he has been elected.

The compensation of the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts of the United States now in office.

The compensation of all officers and employees of a State or any political subdivision thereof.

AMOUNT OF INCOME EXEMPT.

Four thousand dollars shall be deducted from the net annual income, as above ascertained, of each person.

Only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregate income of all members of a family.

FAMILY CONSISTS OF.

One or both parents and one or more minor children, or of husband and wife.

EXCEPTIONS.

A wife living permanently apart from her husband.

Guardians are allowed to make deductions in favor of each and every ward when same are not comprised in one family having joint property interests.

TIME OF GOING INTO EFFECT.

The tax shall be computed upon the remainder of the said net income for the year ending December 31, and for each calendar year thereafter.

RETURN OF INCOME.

A true and accurate return of all net incomes of $3,500 or more shall be made under oath or affirmation.

It must be made to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which said person resides or has his principal place of business in the United States.

FORM OF RETURN.

The form shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Shall set forth specifically the gross amount of income from all separate sources. From this total shall be deducted the aggregate items of expenses and allowances above authorized.

TIME OF RETURN.

The return must be made on or before March 1, 1914, and on or before March 1 of each year thereafter.

PERSONS REQUIRED TO MAKE RETURNS.

1. Each taxable person of lawful age, for himself.

2. Guardians, trustees, executors, shall make and render a return of the net income, coming into their custody or control, of the person for whom they act.

3. All persons, firms, companies, copartnerships, corporations, etc., having the control, receipt, disposal, or payment of fixed or determinable annual gains, profits, or income of another person subject to tax, arising from an annual business relationship, shall in behalf of such other person render a separate and distinct return for each person upon which the normal tax is paid at the source.

EXCEPTIONS TO RETURNS.

No return of income not exceeding $3,500 is required.

Persons liable for the normal tax only on their own or another's account shall not be required to make returns of the income derived from dividends on capital stock of corporations taxable upon their net incomes.

DUTY OF THE COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

The collector or deputy shall require each list to be verified by oath or affirmation of the party rendering it.

The collector may increase the amount of any return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated.

No such increase shall be made except after due notice to such party and upon proof of the amount understated.

In case of disagreement between the collector and the taxable person, such person may submit the case with papers and proof to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

ASSESSMENTS.

All persons shall be notified of the amount for which they are respectively liable, on or before June 1 of each year.

NEGLECTED, FRAUDULENT, OR FALSE RETURNS.

In case of neglect or refusal to make returns, or in case of fraudulent or false returns, upon the discovery within three years after said return is due, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make such return himself.

TIME OF PAYMENT.

Said regular assessments shall be paid on or before the 30th day of June each year.

Assessments made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are payable upon notification.

PENALTY FOR DELAYED PAYMENTS.

On sums due and unpaid after June 30, or for 10 days after notice and demand thereof by the collector, there shall be added 5 per cent to the amount of tax unpaid and interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month from the time the same became due.

EXCEPTIONS.

Incomes from the estates of insane, deceased, or insolvent persons.

COLLECTION AT THE SOURCE.

All persons, firms, companies, etc., including lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees acting in any trust capacity, executors, etc., employers and all officers and employees of the United States having control, receipt, custody, disposal, or payment of interest, rent, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensation, remuneration, emoluments, or other fixed or determinable annual gains, profits, and income of another person exceeding $4,000 for any taxable year, who are required to make and render a return in behalf of another, are hereby authorized and required to deduct and withhold such normal tax and pay it to the United States official authorized to receive the same.

EXCEPTION.

Incomes from the dividends on the capital stock or from net earnings of a corporation, etc., subject to the normal tax are not to be included in the above.

LIABILITY.

Each of the persons, firms, etc., above enumerated are hereby made personally liable for such tax.

BENEFIT OF EXEMPTION.

Where the income tax of a person is paid at the source, the benefit of the $4,000 exemption shall not be allowed unless there shall be filed, not less than 30 days prior to the day on which the return is due, with the person or concern required to make such payment of tax at the source, an affidavit claiming the benefit of such exemption.

When a taxable person's tax is paid at the source, if he desires any deduction for losses, expense of business, etc., he may either file claim, together with return of any other income upon which the tax is not withheld at the source, either with the collector, or with the person or corporation withholding his tax, as the taxpayer may choose.

INDIVIDUAL INCOMES NOT EXCEEDING $4,000 PER ANNUM TO BE TAXED AT THE SOURCE.

Incomes derived from interest on bonds, mortgages, or other indebtedness of corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, insurance companies.

Securities of the United States not now exempt from taxation.

Incomes composed of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange for or in part payment of interest or dividends upon stock or obligations of foreign corporations, etc., engaged in business in foreign countries.

Interest upon bonds of foreign countries.

Foreign mortgages or like obligations not payable in the United States.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

No taxable person shall be released from liability for this tax.

When a return is made and his tax paid at the source, no person shall be required to make a return himself unless he has other net income.

Only one deduction of the $4,000 shall be made in case of any person.

FAILURE OR NEGLECT TO MAKE RETURN FOR PERSONAL TAX.

Any person, corporation, etc., liable to make a return for a personal tax refusing or neglecting to make such return shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $500.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understood that the gentleman from New York desired to yield some time.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the understanding that after that hour I will have an opportunity to even up the time. Gentlemen on that side of the House are several hours ahead of this side.

Mr. MANN. I submit to the gentleman in that connection, if the Chair will pardon me, that so far this side of the House has used the time very largely from half past 4 o'clock on, which is sometimes not the most favorable part of the day in which to secure the attention of Members, especially when events are taking place such as have been taking place outside the House for several days past. While this side of the House is ahead in point of time, I think the gentleman from Alabama, with his usual fairness, will perceive that the time ought to be scattered somewhat in the division.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am proposing to accomplish just exactly what the gentleman from Illinois suggests. I am yielding to allow the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to speak now, but propose to even up the time this afternoon at the very time that the gentleman is complaining that his side had to use it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman uses the time during those hours, it will be very satisfactory. I do not want to say it again, but we have used all the time between 5 and 8 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will divide the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it the purpose after the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has concluded to yield an hour to gentlemen on the other side?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield all the time on that side. The gentlemen there are about three hours ahead of this side, with only one-third of the membership to take care of. I will simply say that when the gentleman from Minnesota has concluded I should like to endeavor to get the time evened up on this side of the House. If we do not, it will carry it into Monday with the balance in my favor, and I want to be fair with you and not put you gentlemen in that position.

Mr. MANN. I hope we will be able to remain here to-night until 10 or 11 o'clock, and that gentlemen on both sides who desire to address the House will be here. We finished last night about 9 o'clock with a very good audience in the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. And getting better all the time.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen who desired to address the House ought to have been here last night, so that we could have continued the session until 11 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is my desire to run right on up to 11 o'clock to-night, if the speakers are here to occupy the time. Of course, if they are not, we will have to adjourn.

Mr. MURDOCK. We have been having each day an hour and 10 minutes, and we have lived up to our contract.

Mr. PAYNE. An hour and 12 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. An hour and 12 minutes, then. We are not willing that any arrangement should be made which would crowd us out, inasmuch as we have been here right along and have occupied the time which has been given us.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope this will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is assuming that this colloquy is proceeding by unanimous consent and it is not being charged to anybody.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, before yielding to the gentleman from Minnesota I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the elections of last November and the fact that we have a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President there is no doubt in my mind but that this Democratic tariff bill will become a law. The Democratic Party can not escape its enactment if they would. They have been waging a campaign of misrepresentation for so many years as regards the tariff and have been proclaiming from every housetop that if they were given the power they would change the tariff laws and reduce the high cost of living. Of course, many of the Democrats who have been preaching this doctrine did not believe it. Others, either because they were not fully informed or on account of their long advocacy of this false doctrine, had really come to believe that if they were given the authority they could change the tariff laws so as to greatly benefit the American people. Many of the distinguished Democrats throughout the Nation have advocated tariff reform, tariff revision, or whatever they may have seen fit to term it, because of their desire to get into office. They knew that the great principle of protection to the American industries and American workmen was Republican doctrine, hence they had to advocate the opposite of that in order to get an issue.

Continual agitation of this question in and out of Congress, coupled with the split in the Republican Party at the last election, has given to the Democratic Party the opportunity and the power to revise the tariff. There is no way by which you gentlemen of that side can escape that responsibility now. You must pass such a bill as the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means has presented to the House. You have said for years and years that you could pass a better tariff law than the Payne law, which is now in force. Through the action, or rather the inaction, of the American people in the last elections you have that chance. Nothing that I can do and nothing that the Republicans in this House can do will prevent you from passing this bill. You have had it for two weeks before the Democratic caucus of the House, and they have given it their approval. You have a majority in this House of over 100, and it has been clearly indicated that you will accept no amendments presented by the Republican minority. The tariff law that you propose to change is that of 1909, known as the Payne law. You have claimed since its enactment that it was not a revision of the tariff downward; that it was too high, and so forth. President Taft submitted to the last Congress facts and figures from the Tariff Board as a result of their investigation of the woolen and the cotton schedules of the tariff, which said report showed that reductions should be made in those schedules to equalize the cost of production in foreign countries and in this country. You abolished the Tariff Board by refusing to appropriate to continue its work, and you have refused to create a new tariff board to gather information and facts upon which to write a tariff bill. I am in favor of revising the tariff downward wherever impartial facts and figures indicate that it can be done without cheapening the price of American labor. In other words, I believe that the tariff, or the amount collected at the customhouses, should be only the difference in what it costs to manufacture the articles in this country and in foreign countries, measured by the standard of the wage scale in this and foreign countries. I do not believe that the tariff should be made a political question and issue, but that it should be a purely scientific one; that a nonpartisan tariff board should be created by Congress to gather facts and information regarding the cost of production at home and abroad; and that we should only charge at the customhouse that difference. This is the Republican doctrine and it is the American doctrine. It means America for Americans and protection to our American industries and workingmen against the cheap coolie and Hindu labor of foreign lands. It is true that the Payne law is not correct in every particular at this time, and that the tariff should be lowered in some instances and raised in some to meet changed and existing conditions. The woolen schedule and the cotton schedule are too high in some particulars, and if this Congress had followed the information gathered by the Tariff Board it would be an easy matter to change these schedules with due regard to what is right and fair. I believe that it is highly improper to write a new tariff bill every time a change is had in the political complexion of Congress and the White House, but that these changes should be made in the schedules from time to time as facts warrant. You gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have proceeded to slaughter many of our American industries, due to your ideas of writing a free-trade and tariff-for-revenue law. You have had to admit, however, that many of your arguments and statements on the political stump and otherwise as regards the Payne tariff law are untrue. On page 481 of the majority report, which is signed by all of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, you cite the official records from the Treasury Department, which show that the Payne law is a revision downward.

Your report shows that the average ad valorem duty on all imports in 1908, the last year of the Dingley law, was 23.88 per cent, and that in 1912, under the Payne law, it was 18.58 per cent. This is a reduction of 22⅞ per cent on the Dingley ad valorem rates. In addition to these facts, from your own report submitted in connection with this bill, further proof is had in two letters read in the House three days ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and which I herewith insert in my remarks as a further evidence and proof that you have been deceiving the American people upon this tariff question during the last four years, at least, and I hope that the American people will themselves give more study to the tariff question and learn for themselves what is for their best interests and not continue to take the advice and be misled by a lot of agitators and seekers for public office. The letters referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 17, 1913.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to aeknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, requesting information as to certain computations made by the Treasury Department in 1910, showing a comparison of the duties collected under the tariff act of 1909 with those that would have been collected on the same importations under the tariff act of 1897.

You state that ex-Congressman E. J. Hill, of Connecticut, made the assertion in a speech that the computation showed that the importations considered actually paid into the Treasury under the Payne law (a reduction of 6.4 per cent) $11,178,162.02 less than they would have paid if no change of law had been made. You request to be informed as to the following points:

First. Is the above difference correctly stated?

Second. What were the months covered by the computation?

Third. What were the aggregate importations covered by the computation?

In reply I have to state that:

First. The figures given are correctly stated, as shown by the computations made, which are believed to be correct. The amount stated represents the net decrease.

Second. The months covered by the computations were the six months from October 1, 1909, to March 31, 1910.

Third. The aggregate importations covered by the computations had a total value of $804,878,645.46, and these importations consisted of all dutiable items, Philippine goods, and items in the free list for the period mentioned, with the exception of various items having a total value of $2,983,830.97, relative to which the data at hand were insufficient to form a satisfactory basis for the computation of the duties under the act of 1897.

Respectfully,
J. F. CURTIS,
Assistant Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 1, 1913.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, further in the matter of computations made on importations received under the tariff act of 1909 showing a comparison of the duties collected and the duties computed on the same importations under the rates of the tariff of 1897.

You state that you have been informed that such computations have been made for the period from April 1, 1910, to October 1, 1910, and you request information as to the following points:

First. Whether or not a computation has been made by the Treasury Department for an entire year showing a comparison of the duties collected under the tariff act of 1909 as compared with the duties that would have been collected on the same importations had the tariff act of 1897 still been in force?

Second. Which 12 months were covered by these importations?

Third. What results appeared—

(a) As to percentage of increase or decrease under the Payne law?

(b) As to the increase or decrease in the total amount collected under the Payne law?

In reply I have to state that the department did not make computations for the six months mentioned by you, but did for the fiscal year 1911, relative to which, in response to your questions, you are advised as follows:

First. Yes; the computation as outlined was made.

Second. The 12 months covered were those from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911.

Third. (a) The computations showed a decrease under the Payne law of 4.05 per cent. (b) The decrease under the Payne law shown by the computations was found to be $13,036,875.84.

As in the previous computations, the above figures represent the net decrease on the items compared, consisting of the dutiable items, Philippine goods, and items in the free list according to the importations for the period under consideration, except various items relative to which the data at hand were insufficient to form a satisfactory basis for a computation of the duties under the tariff act of 1897. The percentage of decrease is based on the duties computed under the tariff act of 1897.

With respect to the last paragraph of your letter, requesting information as to whether there is any printed publication which covers the points mentioned, I have to state that the department knows of no printed publication covering the points in question, as the computations were prepared in the form of typewritten schedules only during the years 1910 and 1911 for the use of the President.

Respectfully,
J. F. CURTIS,
Assistant Secretary.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], in referring to these two letters in his speech, said:

They show in practice the Payne law has proved to be a downward revision. When it is remembered that the greater part of the increase of duty in the Payne law was confined to wines, spirits, silks, perfumery, and other luxuries, it will be at once apparent that there was a substantial downward revision in that part of the tariff law in which the average man and woman is particularly interested.

So, Mr. Chairman, with the Democratic Party in the position that they are, on account of the results of the election, and their former claims as to being able to write a tariff bill much better than the Payne law, we have before us to-day this conglomeration of imperfections, mistakes, and inaccuracies, prepared without due regard to the facts and without a reasonable opportunity for the industries of the country to be heard. It is very difficult for one to even understand, much less intelligently discuss, this bill in a single speech. It is claimed that this bill is in the interest of the poor man and to reduce the high cost of living, and that you propose in this bill to place taxes according to a person's wealth. You claim to try to do this through the income-tax provision. I myself am heartily in favor of an income tax. The truth is that it was a Republican Congress that submitted the income-tax resolution to the States for ratification. Yet that provision in the income-tax part of this bill which taxes millions of policyholders of mutual life insurance companies is unjust and not in line with your claim of equalizing taxation. It is claimed that there are 20,000,000 persons thus affected, and that under this income-tax provision they will all be taxed, but yet very few of them have an income of as much as $4,000 per annum. Mutual life insurance companies being owned by policyholders, this tax will, of course, have to be paid by the policyholders, and most of them are citizens with little wealth, but who have taken these policies as a protection to their families. About 20,000,000 of these good, honest citizens are hit by this income tax, yet they are paying their full share of taxes to the city, State, and Nation otherwise.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in introducing this bill called attention to the fact that it would tax only about 425,000 people out of our entire population. As a matter of fact, a tax on the net income of the insurance business in this country done on the mutual plan would become a personal tax on several millions of people, a tax levied in violation of the principle of the bill and without any regard whatever to the actual income of the people taxed. The Democratic claim in this bill of equalizing taxation does not equalize and violates the principle of income taxation.

Mr. Chairman, this bill also is inconsistent in that it puts a tax on cattle and sheep coming into this country but admits beef and mutton free. This is a discrimination against the producers of our live stock and is in favor of the producers of cattle and sheep in Canada and other foreign countries.

It is the same way with oats. You put a duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats, but oatmeal you admit free. Here is what the manufacturers of that product in my district say with regard to it:

We believe the proposed changes in the tariff as to free oatmeal, rolled oats, and oat hulls with a duty on oats is unfair for the following reasons:

A duty of 10 cents per bushel on oats with rolled oats and oatmeal free would give the Canadian miller an advantage of $1 per barrel and would force the independent mills of the United States out of business.

The largest manufacturer of rolled oats and oatmeal in the United States, and in fact in the world, has a large mill in eastern Canada and a second one in the Canadian Northwest about ready to start, and the above provision in the tariff bill would enable them to still further gain control over the oatmeal business as against smaller American manufacturers having no mills in Canada.

The Canadian Cereal Co., with headquarters in Toronto, Canada, is an oatmeal trust, being a combination of about one dozen Canadian oatmeal millers with plants located at Toronto, Tilsonburgh, Lindsay, Woodstock, London (Canada), etc., and this combination and the above-mentioned American manufacturer could positively control the oatmeal trade in the United States.

We do not ask for protection, but we do ask for equity.

We ask that oats and the manufactured products therefrom be put on a parity.

If oatmeal, rolled oats, and oat hulls are put on the free list, we ask for free oats.

In this bill there is a 10 per cent duty on wheat, but you admit flour free. This favors the millers of Canada to the injury of those of our own country.

All through the bill can be found discriminations against the American manufacturers and American producers and in favor of foreign manufacturers and foreign producers. In fact, you claim that this legislation is for the benefit of the consumer, but pray tell me how the consumer will be able to buy provisions and clothing when he is not given an opportunity to work in the production of these things? They will all be manufactured and produced abroad with foreign labor. Our people will not be able to buy the things needed for want of money. However, your bill provides that rags shall be admitted free to this country. I suppose this is in your bill for the reason that you know that our workingmen and their families will not be able to buy anything to wear except rags, and you are showing your good spirit at least in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a great manufacturing district.

Last year the freight of St. Louis handled by 26 trunk-line railroads and by river was over 51,340,000 tons.

There are approximately 150,000 people employed in the different factories in my district, and the goods manufactured there last year amounted to approximately $350,000,000.

Some of its chief products are shoes, street and railway cars, automobiles, dry goods, hardware, tobacco, drugs, chemicals, patent medicines, ammonia, soaps, perfumes, toilet articles, stoves, clothing, machinery, woodenware, and steel bridges.

Five hundred thousand stoves are manufactured there annually. The car-building industry amounts to $70,000,000 a year. Dry goods are manufactured to the extent of $75,000,000 a year. The hardware houses sell $50,000,000 worth of goods a year. We make 70,000,000 pounds of chewing tobacco in my district. The manufacture of 65,000,000 cigars in my splendid district gives employment to several thousand of our best people. They are being hard hit by this free-trade bill. The Democratic Party has declared for the independence of the Philippine Islands, and this Congress is intended to carry out their wishes by passing a law to that effect, yet our laboring men must compete with their cheap labor without any protection. Let me read to you a protest from the cigar makers' union of my city. Here is what they say:

CIGAR MAKERS' UNIONS 44 AND 281,
JOINT ADVISORY BOARD,
St. Louis, Mo., April 18, 1913.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Twelfth Missouri Congressional District.

DEAR SIR:

Whereas the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has reported a bill establishing absolute free trade in cigars and tobacco and other products with the Philippine Islands; and

Whereas the present law permits 150,000,000 cigars from the Philippine Islands to be admitted duty free, which in itself is equal to the annual production of 2,500 American cigar makers; and

Whereas any bill having for its purpose the open-door policy, viz, removing the duty on all cigars and tobacco manufactured in the Philippine Islands, will work considerable hardship on the men and women engaged at cigar making for a livelihood and be a decidedly disturbing factor in the industry many of us have devoted almost a lifetime to;

Therefore, we, the members of Cigar Makers' and Cigar Packers' Unions, Nos. 44 and 281, of St. Louis, Mo., comprising over 1,000 members, most of whom have large families depending solely upon the progress and development of the cigar industry in the United States, hereby enter a vigorous protest against the enactment of any law or rules which tend to destroy the cigar industry of the United States, the result of which deprives us of a livelihood; be it further

Resolved, That we certainly protest most vigorously of being pitted against oriental labor, viz, Filipinos, Chinese, Japs, etc., the cheapest labor of the world, and we insist as American citizens that our welfare be given the first and highest consideration, and in accordance with this spirit we look forward to the Congress of these United States to defeat any measure endangering the means of existence of this Nation's toilers or any portion thereof.

Trusting we may learn your disposition in the above matter.

JOINT CIGAR MAKERS' UNIONS 44 AND 281.
HY. C. PLASSMEYER.
PHIL H. MUELLER, Secretary.

Their plea here for a square deal will, however, avail them nothing. This bill is to pass this House without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

The greatest fur market in this country is located in St. Louis. There is also located the largest brewery in the world. Two of its chief products, Budweiser and Malt-Nutrine, are known and sold all over the world. The lumber industry in St. Louis is the greatest in America.

This bill strikes at practically every important industry in my district. It strikes at union labor also, and I am satisfied will work great injury to the people of that splendid city.

Practically every industry in my district, big and little, are discriminated against in this bill in favor of the foreign manufacturers. When this bill is taken up for amendments I shall endeavor to have necessary changes made that will give to these industries a fair show in competition with foreign manufacturers.

In view, however, of the well-known understanding that this bill is to pass the House as it came from the committee and from the Democratic caucus, I have little hope of accomplishing anything. I have not the time to go over all of these industries and point out wherein they will be injured if this bill becomes a law. One of the great industries in my district, the boot and shoe industry, I will, however, take as an example. That fairly applies to the other industries. There are 32 shoe factories in my district and 17 others in neighboring towns owned by the St. Louis houses. These 49 factories employ about 20,000 people. Their average sale amounts to about $60,000,000 a year. The Payne law levied an import duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on—

(SEC. 450) boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight of cattle of the bovine species, including calf skins—and an import duty of 15 per cent on—

(SEC. 451) boots and shoes made of leather.

The duty of 10 per cent applies in general to men's shoes; the duty of 15 per cent applies to women's shoes.

This bill puts them on the free list, yet there is a duty on most of the supplies which the shoe manufacturers use, which is unfair to our own manufacturers and gives the advantage to the foreign manufacturers. Our manufacturers have to pay a tax on many of the articles used in manufacturing shoes coming here from foreign countries, and under this proposed law will have to sell in open market with the foreign manufacturers. The following comparative table shows the tariff on articles entering into the manufacture of shoes under the present law and under this bill, to wit:

	Payne Tariff Act.	Proposed Underwood bill.
	Per cent.
Braids	60	50 per cent.

Hobnails	10	Do.
Rough lumber	7	Do.
Tacks (small, iron or steel)	4	Do.
All leathers for boots and shoes	5 to 25	Do.

There can be no excuse for this discrimination in favor of foreign shoe manufacturers, as against our own manufacturers, because there is no one who claims that the shoe industry in this country is a trust. The wages paid shoe workers in this country is from a third to one-half more than paid in other countries. It is difficult to see how our manufacturers can compete with foreign manufacturers and maintain the present wages, when our own manufacturers have to pay duty on many of the parts that go to make up shoes, as per the above list, and which the foreign manufacturers do not.

The workmen engaged in the bagging industry in my district, and which is very hard hit by this bill, will suffer likewise from the cheap Hindu labor of India and Calcutta. I doubt if our bagging mills can keep up at all when this law goes into effect. The laborers of India work in the jute mills there for about one-fourth to one-sixth of what is paid here in our American mills.

Mr. Chairman, it is useless, as stated above, to complain. This bill will become a law substantially as it is written. Its effect upon the industries and workers in this country is apparent to all of those who have given the question study and consideration. Yet since the bill is bound to become a law, the sooner the better, that the people may know and understand the fallacies of the Democratic theory of the tariff. The sooner they realize it and understand it the quicker will we get a change and get the country back again to the splendid and prosperous protective policy of the Republican Party. The vagaries and falsity of Democratic free trade and revenue tariff doctrine will again be known, fully and completely, as it was under the administration of Grover Cleveland.

I am sincerely sorry that the American people must suffer thus, but there is no escape from it. The people of this country who believe in the policy of protection will have to come together for the good of the country. If they had not been divided in the last election, we would not to-day be facing the disaster that is sure to come from the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come to this country when the American farmer, the American manufacturer, the American wage earner, and all Americans who love their country and are proud of its history and progress should and must stand together. The United States is the richest country in the world; its men and women are the most patriotic and industrious the world over. Our country stands for the best that there is in the human and industrial life of our Nation. I have no farmers in my district, but I will not be one of those to vote for a bill that will hinder and retard their progress. The success of the farming industry is closely akin to the success of the manufacturer and the wage earner. The one can not exist and prosper without the other. In my district there is published the National Farmer and Stock Grower, which goes to thousands of farmers throughout the Middle West and the Mississippi Valley. In a recent issue of that paper there appeared the following:

The National Farmer and Stock Grower is in favor of the United States customhouse collecting a reasonable range of duties upon all foreign farm products and all manufactured goods admitted into the United States from foreign countries, said duties to be applied to the support of the National Government.

By the tariff policy that we advocate fully one-half the money required for the support of the National Government should be collected at the customhouses, besides furnishing the farmer and manufacturer the very moderate amount of protection to which they are entitled. We are opposed to the admission of foreign farm products free of duty, because admission of such products duty free always leads to the advantage of the foreign merchant and speculator and causes increased burdens to be imposed on our own people.

Taking the duty off hides has been entirely in the interest of foreign countries and to the detriment of our own people; admitting coffee duty free enabled the formation of a South American combination that has raised the price three for one, and every time foreign goods are placed on the free list there is the same result. With moderate import duties received by the United States on various products as now collected the total that is covered into the United States Treasury is over $300,000,000 a year, and if not collected that way will have to be collected by direct taxes upon our own productions. The admission of foreign goods free of duty results in higher prices to the American consumer and higher taxation also upon our own products to make up the necessary revenues.

Every farmer in the United States is taxed by his county and by the State; he also pays a share of the taxes collected in various ways for the support of the Federal Government. We believe that in return for his support in tax money and in time of necessity for his personal services the American citizen is entitled to preference in his home market for his own productions from the laws of the Government he supports. We believe that the advantages of our own markets belong to the citizens of the United States, and that all foreign farm productions should pay a duty at the front door as the goods are admitted. In times of scarcity, caused by drought or other unavoidable influences, the foreign farm productions can come in under light duties on a fair basis, and in times of abundance the country thrives better without them.

We believe the farmer as a producer outranks all other people; the manufacturer is next, but without the farmer's products the manufacturer would have to shut his doors.

Legislation against the farming interest is the height of folly, and special discrimination against the farmer is a political crime. Legislation against the farmer will cause more poverty in the cities than most people imagine. The nonproducing so-called consumers in cities will be the first to find it out and be the greatest sufferers.

The above expresses my views fully. I believe, and the Republican Party believes, that the farmer, the manufacturer, and the wage earners in all parts and section of our country should be given the same fair treatment under the laws of this country; that there should not be protection for a part of the people and their products and free trade for others, to the advantage of foreign producers and manufacturers. I do not believe that there should be a duty on rice and products manufactured from rice, as there is in this bill, and meats, oatmeal, and so forth, let in free of duty. The agriculturists of the North and West are entitled to the same consideration at the hands of the Congress of the United States that the rice growers of the South are entitled to. In legislating for the people we should not legislate for the East, the North, the South, or the West, but for the great, grand, and glorious United States of America.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of a tariff bill the first inquiry is naturally directed to the policy which animates it. What is that policy? Is it such a one as will afford the wage earner increased opportunity to labor at better wages and under more advantageous conditions? Will it enhance the rewards of industry, genius, and ability and offer greater inducements for the profitable investment of capital? Will it tend to extend our foreign trade? Speed or retard us as a nation in the race for the world's commerce? Is the policy, whatever it may be, so written into the law that its burdens will be equitably adjusted and its benefits fairly distributed?

In his precedent-breaking and possibly epoch-making speech before the House of Representatives and Senate assembled in joint session on the 8th day of April, 1913, the President said:

Aside from the duties laid upon articles which we do not and probably can not produce, therefore, and the duties laid upon luxuries and merely for the sake of the revenues they yield, the object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

In a signed letter which appeared in the newspapers on the date of April 9, 1913, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], member of the Ways and Means Committee, in describing the effect of the bill, said:

All duty has been taken off meats, fresh and prepared. This means that meat from Argentina can be imported to compete with the product of American packers. All fish are on the free list, spelling a probable average of 20 per cent reduction in its cost to the consumer. Milk is put on the free list. Potatoes go on the free list. Cheese is cut in various grades from 35 to 42 per cent to 20 per cent. This will particularly affect the cheaper grades used in quantities by the average consumer. Leather and leather goods, with the exception of dress gloves, are put on the free list. This will force American manufacturers of shoes to compete with foreign makers. Paints have been cut enormously. The consumer will be able to purchase excellently made foreign paints at low prices. All soaps have been cut from 20 to 5 per cent. This will force American soap makers to materially lower the price of their product or increase the size of the soap cakes. The duty on all household furniture has been cut from 35 to 15 per cent. This will increase importation of excellently made foreign furniture at low prices.

Again, the report of the Democratic majority contains the following statement:

And the attempt has been made to produce in every line of industry a competitive tariff basis providing for a substantial amount of importation, to the end that no concern shall be able to feel that it has a monopoly of the home market gained other than through the fact that it is able to furnish better goods at lower prices than others.

It is apparent at once from these utterances that the prime object of the proposed legislation is to induce—to invite—importation, to place the American producer in direct competition with his foreign competitor in every line of industry carried on in this country with a view to the regulation of prices. To carry out this purpose it is proposed to transfer to foreign countries $140,000,000 annually of the industry of this country, representing not less than $50,000,000 in wages and profits. The mere statement of this proposition should be sufficient to condemn it. It is abhorrent to business sense, pride of country, and patriotism alike.

The American farmer, wage earner, and manufacturer is cheerfully invited to engage in a battle of wits for his own market. Not upon equal terms, however. Handicapped by a higher standard of living he must struggle to maintain the supremacy in the market which he himself helps to make, and to whose high standards he contributes of his time, his industry, his genius, and his patriotism. In that struggle he must meet the merciless competition of the farmers, wage earners, and manufacturers of other countries, whose statesmen have brains enough to protect their home market while they encourage them to extend their trade, by bonuses and subsidies of one kind and another, into other countries whose statesmen have not exhibited the same acumen. From the vantage ground of a protected market Russia, Germany, France, and the British possessions will contest with us for our own trade in a free market. To these unfair economic conditions the bill in detail adds many another disadvantage to the handicap of the American producer.

In his letter to the Washington Post, Mr. Hearst says Mr. Wilson is an English free trader. This is an English free-trade bill. Again, Mr. Hearst says:

Mr. Wilson's political economy is the political economy of another nation and of another age. It is the political economy of a nation that is passing and of an age that is past.

Mr. Hearst is not complimentary, but his description is accurate. The policy of this bill will place the United States in a lonely and isolated positon among the agricultural nations of the world. Germany, France, Russia—indeed, all of the civilized countries of the world making any pretense to agricultural development—maintain a protective policy. England alone has abandoned it, and with it she abandoned all pretense to agriculture. We propose to abandon the protective policy of Germany, under which ever acre of her farm lands is profitably tilled, for the free-trade policy of England, under which 28,000,000 of her 48,000,000 acres of agricultural lands lie uncultivated.

The Democratic majority of the committee contend that any degree of protection is ineffective as regards certain commodities, chiefly those produced on the farm, because the price of such commodities is controlled by the law of diminishing returns. In other words, that the price of these commodities is fixed ultimately by the cost of producing that portion of the supply which is brought into existence under the least favorable conditions, provided that all portions of the supply are necessary to satisfy a given demand.

The purpose of the argument is to demonstrate the lack of necessity for levying protective duties upon farm products and to show that the price of these commodities is controlled by a universal law. While doubtless the theory is correctly stated, it is based upon an assumed state of facts which does not exist, and overlooks the fact that the supply of farm products, or of any other commodity, under existing world conditions are not permitted to flow unrestricted to the point of greatest demand; but that, whether we maintain obstruction on our part in the form of tariff duties, other countries, in their attempt to gain the supremacy in the world's markets, will extend to their own producers every facility for extending their foreign trade, at the same time preserving the home market to the home producer by a protective duty. In other words, the theory is based upon the false premise that the natural law invoked is applied to the world's commerce without obstruction or hindrance by either artificial barriers or inducements.

If it were true that the opening of our market to the competition of the world automatically opened the markets of the world to the competition of our manufacturers and producers, the position taken by the majority might be sound; but in the absence of such an assumption the policy of inducing importations can only result in taking away from our own producers the opportunity to produce the amount of articles imported and turning it over to the producers of foreign countries, without our enjoying any reciprocal advantage in the extension of our foreign trade. This bill gives to the foreign producer and manufacturer all that we have to give. We can offer nothing more which might induce them to open the foreign market to us. This effectually forecloses all opportunity for the making of reciprocal agreements and renders inoperative the section of the proposed bill granting to the President the power to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements.

The majority of the committee, in their report on the pending bill, say:

> The present condition of the revenue legislation of the United States is the result of many years of adherence to the protective-tariff policy. This tariff policy is the result of peculiar circumstances, and in no way represents the choice of the people.

If the latter statement can be made with propriety, it may be said with equal propriety that the policy adopted by this bill in no way represents the choice of the people at the last election. Mr. Wilson, representing the antiprotection-tariff idea, received 6,293,770 votes, while Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, both running upon platforms declaring for protection, received 7,606,812 votes, indicating that there was no intention on the part of the American people to abandon the policy of a protective tariff. Had Mr. Wilson advocated free wool, free sugar, free potatoes, free rye, free buckwheat, free wheat flour, free lumber, and free leather as vigorously and as openly before the election as he has since his inauguration, he would have received less votes than either Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt at the last election.

Nevertheless it can not be gainsaid that the mandate of the people in the Democratic Party both in 1910 and 1912 was to revise the tariff downward; but it does not follow with equal certainty that that mandate was to abandon the policy of protection for the theory of free trade or to open the American market to the competition of the world.

In opening the debate on the bill the majority leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, said:

> The real question that we have to consider is that of the rights and interests of the consuming masses of the American people. The question of industry in this country is, and from our standpoint must always be, secondary to the rights and necessities of the great American consuming public.

The statement seems to assume that it is possible to establish by law a condition of prosperity among the consumers separate and apart from that of the producer; that on one side you have a consuming public and on the other a producing public, the interests of which were diametrically opposed. It ignores the fact that the great mass of people are both consumers and producers and that prosperity only marks the relation between the man's ability to produce and the cost of what he consumes.

Aside from the two extremes of society represented by the hobo and the idle rich, one of which produces nothing and consumes but little, the other of which consumes much but produces little, every man is both a producer and a consumer. His prosperity is measured by the difference between the value of what he produces and what he consumes. The ratio of difference is always higher under a high standard of prices, speaking within reasonable limits, than under a low standard. Thus a high standard of prices always accompanies prosperity and a low standard of prices depression.

Now, the protective tariff properly administered is not, as so many now seem to think, a device for enabling the producer to make a profit at the expense of the consumer. If this were the object, it could be more economically attained by paying these favored industries a bonus or subsidy as some countries now do in some lines of production.

The real purpose of a protective tariff is to enable us to maintain a standard commensurate with our resources, industry, and genius as a Nation and to maintain at the highest point the ratio of difference between the value of what we produce and what we consume both as individuals and as a Nation.

To illustrate the point I am trying to make, I desire to quote some figures from the digest of the report of the British Board of Trade on the cost of living in the principal industrial towns of the United States. The investigation which preceded this report was undoubtedly the most thorough ever undertaken.

In the United Kingdom the average weekly family income in certain specified trades, including building, engineering, printing, and common labor, is $7.74. The average weekly family expenditure for food is $4.93, or 63.6 per cent of the family income. In the United States the average weekly family wage in the same trades is $19.25, and the average weekly family expense for food is $8.03, or 41.7 per cent. The difference in favor of the American wage earner amounts to 21.9 per cent of the average American weekly wage, or $4.20 per week. I quote now from the conclusions of the report:

> Summarizing now the results of the international comparison it appears that the ratio of the weekly wages for certain occupations in the United States and England and Wales, respectively, at the dates of the two inquiries is 243 to 100 in the building trades, 213 to 100 in the engineering trades, 246 to 100 in the printing trades, and 232 to 100 in all these trades together. Allowing for a slight advance in wages in England and Wales between the dates of the two inquiries, the combined ratio would be 230 to 100.
> The retail prices of food obtained by weighing the ascertained predominant prices according to the consumption shown by the British budgets show, when allowance is made for the increase which took place in this country between October, 1905, and February, 1909, a ratio of 138 to 100 for the United States and England and Wales, respectively.
> Comparison of wages, hours of labor, rents, and prices in the areas of investigation in the two countries has been made on the assumption that an English workingman with an average family maintained under American conditions the standard of consumption as regards food to which he had been accustomed. Under such conditions the workman's wages would be higher in the United States by about 130 per cent, with slightly shorter hours, while on the other hand his expenditure for food and rent would be higher by about 52 per cent. It is evident, then, that, even when allowance has been made for the increased expenditure on food and rent, a much greater margin is available in the United States than in England and Wales.
> The margin over expenditure for rent and food is clearly large, making possible a command of the necessaries and conveniences and minor luxuries of life that is both nominally and really greater than that enjoyed by the corresponding class in this country, although the effective margin in itself, in practice, curtailed by a scale of expenditure to some extent necessarily and to some extent voluntarily adopted in accordance with a different and higher standard of material comfort.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Rather than the necessary cost of living?

Mr. ANDERSON. Exactly so.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to hurry along, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. STANLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in the matter of clothing the difference was in favor of the United States more than in the matter of food?

Mr. ANDERSON. I said so; yes. In comparison with the wage scale.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not true that the difference between the cost of meats and flour in England and the United States is much less than the difference between the cost of woven fabrics made of cotton or wool?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so when you take into consideration the whole consumption of an average family in this country and England.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. From that source or any other has the gentleman any comparative statistics as to the other real necessaries of life besides food and rent—say, for instance, in the matter of clothing?

Mr. ANDERSON. About the same proportion runs all the way through, although the advantage is rather more in favor of the United States in the case of clothing than in the case of food.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I take it that the difference, wherever it operates in larger proportion to the expenditure upon the part of the American citizen as compared with the citizen of Great Britain, doubtless comes from the fact that the American citizen, the laboring man, may expend a great deal more in the line of what may be called luxuries.

Mr. ANDERSON. Exactly so.

Mr. STANLEY. It does not matter about the consumption.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes; it does. I do not want to argue with the gentleman. I yielded for a question.

Mr. STANLEY. I was asking a question. I do not think the gentleman means to assert here that the cost per yard or per garment for clothing is nearer the English price than the cost of food.

Mr. ANDERSON. The language of the report is as follows:

> The item of clothing raises wider and more difficult questions of comparison, but the report states that particulars that have been obtained go to show that, while higher prices have, as a rule, been paid in the United States than in the United Kingdom for woolen and worsted fabrics of similar quality, a very large supply of domestic articles of wearing apparel of most descriptions is available there of standard sizes that are on sale at prices either not so much higher or not higher than in England, although often less durable.

It is impossible to avoid the lesson which these figures and these conclusions teach. While doubtless our greater natural resources would for a time sustain a higher standard of living in this country than in England under free trade, the inevitable result of the adoption of her free-trade policy in this country, especially with reference to agriculture, would be the lowering of our standard of living to something approaching that of England at least.

The Democratic theory seems to be, however, that it is possible to single out certain industries and to reduce the prices of the products of that industry to the consumer, at the same time maintaining the level of prices to the producer and the level of prosperity of the country as a whole.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I have been much interested in the attitude of the gentleman and his party. Can he tell us how you are going to compel the manufacturers to divide up profits with the workmen through the instrumentality of a tariff law?

Mr. ANDERSON. As I have tried to point out in my argument, the purpose of a protective tariff is to maintain a general standard of living. It is not, as the gentleman seems to infer, a policy of protecting the profits of manufacturers.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman really think that the labor organizations are responsible for keeping up the standard of living rather than the tariff?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so. Undoubtedly they have some effect in that direction, but I think that the evidence will show that labor has been getting a pretty fair share of the advantages of the protective tariff.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. If the labor organizations are so potent a factor in maintaining a high standard of living in the United States, why are not they equally efficacious in foreign countries, where they are vastly more efficiently organized than they are here?

Mr. HARRISON of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARLIN). Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I have not the floor to answer the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota declines to yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The fabric of commercial industry under modern conditions is not made up of isolated units. Each industry is intricately interwoven with every other to form a symmetrical and perfect whole. It is impossible to single out a special industry and subject it to the tide of foreign competition so as to reduce the price of the products of that industry without affecting the whole industrial fabric.

I do not believe in the protective tariff as a device for the protection of profits. I do not believe in protecting profits as such. I do not believe in protecting inefficiency. I do not think it is possible to protect industry from competition in the art of the industry itself, either at home or abroad. I do believe in protecting and maintaining the higher standard of living that obtains in this country, whether that standard is represented by direct and productive labor or the indirect contributions of the farmer, the clerk, the lawyer, the doctor, or the merchant. Whenever any industry is singled out to receive the special protection of the tariff, whenever any industry is accorded a higher degree of protection than would equalize the difference in the standard of that industry at home and abroad, the tariff becomes a mere special privilege and not a policy. It can be a policy only when it is applied to all industry according to a definite measure.

On the other hand, when duties are placed at a point which subjects industry to unequal and unfair competition from abroad, it becomes merely an instrument of punishment, and immunity may constitute no less a special privilege than the giving of direct and special benefits.

Now, in order to maintain the American market for the American producer, and in order to equalize the difference in the standard under which goods are produced here and abroad, it is necessary to be fully informed as to the conditions under which the goods are produced, the relative cost of material and conversion into the finished article, the labor conditions which surround the industry, the relative efficiency of machinery and workmen, and the laws which encourage or discourage production or increase or diminish its cost.

A few days ago I received, as I suppose every Member of the House did, a statement presented by an association representing the window-glass manufacturing companies of the United States, purporting to give the costs of production of window glass here and abroad. That statement showed the advantage to be greatly in favor of the foreign manufacturer.

I have no more doubt that the figures were accurate than I have that the men who made it were human. Being human, I have no doubt they made it as favorable to their industry as the facts would permit. They would have been less than just to the industry had they done otherwise. The figures must either be accepted or rejected; but would it not be wiser and more statesmanlike if instead of disregarding these figures and possibly placing the duty at so low a point as to cripple or destroy the industry, or taking the figures at their face value and perhaps making the duty so high as to place a premium upon inefficiency, we had provided ourselves with a nonpartisan commission equipped with power and machinery to learn and report the facts upon which Congress might fix a rate intelligently?

If there is one thing more than another which marks the difference between the Democratic and Republican Parties it is their respective attitude toward facts—information. The Republican Party believes in publicity at every stage of legislative procedure. We have opened our party conferences to the public and the press. We believe the public always acts intelligently when it is well informed. Publicity is valueless unless it is based on facts. Legislation is not only valueless but frequently absolutely destructive unless based on accurate information.

The Republican Party believes in scientific government. It is in favor of a tariff based upon information, not theory. Important as is the policy which shall govern the making of a tariff bill, it is more important that we should have a tariff based upon information and that will conform to modern trade facts at home and modern world conditions abroad than that we should have a tariff either Democratic or Republican. In other words, the tariff should be made a scientific problem of equalizing the natural trade advantages of lower wage scales and standards of living and artificial stimulants and encourgements enjoyed by foreign countries rather than the football of political parties or the bone of contention of the supposedly opposing producers and consumers.

It is not my province to advise the majority; but it is possibly not too great presumption to hope that when this bill has passed, the Democratic Party will provide some adequate machinery for the determination of costs and prices here and abroad for determining trade facts and conditions and the other elements, both natural and artificial, which affect the relation of industry in this country to that of foreign countries with a view to the revision of the tariff from time to time, schedule by schedule or item by item, as the facts determined may require. Call it a tariff board, a trade commission, or whatever you will; some instrumentality must be established, equipped with power and authority, to obtain the facts necessary to the proper preservation of our own commerce and its extension beyond the seas.

The prime necessity of the manufacturer is opportunity for continuous operation under normal conditions. The prime necessity of the wage earner is continuous employment. Changes which interrupt the continuity of operation are destructive of industry. Changes which interrupt the continuity of employment of the wage earner are destructive of both his prosperity and his happiness. Radical and wholesale changes in the policy of our tariff laws must inevitably be injurious to the whole fabric of commerce and industry.

If there is one thing which the last Congress established beyond dispute, it is the efficacy and desirability of the schedule by schedule revision of the tariff. Such a revision permits of the consideration of the tariff upon allied products upon their own merits. It prevents the brutalities and incongruities which inevitably result upon the logrolling which always accompanies a general revision of the tariff, whether the general tendency of the revision is upward or downward. It affords greater opportunity for real consideration. Schedules revised in this way will not be subject to the vagaries of sectionalism which are certain to characterize general revision.

The opportunity of the Democratic Party for real service did not lie so much in the revision of the tariff as in revision of the methods under which revisions have heretofore been accomplished. It has failed miserably in this respect, but it can still redeem its failure by providing machinery which will make the adoption of similar methods impossible for the future. The Democratic Party has ever been a party of opposition. It could earn a clear title to being a party of progress if it could lay aside for the nonce the desire for political advantage long enough to establish a really constructive method of tariff revision.

In its attempts to carry out its promise for a free market basket the Democratic Party has made the farmer the chief point of its attack against the high level of prices. The farming industry has been singled out as the shining mark for the competition of foreign countries under the mistaken theory that the price of his commodities to the consumer may be reduced without affecting his prosperity as a producer. The farmer is made the scapegoat of a weird attempt to apply an impossible theory to unknown conditions.

Nothing could better illustrate the Democratic tendency to write tariffs with absolute disregard for trade facts and conditions than this attempt. It must result in failure either at one end or the other.

If the Democratic Party succeeds in lowering the price of agricultural products to the consumer, it will at the same time lower the level of prices of wages and commodities of other industries, and ultimately the disturbances which the radical cuts proposed by the bill must inevitably produce will diminish the ratio of the difference between the value of what we produce and what we consume to the point of actual business depression and stagnation.

In the very first line of the agricultural schedule the farmer is presented with what purports to be a protective duty of 10 per cent ad valorem upon cattle. His joy upon making this discovery will be short lived, however. Upon further examination he will doubtless uncover the fact that the carcass, hide, hoofs, and horns of cattle have been placed on the free list. Doubtless he will suppose when he reads that sheep are dutiable at 10 per cent ad valorem that it was the intention of the Democratic Party to protect the sheep industry. By the same token his gratitude may be expected to be somewhat diminished when he learns that the flesh of the sheep, the skin of the sheep, and the wool of the sheep are admitted free of duty.

Wheat is theoretically protected by a duty of 10 cents a bushel, but bran and screenings are admitted free, as is flour coming from countries which impose no duty upon our flour. Oats are protected by a duty of 10 cents a bushel, but the product of oats—oatmeal and rolled oats—are placed on the free list. Potatoes come in free. Rye and rye flour free. Buckwheat and buckwheat flour free. Milk and cream free. Butter is reduced from 6 to 3 cents per pound. Cheese from 6 cents per pound, an equivalent of 32 per cent ad valorem, to 20 per cent ad valorem. The farmer is alternately lifted to the mount of hope and plunged into the slough of despair. The Democratic Moses leads him to the promised land only to leave him wandering in the wilderness, the prey of his foreign competitors.

Subsection 7 of Paragraph J of the administrative section of the bill provides:

That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States.

Perhaps the theoretical satisfaction of the farmer over the theoretical protection of 10 cents per bushel on wheat will wane somewhat when he discovers that out of every dollar collected on wheat carried in an American registered ship from Port Arthur, Canada, to Buffalo, across the Great Lakes, 5 cents must be paid back to the importer. It is difficult to understand the mental processes that justify a policy of discouraging home industry by inducing foreign competition and encouraging foreign industries by paying them a direct bonus. It is not enough to encourage foreign competition, but we must add to the injustice of the policy by paying a bonus to the importer.

After all, it must be admitted that the price paid to the farmer has but very little to do with the cost of those articles to the consumer. For the wool in a suit of clothes selling at retail at $23 the farmer receives $1.50. For the oats in a 5-pound package of oatmeal costing 25 cents the farmer receives 7 cents. For the pound of steak for which the consumer pays 28 cents the farmer receives 6½ cents. A reduction of 6 cents a bushel in the price of wheat would mean a reduction of three-twentieths of a cent in the cost of a loaf of bread.

In the main foodstuffs to-day are sold in small packages. The size of these packages and the prices at which they are sold have been very largely standardized. Modern business conditions make it impossible that the size of these packages or the price of their contents should fluctuate with the price of the raw materials out of which they are made. Lower prices of the raw material are either absorbed in increased profits or by increased costs of selling in small quantities. On the whole it is probably better both for the consumer and producer if prices can be maintained at a fairly constant level instead of being subject to daily or periodical fluctuation. Under modern conditions of trade, clothes, hats, stockings, shoes—indeed, nearly every article of everyday use—are sold at a standard of quality and at a standard price, which admits of no opportunity to follow the fluctuations of the price of raw material. It is perfectly idle to say that the reduction of the tariff can affect this situation. If reduction in the tariff means a reduction in prices, it means a reduction effected by lowering the standard of wages, of prices, and of living all down the line. The remedy for this situation does not lie in a reduction of the tariff. That remedy consists of better and more economic methods of distribution and arrangements among consumers that will enable them to buy in larger quantities and at the same time lessen the cost of both buying and selling, as well as of delivery.

Paragraph 198 provides for a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat. Paragraph 439 puts bran and screenings on the free list. Paragraph 647 puts wheat flour and semolina on the free list, subject to the following proviso:

647. Wheat flour and semolina: Provided, That wheat flour shall be subject to a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government which imposes a duty on wheat flour imported from the United States.

It is carefully explained by our Democratic friends who desire to allay the well-grounded fears of their farmer constituents, that Canada will not admit our flour free and thereby obtain access to the American market.

No party and no Member of this House has the right to assume that Canada will not take advantage of a provision so evidently written for her especial benefit. If it is not intended that she should do so, the provision should be stricken from the bill. If it is intended that she should take advantage of it, we must expect the natural consequences of her doing so. No party has the right to ignore the facts and conditions to which a law is to be applied and at the same time expect to escape from the results of that disregard.

But the provision would be unfair to the milling industry of the United States even if the duty of 10 per cent on flour were absolute.

The usual computation requires 5 bushels of wheat to make 1 barrel of flour. Ten cents a bushel on $1 wheat is equal to 10 per cent, but on 60-cent wheat it is equal to 16.7 per cent ad valorem. On the other hand, 10 per cent ad valorem on a barrel of flour made from $1 wheat would be 50 cents. On flour made from 60-cent wheat, 30 cents. The duty on the wheat in the flour in both cases remains at the same level—50 cents a barrel. This would mean a disadvantage of 20 cents a barrel against the American miller. This disadvantage would be increased on the higher grades of flour requiring from 5⅝ to 5⅝ bushels of wheat to the barrel. In milling flour the by-product—bran, shorts, and so forth—amounts to 30 per cent of the wheat. As these by-products are admitted free from Canada, the duty on wheat would mean a further disadvantage of 3 cents per bushel or 15 cents per barrel of flour represented by the duty on that part of the wheat which was turned into the by-product.

An examination of the Tuesday quotations of No. 1 hard wheat at Minneapolis and Winnipeg covering the period from September 1, 1909, to August 31, 1911, shows that the average difference in price in favor of the Minneapolis market amounts to 10.4 cents per bushel. Wheat would therefore seem to be sufficiently protected by a duty equivalent to 10 cents a bushel. Wheat is used almost exclusively for making flour, and the high price of wheat is therefore dependent upon the market conditions and the trade facts which surround the marketing of flour.

In the production of wheat and manufacture of flour Canada is our nearest and biggest competitor. She will at once take advantage of the reciprocal provision in the law relative to flour in order to gain access to the tremendous market which our 90,000,000 of people affords. It is a well-known trade fact in the milling industry that in the establishment of a new mill the prime necessity is a market for the by-product of flour, bran, shorts, and so forth. The pending bill furnishes the Canadian miller with that primary market in the United States. With a free market for his by-product the Canadian miller will start out with an advantage of 10 cents a bushel on the wheat in the flour. Since it takes from 4½ to 5 bushels of wheat—in some grades as high as 5½ bushels—to make 1 barrel of flour, this would mean an advantage of from 45 to 55 cents per barrel.

No industry, no efficiency, no business acumen, can overcome this advantage. It is obvious, then, that the miller must make a reduction either in wages or the price of his raw material—probably both. The price of wheat is necessarily in a large degree dependent on the price of flour and its by-products.

Since the price of these commodities is to be fixed by direct competition with the products of other countries where the price of wheat is on a lower level than it is in the United States the price of wheat here must necessarily drop to the same level. Thus the theoretical duty on wheat will be nullified.

It is puerile to argue that the price of this commodity is governed by the law of diminishing returns or fixed at Liverpool in the face of positive evidence of an actual difference in price between this country and Canada of 10 cents per bushel and the admission of that difference evidenced by the imposition of a duty of 10 cents a bushel upon wheat. This bill gives Canada a natural market of 90,000,000 people in exchange for an economically impossible one of 8,000,000 people. No Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Kansas, Missouri, Minnesota, or other United States mills could sell its product in Canada against mills buying their wheat in the lowest-priced primary wheat markets on the North American Continent, because the cost of native wheat to these United States mills would be higher. But even if prices were the same—which is inconceivable because of the greater remoteness of Canadian wheat territory from the seaboard—back-haul freight from the United States to Canadian wheat territory would absolutely prohibit.

There are nearly 12,000 flour mills in this country scattered over 48 States. It is a highly competitive industry. It employs $350,000,000 capital. At the least, it should be entitled to a square deal.

The position of the millers and farmers is by no means unique. They are but two of the many victims of the Democratic policy of ignoring facts. Their situation but emphasizes the general character of the revision. The plan seems to consist of reducing the duties at both ends. If the duty on raw material is reduced, the manufactured product is placed on the free list or, at best, the duty is so much reduced as to give the industry the merest chance of survival.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said that the Democratic revisions of the last Congress were accomplished with blacksmith's tools; the instrument used in the present revision seems to have been an ax. Yet the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has been true to the course he laid out. The consumer has been his first consideration; the industry seems to have been an afterthought. The facts have not been considered at all.

The bill is full of inconsistencies and special benefits.

Under the present law wool, including mohair and the hair of the Angora goat, is dutiable at 11 cents a pound. Under the proposed bill wool is placed on the free list, but the hair of the Angora goat, mohair, and like products are singled out and provided with a special protective duty of 20 per cent and the manufactures of such hair by a duty of 40 and 50 per cent—the highest in the entire wool schedule. I had supposed that the donkey was the especial symbol and mascot of the Democratic Party and was at a loss to understand this sudden solicitude on the part of that party for the Angora goat. It occurred to me that the solution of the problem might be found in the location of the animal. This subsequently proved to be correct, for I found upon examination of statistics that of the 2,900,000 goats in this country 2,350,000, in round numbers, were located in 18 Southern States, and of this number more than a million are in the State in part so ably represented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who recently became a member of the Ways and Means Committee. Of course, it is not possible that the fact that these 18 Southern States are represented by 124 Democrats and only 10 Republicans could have had anything to do with the protection of the Angora goat.

Under the present law photogelatin printed matter is excepted from the operation of paragraph 412 and made dutiable under paragraph 415 at 3 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. The Underwood bill makes the same exception in paragraph 412, but makes no separate provision; so that photogelatin printed matter would be dutiable under that law as printed matter at 15 per cent ad valorem. The paper used in this process is dutiable at 25 per cent, as is also the gelatin. The machines used are also imported and dutiable. As a result Germany can put the finished article into this country cheaper than our own manufacturers can buy the material. A result less disastrous than the wiping out of the industry can hardly be anticipated from this provision.

Burlap cloths—bags and sacks made of burlap—are protected by differentials equivalent to 6 per cent. Under the Underwood bill burlap bags and sacks are dutiable at the same rate as burlap cloth. This puts the American producer of bags and sacks of burlap in direct competition with the burlap bag and sack manufacturers of India, where most of the burlap cloth is made, upon an equal basis, although the American sack manufacturer labors under the disadvantage of a wage scale some 300 per cent higher than that paid in India.

The duty on umbrellas in the bill is lower than that on the parts of which they are made, practically all of which are imported.

We are told that rates in the Underwood bill are competitive in every line of industry. The rates provided in the bill on cotton cloths in the gray—that is, cotton cloth not bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, jacquard figured, or mercerized—run from 7½ to 27½ per cent ad valorem, depending upon the fineness of the yarn in the fabric. It is fair to assume that these duites are competitive.

Cotton cloth bleached, dyed, colored, and so forth, is subject to a duty of 2½ per cent in addition to the duties chargeable on the cloth in the gray. The Tariff Board in its investigation of the cotton schedule found there was no difference in the cost of finishing cotton cloth in this country and in England, the greatest cotton manufacturing country in the world. The board said:

> It will be seen from the table that in the case of most of the samples for which data were obtained for the two countries the American charges were lower. In a few instances the American rates are only about one-half the English; * * * the labor cost of mercerizing cotton fabrics varies from less than 0.08 of 1 cent to less than 0.11 of 1 cent per square yard, while the total cost of mercerizing varies from more than 0.53 of 1 cent to over 0.72 of 1 cent per square yard.

The additional duty of 2½ per cent on finished cotton cloths amounts to one-eighth of 1 cent per yard on cloth costing 5 cents per yard; one-fourth of 1 cent per yard on cloth costing 10 cents per yard; one-half of 1 cent on cloths costing 20 cents per yard; 1 cent on cloths costing 40 cents per yard; these amounts are, in practically every instance, more than the total labor cost per yard involved in finishing the cloths. In some instances they are nearly as much as the total cost of finishing, excluding material.

It must be apparent that if duties on cotton cloths in the gray are competitive, the addition of 2½ per cent on the same cloths finished would make these duties prohibitive in many instances. It is quite significant in this connection that the importation of cotton cloths in the gray have in the past been practically nominal while the importation of finished cotton cloths have been more substantial.

Perhaps the cotton-mill industry of the South is sufficiently protected after all.

The pending bill raises the duty on cotton yarn No. 60 over the rate in the Underwood cotton bill of last year from 15 to 20 per cent. This is one of the greatest increases in the schedule on yarns. Is it altogether a coincidence that the importations of this count of yarn in 1910 were greater than those of any other number, amounting to 1,263,000 pounds? Yarn No. 50, on which the importations in 1910 were 330,773 pounds, has been increased in duty from 10 to 17½ per cent. Duty on cotton yarn No. 40, upon which the importations for the same year were 461,017 pounds, has been increased from 10 to 15 per cent. The duties on yarn No. 68, upon which the importations in 1910 were 767,614 pounds; No. 70, upon which importations were 286,761 pounds; No. 76, upon which the importations were 248,276 pounds; and No. 78, upon which the importations were 907,388 pounds, have been raised from 15 to 20 per cent ad valorem in the proposed bill over the Underwood bill of the last Congress. The duties on yarn No. 100, of which 287,414 pounds were imported in 1910, have been raised from 15 to 25 per cent.

Singularly enough, yarns Nos. 40, 50, 60, and 100 fall into a classification taking a higher rate of duty than under the Underwood bill of the last Congress. In other words, the classification has been so changed as to make these counts of yarns, upon which the importations were quite substantial, fall into a classification taking a relatively higher rate than under the Underwood bill of last year.

Evidently the Democratic Party is not so anxious to induce importations and invite competition in the cotton industry as in the case of farming and other industries.

Yet in almost every line the bill seems to evidence a purpose to cheapen the American market while holding out to the American producer the promise that the product of his labor and genius will not be diminished in value.

It would be neither wise nor kind to indulge in predictions as to the effect of this bill; but if the Democratic Party has kept its promises to the people it will have accomplished the impossible task of reducing the cost of living to the consumer without reducing the price to the producer. It will have transferred $140,000,000 of industry to foreign lands without affecting the prosperity of the American people or reducing the wages of American workmen.

But, after all, the mandate of the American people to the Democratic Party in 1910, and again in 1912, was to revise the tariff downward. You have carried out that mandate. Whether you have done it well or ill the people must finally judge. As Republicans we think you have done it ill, and we shall say so. But as patriotic citizens we shall bear its results and share its burdens as patiently as we may—until a majority of the people shall again decree a change. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, within a twelvemonth there passed away in France a citizen of the world, Frédéric Passy. During his 90 years of life he had seen the inception and growth of a great movement among mankind from which much was expected and little has been realized. Passy was one of the brotherhood who, with Cobden and Bright, believed and taught that free trade would destroy the antagonism between nations. He was also a great advocate of peace, and in his distinguished old age received the Nobel prize. In his lifetime he had seen the passing of the great free-trade statesmen of England; he had seen the passing of the talented professors who made the great universities of England the propaganda of free-trade principles. It was a wonderful propaganda, and carried with it not only the English people, but also many men in other lands who were charmed with the free-trade logic. Perhaps most of the Members in this Hall remember the works of Prof. Sumner, of Yale College. Looking back at those times, the American colleges seemed to be hotbeds of free trade, outvying even the English universities Practical men—men of affairs, men who knew human nature, as the professors could not—were alarmed, and great political battles arose over this subject.

One of the greatest of those battles centered around the political activities of Prof. William L. Wilson, known in political life as a Member of this House, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and author of the so-called Wilson tariff bill. We all know the history of that bill and what it did to the United States of America in the year 1894 and in subsequent years. I will not weary this House by citing testimony. I will call just one witness and rest the case on his portrayal of conditions in the country when the Wilson bill had produced its full measure of calamity. Speaking in Madison Square Garden, in 1896, William Jennings Bryan in succinct language set forth the financial condition of the people of the United States as follows:

A general fall of prices is but another definition for hard times. If the people can not buy, the retailers can not sell; if the retailers can not sell, the wholesale merchants and manufacturers must go into bankruptcy.

ONE OF THE HISTORIC MISSTEPS OF THE GENERATION.

In 1913 another professor comes to the front, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, who again presents the attractive theories of the former Prof. Wilson. Now, I do not wish to criticize personally the President of the United States. We have all been delighted with the dignity and earnestness with which he has undertaken his great task. Prof. Wilson had my sincere respect as a man. President Wilson has my support in those policies which may be well conceived for the happiness of America; but it is my duty, and the duty of every good citizen to warn him of a misstep, and oppose him when he continues in the wrong pathway. No one can doubt that he is a free trader of the old English school, and, like the Prof. Wilson of 1894, he is, for modern America, making one of the historic missteps of the generation. He is putting forward a tariff bill which exaggerates all the faults of the bill of 1894. A great leader of that epoch said of that bill on this floor:

On this side, we believe that while it pretends to be for protection, it does not afford it; and on the other side, they believe that while it looks toward free trade, it does not accomplish it.

A LONG STEP TOWARD FREE TRADE.

I will not waste time in rhetorical discussions about the desirability of the President's purpose to make a smooth pathway for free trade. I will not ask you to consider whether this bill moves "toward this end headlong, with reckless haste." It is evident that the President is moving toward free trade as fast as, in his judgment, is prudent. He is not a protectionist, he wishes to eject protection, but having the instincts of a gentleman he wishes to make the ejection in a courteous manner, because he recognizes that protection "has grown up among us by a long process, and at our own invitation."

"Grown up among us by a long process!" It has lived in our house for 50 years. Three generations have known this ancient guest. The children of our family have no conception of what its absence might mean. Sixteen years ago it was decreed that this old guest should go from under our roof, and the children of that time made their cries heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

"And at our own invitation!" Truly protection came at our own invitation. It came in America's darkest hour, when the great Republic of the west, the hope of the world against absolutism and tyranny, was about to be broken up so far as human eye could see. In that hour a great legislator, Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, and a great war minister who deserves to rank with the Carnot who organized victory, cooperated to feed the armies and the people by a protective tariff, which at the same time filled the Treasury for maintaining the war. If this generation has forgotten this guest who made his abode with us in our youth, those who were in arms against us in that day were aware of his presence. One of the bravest and most talented generals of the Confederacy has left on record his conviction that the government at Washington would not have survived if the protective tariff had not been established.

And now this venerated guest is to be gotten out of our house, not by summary ejection, not "headlong," not by "reckless haste," but by a process of starvation that is more consonant with courtesy and the sensibilities of the neighbors.

THIS POLICY REACTIONARY, NOT PROGRESSIVE.

It is not worth while to debate in this Hall whether the removal of protection is consonant with the progressive aspirations of the American people. I do not know that it would do any good to demonstrate that free trade is a reactionary policy; that all the great and progressive nations except England have abandoned it; that all England's progressive self-governing colonies have abandoned it; that England herself is in the throes of indecision on this question. The President and Congress will heed little the protest of an obscure member of the minority. I will not waste the time of the House on any opinions of my own, but will simply quote the opinion of the scholarship, the wide information, of the judicious reasoning of one of the world's greatest authorities. I refer to the Encyclopedia Britannica. In a masterful article on "Free Trade" the scholars of the University of Cambridge record the following sentences:

Free trade was attractive as an ideal, because it appeared to offer the greatest production of goods to the world as a whole, and the largest share of material goods to each consumer; it is cosmopolitan, and it treats consumption and the interest of the consumer as such as the end to be considered. Hence it is open to objections which are partly political and partly economic. * * *

For Cobden and his contemporaries it was natural to regard the national administrative institutions as maintained for the benefit of the "classes" and without much advantage to the "masses." But in point of fact modern times have shown the existence in democracies of a patriotic sentiment which is both exclusive and aggressive, and the burden of armaments has steadily increased. It was by means of a Civil War that the United States attained to a consciousness of national life; * * *.

It is here that the new patriotism comes into direct conflict with the political principles of free trade as advocated by Bastiat and Cobden; for them the important point was that countries, by becoming dependent upon one another, would be prevented from engaging in hostilities. The new nations are determined that they will not allow other countries to have such control over their economic condition as to be able to exercise a powerful influence on their political life. Each is determined to be the master in his own house and each has rejected free trade because of the cosmopolitanism which it involves. * * *

Since the ninth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica was published it has become clear that the free-trade doctrines of Bastiat and Cobden have not been gaining ground in the world at large, and at the opening of the twentieth century it could hardly be said with confidence that the question was "finally settled" so far as England was concerned. As to whether the interests of Great Britain still demanded that she should continue on the line she adopted in the exceptional conditions of the middle of the nineteenth century, expert opinion was conspicuously divided; but there remained no longer the old enthusiasm for free trade as the harbinger of a Utopia.

NATURE OF WORLD-WIDE COMPETITION.

The watchword of this new administration is competition. It is assumed that the American Nation is getting lazy; that they need an incentive to greater effort. I quote from the address of the President:

The object of the tariff duties henceforth must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

The words of the President deserve to be weighed always, but I wonder if he and the American people realize what that dire world competition is. I once knew an old soldier who served in the Civil War and for many years also in the campaigns of the West. I asked him if a white soldier was the equal of an Indian in a campaign in the Indian country. His answer was, "A white man can compete with an Indian if he is willing to live as the Indian lives." The American people can compete with the markets of the world, perhaps, if they are willing to live as the people of the competitive nations live. It can not be, however, that the Members of this House have pictured to themselves what this competition means. It can not be that they realize the sordid and merciless conditions of modern competition, which inevitably results in leaving out the labor of men and putting the burden upon the shoulders of women and children.

THE NATIONS WHICH USE WOMEN'S LABOR.

Readers of the Century Magazine for February, 1913, noticed an article on Japan's commercial crisis by Mr. James Davenport Whelpley, who has been one of the commercial agents of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and one of the most discerning observers of financial and economic conditions in the country. In this article he shows that in the industries of Japan there are nearly twice as many women as men on the pay rolls of the country, and it is the testimony of all large employers that women are the industrial backbone of the country. The employment of women and children is the secret of the competitive power of the Japanese textile industries. Reduced to percentages, the proportion of wage-earning women in the great industrial nations is given as follows:

Japan, 50 per cent.
Great Britain, 25 per cent.
Germany, 20 per cent.
United States, 14 per cent.

THE TRAGEDY OF COTTON.

That brief table tells the story of modern competitive life. Let us examine a little further the conditions of this strife which we are invited to enter. As we examine, the cry "Cotton is king," so often heard in the Hall of this House, comes to our ears, for about the cotton industry competition rages most fiercely. It was introduced into modern commercial life by a great tragedy. The home of the industry was in India, where a large part of the men, women, and children were engaged in spinning and weaving on household looms, which produced every grade of material, from the coarsest to that of such marvelous fineness that a lady could draw a robe made from it through a finger ring. But England harnessed the steam engine to the natural labor of the women of Lancashire, denied the help of a tariff to India, and took from her the cotton industry. Deprived of their industry, the people of India had to turn to the land, there to lead a life of penury, varied by recurring famines.

England, possessed of this imperial industry, developed it almost beyond the imagination of man, and in the year 1913 she has not only the world-wide cotton market which feeds so many of her people, but also one of the most unique and distressing social problems which ever afflicted a nation. In England proper 500,000 people are cotton operatives, and 65 per cent of that great number are women and children. This great industrial army of 325,000 women and children labor in the mills of England to hold for Great Britain the cotton market of the world.

AMERICA IN THE WORLD COMPETITION.

To-day the greatest competitor of England is the United States. To-morrow it will be Japan. The cotton operatives of America number 370,000 in round numbers, 50 per cent of whom are men, the other 50 per cent women and children. It is manifest, then, that the cotton industry has forced America to put burdens upon the women and children, but not to the same extent as in England. Yet America still holds out in this fierce competition for the ideal of our race, which has always been manly men who make their way in the competitions of the world and womanly women who make the homes of the Nation. It is not necessary to review the cotton industry of Germany and Japan. It is worthy of note, however, that among the operatives of the cotton mills of Japan there are five women for every man, showing that this industry which is commercially most promising is being built up almost entirely by the labor of women. Not only this, in the recent report of the American minister we are informed that the new Japanese factory law provides that no children under 10 years are to be employed, and no children under 15 or women are to be employed more than 12 hours a day. But the provision in regard to children applies only to new help, and children of 10 years may be continued if they are already in the factory. But the Government may extend the working time of women and children to 14 hours for a period of not more than 15 years after this law goes into effect. In the cotton industry, then, it seems that the pleasant prospect of world competition which the President holds out, the prospect of "the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world," means that the women of Japan are to carry on the great competition which she hopes will make her great and powerful. Not only this, but the statesmen of Japan suspend their limitation of the hours of labor for 15 years, in which time those patient drudges are expected to conquer the cotton trade of the Orient for Japan.

THE WOMEN WHO PARTICIPATE IN THIS COMPETITION.

If the statesmen of America have not been awakened, the statesmen of Germany are awake and do know what this modern competition involves. In addition to other textile industries, Germany has a promising cotton industry in Saxony, which is the foremost industrial State in Germany. The recent business crisis has shown the tendency to use female labor in place of male labor wherever possible. Our consul at Dresden reports as follows:

From the statistics of sick funds, it is learned that the employment of female labor is increasing much more rapidly than male, and also much more rapidly, comparatively, than the female population. From 1906 to September, 1910, the number of female workers increased by 24.5 per cent. The great accession of able-bodied female workers in the last few years is remarkable, and is to be attributed to the rise in the cost of living, which causes women to leave household duties for more remunerative work.

The hausfrau of Germany has even anticipated the progressive thought of our President, leader of the Democratic Party, and proposes to abandon her pots and pans and start out to sharpen her wits "by contests with the wits of the rest of the world."

WISDOM OF THE REPUBLICAN ERA.

America has hitherto been protected by the wisdom of the Republican statesmen of the last 50 years. But on Wednesday, when the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Alabama, opened the debate on this bill, he warned this House and the country that that 50-year era is ended, and that we are about to return to the piping times "before the war," when the United States Government borrowed money at 12 per cent interest and all the people dwelt in democratic simplicity. The gentleman from Alabama thinks that this changing of eras is going to be attended by no greater disturbance than the singing of a grasshopper in a deserted field on a midsummer day. The President thinks there may be a little disturbance, some people being so unreasonable as to remain awake during the performance, for the President says in his address:

To some not accustomed to the excitements and responsibilities of greater freedom, our methods may in some respects and at some points seem heroic, but remedies may be heroic and yet be remedies. It is our business to see that they are genuine remedies.

THE SOCIAL REVOLT IN ENGLAND.

I do not know that I ought to obtrude advice when the President and the Democratic Party have decided to change the current era and resuscitate the old era "before the war." But I think, if the President has read faithfully his London Times, he will notice that there are some things which can not be solved on the formulas of "before the war." We have all been amazed at the agitation which is going on among the women of England for political power. It is perhaps the most significant and startling agitation of modern times. That woman, considered, and rightly, the gentler sex, should leave the peace of home and go out to smash windows, burn castles, and mob the dignified cabinet ministers of the most dignified Government in the world demands a serious explanation.

The modern movement for woman suffrage in England dates from 1906, when Christabel Pankhurst and Miss Annie Kenney were fined in Manchester for disturbing a political meeting. This was the first of the suffragette disturbances. I think it will surprise most Members of this House, as it surprised me, to learn that this remarkable movement is to a large extent the product of the world-old cotton industry and the theory of free trade. Annie Kenney was a cotton-mill operative, having begun as a wage earner at 10 years of age, continuing until, with Mrs. Pankhurst in 1906, she started an agitation which is attracting the attention of the world. Annie Kenney gives this account of why she became a suffragette:

I grew up in the midst of women and girls in the works, and I saw the hard lives of the women and children about me. I noticed the great difference made in the treatment of men and women in the factory, differences in conditions, differences in wages, and differences in status. I realized this difference not in the factory alone but in the home. We saw men, women, boys, and girls all working hard during the day in the same hot, stifling factories. Then when work was over I noticed it was the mothers who hurried home, who fetched the children that had been put out to nurse, prepared tea for the husband, did the cleaning, baking, washing, sewing, and nursing. I noticed that when the husband came home his day's work was over; he took his tea and then went to join his friends in the club or in the public house or on the cricket or football field, and I used to ask myself why this was so. Why was the mother the drudge of the family and not the father's companion and equal?

INTOLERABLE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS.

Any man who reads Annie Kenney's justification must be moved by a profound sympathy, whatever his judgment may be of the practicability of this movement to help the hard conditions of women cotton operatives. It must be remembered that the discouraging condition of women's labor in England is not confined to the cotton industry. Indeed, as cotton manufacture might be called the premier industry of Great Britain so it is as well paid if not better than any other industry where either men or women are employed. The average earnings of women in English cotton mills amount, according to a recent Parliamentary inquiry, to $4.32 a week. The women employed in English woolen mills get an average of $3.32 a week. In the shoe factories, according to the latest Parliamentary statistics that I could find, women received $2.78 a week. It may be that in the recent agitation the wages of women in this industry have been somewhat increased.

Whether or not the agitation which Annie Kenney leads is calculated to get more wages for the working women of England is not pertinent to this discussion, for this discussion concerns the immediate effect of this bill and not a social agitation, which must mature, if at all, after many years. The broad question of the condition of the working class in England was portrayed a few months ago by a distinguished churchman, the Dean of St. Paul's in London, Dr. Inge. In an address which dealt in part with the industrial situation, he said:

> They had amassed a population of 46,000,000 on two small islands, while Englishmen were making England the workshop of the world. Great Britain had enjoyed certain accidental advantages of which they had made full use. * * *
> Our coal supply was being exhausted with criminal recklessness, and our labor was no longer very good and was becoming extremely dear. As surely as water found its own level, so surely would the transfer of industries and of wealth to eastern Asia be the necessary sequel to the European labor movement, when they remembered that a Japanese or a Chinaman was content with one-third of the European's wages and did considerable more work in the time. * * *
> In England the conditions were ideally unfavorable for those who hoped to see a dense population with high wages and short hours. Our soil would not support them. When we ceased to outwork and undersell other nations the working classes must emigrate or starve.

The working people of England must compete, emigrate, or starve. The people of other countries take refuge on the land and, by protective laws, ameliorate the grinding competition. The cotton operatives of England must meet all comers, because their product must be sold in every land under the sun. They must sell in China, where the women cotton operatives of Japan are trying to take the Chinese market by working more than 12 hours a day and running the factories day and night.

SHALL AMERICA ENTER UPON THIS DIREFUL COMPETITION?

The establishment of Christianity in the Roman Empire marked a revolution in the status of women in the then known world. The interests of working women were protected by the enactment of regulations concerning the industries of spinning and dyeing. But in the world competition upon which free trade has embarked England, probably irrevocably, that old, humane Roman usage is observed only in favored countries. The new age which is dawning upon us has many advantages over other ages, and we sometimes look back with contempt upon the rude virtues of other times. In the days of chivalry, however, woman was given a high place in the admiration of men, and feats of arms were performed in her presence and for her favor. In Ivanhoe Sir Walter Scott thus describes a memorable tournament in which the gentle knights of that time contended in order that they might receive distinction at her hands:

> Thus ended the memorable field of Ashby de la Zouche, one of the most gallantly contested tournaments of that age; for although only 4 knights, including one who was smothered in the heat of his armor, had died upon the field, yet upward of 30 were desperately wounded, 4 or 5 of whom never recovered. Several more were disabled for life, and those who escaped best carried the marks of the conflict to the grave with them. Hence, it is always mentioned in the old records as "the gentle and joyous passage of arms of Ashby."

We may not think that "gentle and joyous" is an accurate description of the competition in which Ivanhoe figured, but what are we to think of that world tournament competition which the President and the Democratic Party invite the American people to enter, in which woman is not to be a spectator of the feats of man but a sharer in the conflict, in order that Americans may "whet their wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world"?

ANTIQUE THEORIES IN A MODERN WORLD.

When the world-wide competition in the cotton industry is so tragically evident, it seems impossible for a thoughtful man to take the view of the Democratic Party. Democratic orators reproach this industry in America because the operatives are not so well paid as those in other American industries. They seem to forget the frightful world competition and the low freight rates which make the world to its uttermost parts one great market. Since the doctrine of free trade was upheld by Cobden in England and Robert J. Walker in America, ocean transportation has been revolutionized.

In 1850, four years after Robert J. Walker enunciated his theory of tariff for revenue, the fine steamer Persia carried a cargo across the Atlantic at an expenditure of 14,500 pounds of coal to a ton of freight. Thirty years ago, when the great fall of ocean rates took place, a cube of coal small enough to pass through a ring the size of a quarter of a dollar would drive a ton of cargo 2 miles. To say that improvements in ocean transportation, supplemented by the electric telegraph, have made the world one-half smaller, so far as the economics of tariff are concerned, is to make a conservative statement.

DEMOCRATIC LOGIC.

In a light commodity, like woven cotton, ocean freight rates are a negligible quantity, and therefore the cotton workers of America stand on the industrial frontier. They have a little line of protection, created by a protective tariff, and the Democratic orators reproached them for that, forsooth, and said in a great campaign that their wages are much lower than the wages of the masons who build brick houses. Of course the builders of brick houses need no protection, because brick houses are not subject to ocean transportation. But the bricklayers are nevertheless interested in this question, because if the textile industries of America are crippled all will suffer from the consequent congestion of the labor market.

Do you know how many textile workers there are in the United States belonging to the three branches of the industry? There are about 650,000, 380,000 of whom are in the cotton industry. The woolen industry employs about 170,000 and the silk industry about 100,000. It may surprise you perhaps to know that America leads in the silk industry. The number of women and children in the cotton industry is 190,000, in wool 82,000, and in silk 66,000. Because of the world-wide competition and the cheapness of ocean transportation the cotton workers are the frontiersmen of the industrial situation. They receive the first shock of foreign competition. They must work as hard and live on less than their fellow citizens, and the Democratic orators make this their reproach.

PROTECTION'S FRONTIER.

Was this the sort of treatment accorded by our forefathers to those frontiersmen who extended the line of civilization and protected the older society? Did they not rather consider the hardships of those who stood between them and the savage? Perhaps they were laborious and rough men, perhaps the women engaged in men's work, sometimes even to the extent of cooperating with the men in war against the Indians, as many women of Maine did in the early days. Was this made a matter of reproach? Everyone knew that they were dealing with an inferior civilization, and the more peaceful communities extended a helping hand. They sent rangers to help menaced communities, thereby establishing a system of public protection, and the peaceful communities gladly taxed themselves to succor their fellow citizens, well knowing that this was not really a tax because it would return tenfold in security and civilization.

Is it worth while for us to continue the textile industries, the industrial frontiers of our civilization? Other great progressive nations think it is worth while. They think that they should supply their own cotton, woolen, and silk clothing, and every nation but England has, by protective tariffs, helped out against competition, and England would do it in a moment if she could.

To show how far England is willing to go, even under its present free-trade government, to foster and protect its great cotton industry, I will call your attention to the resolution introduced into Parliament within a few days by Mr. Lloyd-George, the chancellor of the exchequer, which asked for the appropriation of $15,000,000 to develop the cultivation of cotton along the banks of the Nile in order that the English manufacturers might be independent of America for their supply of cotton.

HOW PROTECTION MAINTAINS CIVILIZATION.

At this point there are some very interesting facts relating to the textile industries in the United States as compared to competing nations. As has been noted above, the cotton workers of England are relatively well paid. The woolen weavers receive less, the shoe workers still less; but turning to the United States we find that the cotton worker, because of the inordinate competition of the world, is probably the least paid of American laborers, while the woolen worker, the silk worker, and the shoe worker, especially among female operatives, is far better paid than anywhere else in the world.

The evidence that this is due to protection is overwhelming. It is due to the tariff on wool and on silks, and when this bill gives free trade in shoes and opens the American market to the underpaid labor of Europe and to the shoe manufacturers of other lands, who have been building up the industry until now it is in a condition to enter into competition with the industry here, it will be found that the high wages of shoe workers have also been due to protection. So it is demonstrated beyond question that protection helps even the hard-pressed cotton operative appreciably, the woolen operative more substantially, silk and shoe operatives still more.

MALE AND FEMALE WORKERS IN AMERICA.

America is a new country; it is absolved from any of the European conditions, especially that of the employment of women in the industries. We wish to preserve that condition as much as lies within our power. The recent census shows that the use of female labor in the manufacturing industries of America has been decreasing during the last 10 years. This table is so illuminating from the standpoint of advancing civilization that I venture to summarize it here:

Per cent of average number of wage earners.

While the employment of women has not increased in the United States in the last decade, it is probably increasing very rapidly in England, at least in the cotton industry. From 1835 to 1901 the increase of females over 13 years of age has been from 47.9 per cent to 61.1 per cent. There is relatively the same percentage of male operatives through those years. The great advance in England has been through legislation eliminating child labor. Females over 13 years old have taken the place of younger children. But in American industries generally the increase of men is noticeable.

I know a silk mill in this country which competes with the silk mills of Japan, where the women weavers receive the same wage as the men when they do the same work. This new tariff will be a serious blow to that industry, and if it survives after this bill becomes a law its activities will be seriously crippled. How long will this American condition of equality last when that mill must compete with weavers in Japan who receive wages on an oriental basis?

DEMOCRATIC POLICY FOUNDED ON MISCONCEPTION.

The other day I read in a popular magazine an article on the prevailing social unrest, by a western writer, evidently a well-meaning man. I was attracted by a phrase in which he spoke of the New England manufacturers as among the most selfish of mankind. It reminded me of a speech made in the United States Senate by the late Senator Frye, of Maine, in which he spoke of a certain school of political thought which had "a holy horror" of "New England capitalists," of "thieving manufacturers." This was on February 10, 1882, 31 years ago. Consider also that within this 31 years the period of 1894 had intervened, and in that period the circumambient air had been vexed by denunciations, not of the mill owners of New England alone, but also an equal denunciation of the mill owners of the industrial part of America which have followed the example of New England. Thus it is proved by history that from the recent article of the western editor for over 31 years back the manufacturer has had a bad reputation among some people. Now if that is so, why has this enlightened America tolerated these men? Is not that a phenomenon worthy of examination? If such respectable men as magazine writers set their faces against the manufacturers, many other people may be prejudiced. No rank in life will be free from a share in this prejudice. All manufacturers, in and out of New England, will be discredited. It may be that some high officials participate in this prejudice and unwittingly do great injustice to the manufacturers, and to those earnest, hard-working people who are dependent upon the manufacturers for their livelihood.

IMPORTERS AGAINST MANUFACTURERS.

Now, when any man or class of men is ill-spoken of by a number of people, that ill-speaking creates what we term a prejudice. Whole communities are sometimes prejudiced, rightly or wrongly. The young man starting out in life and encountering these prejudices either believes them or becomes mystified by the apparent contradiction between the bad reputation and the attractive personality of the victim of the prejudice. The older man, especially if he has had some experience in business or politics, knows that all men are not fair-minded, that sometimes they assist in raising prejudices against other men simply because those other men have, or are trying to get, some good thing which the circulator of prejudices wishes for himself.

Have you ever thought that it may be that in this tariff situation there is a great good thing which two rival bodies of men are trying to get, viz, the supplying of certain commodities to the American people. One of these bodies of men goes to foreign lands, brings the commodities of those lands to America, and sells them to her people in the great department stores and importing houses of large cities. Those merchants evidently wish the importation of foreign goods to be as large as possible. Their business is legitimate, and I make no complaint of them as individuals.

The other body is the American manufacturers, who desire to sell as much as possible of the commodities produced by the American people in New England and elsewhere and want to discourage as much as possible the domestic use of the manufactures of foreigners.

THE QUESTION NOT TO BE SETTLED ON BASIS OF PREJUDICE.

Why should the individuals of the second body of men be hounded in the public prints and on this floor with every sort of insinuation and charge? Is the manufacturer the most oppressive of mankind and the merchant who sells manufactures a philanthropist? Do not merchants obtain large profits? Do not merchants employ thousands of clerks in the great cities who receive a wage that is as beggarly as that received by some operatives? Why should the manufacturer bear the entire burden of the hardships of the age, when no individual can remove it entirely? A great party in this Hall are putting through a bill which will cause the manufacturing of the American people to be turned over to the women textile workers of England, Germany, and Japan. No wonder that those who are responsible for this legislation wish to distract attention from what they propose to do by denunciation of some one. In this debate this Hall has resounded with denunciations of the high dividends made by manufacturers—dividends which upon analysis are usually found to be grossly overstated, as were the fabulous dividends of the cotton industry two years ago.

Why is so much stress put upon this? Does not conspicuous success advance one man or corporation beyond its fellows? Have there not been wonderful successes in commercial business? But the rank and file of business contents itself with moderate returns. The opponents of protection know this very well. Then, why do they vex the atmosphere of this Hall with stock denunciation worn out by 50 years of service? Perhaps their motive may be suggested by a story which Plutarch records:

> Alcibiades had a dog which cost him 70 minas and was a very large one and very handsome. His tail, which was his principal ornament, he caused to be cut off, and his acquaintances exclaiming at him for it, and telling him that all Athens was sorry for the dog and cried out upon him for this action, he laughed and said, "Just what I wished has happened, then. I wished the Athenians to talk about this that they might not say something worse of me."

TWO GREAT CAMPS.

Those two bodies of men, the importers and the manufacturers, have diametrically opposite interests, and where that is the case, human nature being as it is, prejudices arise, and the contestants not only become imbued with those prejudices, but they imbue other people—their neighbors and business associates. In this rivalry between the importer and the manufacturer it is manifest that both sides will have their own partisans, seek publicity for their ideas, and try to mold public sentiment.

And public sentiment is a tremendous element in such a rivalry. Long ago, when the earth was younger than it is to-day, there was an enterprising man named Philip of Macedon. He was King of a little country known as Macedonia, and a few years later, through the genius of his son, Macedonia conquered the world. But in Philip's time Macedonia had many enemies, one especially redoubtable, Athens, the center of culture in that Old World. And Philip of Macedon in the rivalries of that time felt that he was constantly at a disadvantage, because in his poor, rude country there was no one to celebrate his deeds of valor, and he expressed the wish that he might possess Athens in order that he might have her classic poets and orators to make illustrious his virtues and his victories.

Probably Philip did not mean that these orators and poets should make him illustrious corruptly or by duress, but rather he hoped to get their esteem and friendship through association and mutual understanding—through acquaintanceship at the club, at the church, and in society.

Now, in this great conflict between the importer and the manufacturer the manufacturer is somewhat in the position of Philip of Macedon. He is confined to his manufactory in small villages or mill towns, as is the case in my own State. He goes to the great cities at infrequent periods. He does not become acquainted with the great life of the metropolis. He does not know the men who mold public opinion, especially the editors and business managers of the great metropolitan newspapers and magazines.

On this point the importer has a distinct advantage. He mingles constantly in the life of the metropolis, he impresses his views at the clubs, and undoubtedly in the newspapers, not corruptly, but through identity of interests. It is strange, then, that any metropolitan journal should take any other than the importer's side, and the fact that some great metropolitan journals do take the side of the manufacturers is a tribute either to their open-mindedness or is due to the fact that their particular city has enough manufacturing to counterbalance the influence of the importing classes.

Do not these considerations, then, explain the prejudice which has arisen against manufacturers? It is quite generally supposed that the millionaires of America are largely manufacturers who have grown inordinately wealthy through tariff favors. I do not deny that manufacturing is a profitable form of occupation. It is an axiom in the world that manufacturing nations grow wealthy faster than other nations. This was evident more than a hundred and fifty years ago, when Lord Chesterfield, in writing to his son at Berlin, impressed upon the youth the fact that Prussia was too poor to make an effective English ally; that while she possessed many brave men, she had not the wealth proceeding from manufactures which was needed to equip armies. But while manufacturers create wealth for others, they do not necessarily amass great wealth individually. I was greatly surprised not long ago to run across in the New York World Almanac a table of American multimillionaire families. I supposed that they were manufacturing families, the products of the tariff, particularly of Schedule K.

It appears that multimillionaires of America are largely bankers, railroad men, real estate owners, and those who have handled and distributed the products of manufacture, farm products, and the spoils of our natural resources. But there is not a single cotton, woolen, or silk manufacturer among them. It has been found that the surpassing wealth of the few manufacturers has come, not by the manufacture alone, but by the financing of bankers. It is noticeable that two of these multimillionaire families of America come from a single firm which has had wonderful success in Chicago—I mean the Marshall Field Co.; they were not manufacturers, but distributors and importers of manufactures.

FREE TRADE IN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

This world-wide competition to which the President and the Democratic Party wish to commit this country makes no exception of classes except in some favored cases. The wheat farmer of the Northwest has protection, but the potato farmer must exist under absolute free trade. Consider for a moment the condition of a potato farmer who has for years raised his crop for the New York market. Year in and year out he probably does not realize 30 or 35 cents a bushel, for the freight rates on a bushel of potatoes sometimes amount to 15 or 20 cents if the farmer is as far away from New York as Maine or Ohio.

Now, to what sort of competition does this bill subject the potato farmer? To the competition of all the world, including the great potato-raising regions of Germany. The freight on a bushel of potatoes from Hamburg, Germany, to New York City is 9 cents, so that Germany as a market is nearer than the greater part of the eastern country which is tributary to New York City. European wages for day labor are very small for both men and women. It is probable that 50 cents for a man and 30 cents for a woman would be a fair compensation for work in the potato fields. I can not give the exact figures, because the work on which I was obliged to rely, German Life in Town and Country, was published in 1901, when wages were lower, men getting 36 cents and women 24. But under the protective policy of Germany wages have increased. Moreover, the treatment of the female farm laborers has probably greatly improved. The authority which I have already cited records this incident, which, in 1901, was said to have occurred "several years ago":

> Upon a manorial estate in West Prussia some 40 Polish women are employed. These people could no longer bear their terrible ill usage, for they were treated like cattle, and they resolved to seek release in flight, which they did by taking the night train to Berlin. No sooner, however, was their flight discovered on the estate than word of it was sent to the police there, with the result that two police wagons were in waiting for the party at the station on their arrival, and in these they were placed and conveyed to prison.

Yet there is no doubt that the competition of the underpaid men and women in the potato fields of Germany will at once become a serious factor in the farm life of America, when we remember that the American farmer has been forced to pay a wage which in Europe would be considered princely.

SCIENTIFIC PROTECTION.

I do not believe that many Members of this House wish inordinate protection. I for one cooperated gladly with my Republican associates in proposing a tariff commission. When this fateful bill shall have run its brief course, another House of Representatives will frame a bill on scientific and humane principles, which will be indorsed by the American people for years to come.

The great question which is before us in this Hall to-day is how best to conserve the old ideals of America. Tariff contentions are supposed to be largely devoted to questions of wealth, and that is necessary in this age, when wealth properly distributed uplifts mankind. But before it is possible to distribute wealth, conditions must be right for the production of wealth. After all, however, the great question has not to do with wealth but the well-being and advancement of the men, women, and children who live in this America to-day. On this side we uphold the principles of the glorious era which has done so much in the last 50 years, and with confidence await the outcome.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am not entitled to yield to anybody just now. I understand the gentleman from Alabama was to yield to some one at this time.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Alabama was to yield to me after the gentleman from Minnesota concluded.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARLIN). The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, with the exception of a brief period during the last 50 years the Republican Party has been in charge of the Federal Government. The American people having become dissatisfied with the manner in which that party conducted the business of the Government, have retired Republicanism, and turned over the administration of governmental affairs to the Democratic Party.

The exorbitant and prohibitory rates of tariff taxation, the increased cost of living, the willful and well-nigh criminal extravagance in the expenditure of the public funds, the granting of subsidies and privileges to favorites, and the utter incompetency and general mismanagement of the Republican administration were the determining factors in the struggle for political supremacy at the polls last year.

The Democratic Party promised to reform this abuse of governmental authority and to reduce the outrageous and prohibitive rates of a protective tariff, which had increased the cost of living, destroyed all legitimate competition, and permitted the development and growth of gigantic trusts and commercial combines.

For nearly half a century the protective system of taxation has been forced upon the country. Through the operation of law the commercial, industrial, and agricultural interests of the United States have been made to suffer from the baneful effects of Republican protection. The resources of the country have been shamefully exploited. The taxing power has been used to develop private business and to increase private profit. It has been freely bartered and exchanged for campaign contributions. It has been used to stifle competition and to strangle legitimate industry. Efficiency in equipment and skill in labor are no longer the tests by which the success of a great commercial enterprise is determined.

The Democratic Party promised to reform these abuses, to divorce that partnership existing under Republican control between the Government on the one hand and a few tariff-swollen manufacturing industries on the other—a partnership sanctioned by law, which, as Carlyle once said, "compels all the people to furnish the capital and allows its favorites to receive the profits."

We promised to give relief from the shameful system of spoliation by taxation which marked the conduct of the Republican administration. The American people took us at our word and placed us in control of every branch of the Federal Government.

Thus commissioned, we have assembled in extra session to carry out our pledges and to redeem our promises.

It is no easy task which confronts the Democratic Congress to-day. The commercial interests which for years have been so subsidized by tariff benefits that they now look upon these privileges and favors as vested rights in resentful and indignant crowds have besieged the Committee on Ways and Means. All the beneficiaries of protection were present. The steel interests, the lumber interests, the coal interests, the cotton manufacturer, the manufacturer of woolen goods, of glass and earthenware, hatters, makers of boots and shoes, accompanied by skilled lobbyists, represented by able lawyers, all were there. The great interests and the small interests presented their side of the case to the Committee on Ways and Means, who gave them a long and patient hearing in every instance. Every beneficiary of this tax was represented. But the consumer upon whose shoulders the burden of these taxes fall was not there. There was no one present to represent him before the committee. Protection giving benefits and bounties and subsidies to its favorites has always had powerful friends to champion its cause, parade its virtues, extol its worth, magnify its merits, cover up its imperfections, defend its iniquities, and protect its injustices, as all systems have powerful friends when those friends themselves are directly benefited.

While on the other hand, any policy or system like a tariff for revenue only, which protects no special interest, appeals to no one man's individual gain, though benefiting the economic situation of the country as an entirety, is lacking in the militant championship and enthusiastic support personal interest lends and private profit actuates.

The policy of the Republican Party has been to permit the friends of protection to write into law the tariff rates for the benefit of themselves, and though the American consumer was not present at these hearings before the committee, begging for relief from outrageous, unjust, and prohibitive taxation, yet the committee and the Democratic Party looked after his interests. We have presented to the American people a tariff bill which is the redemption of our pledge, being an honest and careful revision downward of the outrageous, exorbitant, confiscating, and prohibitive rates now in operation in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we have treated our friends on the other side of this Chamber with the utmost fairness. During the passage of the Payne law we were permitted to offer only seven amendments. At the end of this discussion those opposed to this bill will have ample opportunity to amend by substitution or otherwise every schedule in this bill. We are going to and we have given them ample time to debate the different items in the measure, but we are going to pass this bill without any Republican protective amendments attached thereto.

Before discussing the bill itself, I ask your indulgence for a few moments while I briefly discuss a proposition I have in recent years heard stated so often—that is that the tariff question is a local issue.

The tariff is not a local issue. There is perhaps no greater line of demarcation, no clearer distinction between the diverging lines of thought of the two great political parties than their respective views upon this very question.

Those who really regard the tariff question as merely a local issue have been deceived by observing that, as a rule, those receiving the benefits of this artificial stimulant are generally the most enthusiastic in their advocacy of the system, and as these benefits often apply to the entire protected interests of a community, the questions of locality and sectionalism are suggested.

Local influences can change men's ideas, transform their beliefs, and mold their opinions, but principles themselves are unchangeable, fixed, immovable, and eternal.

A proper understanding of these diverging views leads to no perplexity and frees the question absolutely from all suggestion of localism.

The issue between the two great political parties on the tariff is distinct and well defined. Each of these parties represents ideas which are inherently and fundamentally antagonistic, opposing, and hostile. Both parties declare for certain duties to be levied upon the importation of certain articles which are produced or manufactured in foreign countries. The distinction lies not in the way these duties are collected, nor in the purpose for which they are to be used after collection, but in the purpose, the object, and the intent which governs the levying of these duties. The purpose, the object, and the intent of a Republican in levying a tariff rate is to secure protection to home industry.

The purpose, the object, and the intent of a Democrat in levying a tariff rate is to secure revenue to carry on the expense of the Government.

To the one revenue is merely an incident; to the other protection is merely an incident.

A protective tariff rate is levied for the purpose of keeping out importations, of stifling competition, of building up home industries, and benefiting private enterprise, while a revenue tariff rate, to be effective, depends upon the encouragement of competition so that importations may be brought into the country in order that the duties upon these importations may be collected and turned into the Public Treasury.

The Democratic theory of a tariff being that no dollar shall be collected by taxation for purposes other than revenue, there are only two problems confronting the framer of a Democratic tariff bill: First, how much money is needed to meet the necessary expenses of the Government economically administered, and, second, how can we best raise this money by levying duties in such a manner that it will prove least burdensome to the American people.

That is the true theory of a Democratic tariff, and if the present bill in any instance should fail to measure to that standard it is because the Baltimore platform declared for a gradual reduction in these duties.

Some may ask, Why was it necessary for the Democratic platform to declare for a gradual reduction in these duties? The answer is plain. During the forty-odd years of Republican misrule and Republican mismanagement protection has run mad.

The protective theory has been so fostered, the business of the country has been so artificially stimulated, this unhealthy and unnatural system of taxation has grown to such an enormous extent, its ramifications have so affected the commercial life of so many of our citizens, that evil as it is, harmful as it has been, this unwholesome and artificial stimulant can not all be withdrawn at one time without causing perhaps serious business disturbances.

But though we have felled the tree of protection, trunk and branches, let no protectionist gather hope because we may have left a few of the roots in the ground. I say to you on the other side of this Chamber, they will never sprout again. They are as dead and as lifeless as the prospects and the hopes of the Republican Party.

Protection has been given a fair trial by the American people, and after years of experience it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

In absolute control of every department of the Government, flushed with the intoxication of victory after victory, drunk with the exercise of an almost despotic power, enriched by the spoils of over 40 years of Federal patronage, strengthened by the enormous subsidies and bounties given to its favorites, with plausible tongue and seductive arguments, the advocates of protection after nearly half a century of trial have vainly attempted to justify its guilty existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Based upon love of personal gain, founded upon selfishness and opportunity, dependent upon favoritism and expediency, this hateful system of privilege, with its subsidies, its benefits, its advantages, and its favorites, has left behind the lasting memory of a corrupted and coerced ballot and an endless chain of perpetual lobbyists. Its insiduous and indirect method of taxation is responsible for the wildest form of governmental extravagance. It has developed the trust, which, stretching its hungry tentacles far and near, has annihilated, crushed, and destroyed all who dared to cross its noxious path.

It has led to an aristocracy of wealth and power, and in the mad scramble for favoritism and preferment has leveled national legislation to the dignity of a bargain counter.

It has become hateful to the American people, and on last November, long to be remembered by all lovers of just and equal taxation, this harbinger of woe and want and misery and dissatisfaction was buried beneath an avalanche of ballots, never more to be resurrected. [Applause of the Democratic side.]

In briefly discussing the present tariff bill I shall to a large extent confine my remarks to Schedule K. Perhaps no schedule in any tariff bill has created more discussion and aroused more controversy than the one pertaining to wool and the manufactures of wool.

It was the storm center of interest in the Wilson bill. It occupied the chief place in controversial discussion in the Payne-Aldrich bill. In the present measure, not even excepting the schedule on sugar nor the provision relating to the income tax, wool still occupies the stage, playing the chief part in the drama of tariff legislation.

There is sound reason why the schedule relating to wool should arouse so much controversy. The tariff on raw wool has well been called the arch of protection. It has long been the connecting link which binds together the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the United States to the doctrine of protection.

Those favoring and those opposing protection know that when this link has been severed there will be no further excuse for the agricultural interests to cling to a protective-tariff system. The manufacturing interests well know this, and knowing this, they are more than willing to see a tax go on their raw material and take their chances in securing a proper compensatory duty, because they can not afford to lose the political support of the great agricultural interests, which in many instances has been accorded them through a mistaken idea that the tax on raw wool compensates the farmer for the millions of dollars wrung from his pockets every year by the plundering hand of a tariff.

Removing raw wool from the dutiable list has long been a Democratic principle. As far back as 1857 all wool valued at less than 20 cents a pound came in free. The Morrison bill, the Springer bill, the Mills bill, and the Wilson bill all placed wool on the free list, and following Democratic precedent and Democratic principle, we have placed raw wool upon the free list in the present bill.

Removing the duty from raw wool means that the price of necessary articles of woolen clothing will be reduced, because we can then remove from the manufactured article the compensatory duty which has been given the American manufacturer to place him on equal terms with his foreign competitors in the purchase of his raw materials.

As long as there is a tax on raw wool, while other countries allow wool to enter free, this tax is a distinct handicap to American manufacturers, and it is manifest that without a compensatory duty our manufacturers, hampered to the extent of this tax, can not compete with foreign manufacturers in the purchase of the raw material to be used in the making of the finished article.

To place American manufacturers upon an equality with foreign manufacturers in the purchase of their materials it has been the settled policy of all political parties in the interest of fairness to give our manufacturers a compensatory tax equal to the amount of the tax on the raw material.

If we impose a tax of 11 cents a pound on raw wool and England permits wool to enter free, then the English manufacturer, other conditions being equal, can buy his wool 11 cents a pound cheaper than the American manufacturer. Therefore it has been the practice that when raw wool is taxed our manufacturers have been given a compensatory duty equal to the amount of this tax, so that both the home and foreign manufacturers will be on equal terms in the purchase of their raw materials.

The compensatory tax must then be added to the cost of the finished article, which goes into the price paid by the consumer.

Under the present system of taxation not only the compensatory tax is given the American manufacturer, but in addition thereto outrageous and enormous prohibitive duties are given the woolen manufacturers, all of which is added to the price paid by the consumer, except perhaps in some instances where the tariff rate is so ridiculously high that it amounts to more than the value of the article itself.

We have placed raw wool upon the free list Now, in order for the consumer to receive the benefit of the removal of this tax on raw wool, the compensatory tax given the American manufacturer to place him on equal terms with his foreign competitors must also be removed.

After placing the American manufacturer in a position where he can buy his raw material under similar conditions with his foreign competitors and removing the compensatory duty given him, the question now confronts us as to how high a rate should be levied upon the finished product.

We would like to remove the tax from all articles of necessity and in common use, but unfortunately it is only on those articles that the people want that revenue can be collected, because if the people do not want them there will be no demand for their importation and no duties to collect. We need revenue to carry on the expenses of this Government. Wool is a good revenue producer. The manufactures of wool bring in over $16,000,000 annually. Now, how shall we raise revenue for the Government and give the people cheaper clothing at the same time? What rate shall we place upon this woolen clothing? We place this tax at what we believe to be the lowest competitive rate, so that foreign clothing may be imported and competition created. By placing this tax at the lowest competitive rate great importations of clothing, blankets, underwear, dress goods, and other woolen articles will be brought into this country to engage in active and healthy competition with the clothing from American mills. Millions of dollars will go into the Public Treasury, and through the competition created by these importations the American people will receive the benefit of cheaper clothing, for if the American manufacturer does not reduce the price of his woolen articles to that of his foreign competitor the consumer will buy from the foreigner.

Not only will the removal of this tax on raw wool result in cheaper clothing to the consumer, but it will result in better clothing; and more durable articles of woolen manufacture will be offered to the American people. We now tax raw wool 11 cents a pound. This tax of 11 cents a pound on raw wool has resulted in keeping from the American market much of the finest wool. The wool from Odessa, from Morocco, from Australia, and other places differs in quality, in value, and in weight. There are any number of grades of wool. The greater part of foreign fine shrinkage wool never finds its way into the United States by reason of a tax of 11 cents a pound on the raw wool. The removal of this tax, however, will bring it in, and our manufacturers can have the benefit of the selection of these finer grades, and better and more durable clothing will be offered to the American people.

As the removal of this tax will cause greatly increased importations of wool, then the output of our factories would also correspondingly be increased. The increased output would mean an additional demand for labor, and by reason of this demand employment would be given to hundreds who, under a prohibitive tariff rate, were idle and vainly seeking work.

"But," says the protectionist, "are you going to destroy the great sheep industry of the United States?" No, my friends; we are not here to destroy the sheep industry or any other industry; but, on the other hand, we are not here to build up the sheep industry or any other industry by taxing the American people for their benefit. The removal of this tax from raw wool will not destroy the sheep industry of the United States; on the contrary, it will prove a benefit to this industry, and before I am through I will demonstrate that this is so.

But before I proceed to demonstrate this I assert that under the Democratic theory of taxation no industry—the sheep industry or any other industry—is entitled to a share of the taxes paid by the American people. I have heard many wax eloquent when they tell us that it is not fair to the owner of the sheep to take the tax off of wool and leave a tax on clothing made from wool. Why is it not fair? Why is the man who owns sheep any more entitled to the tax money than the man who owns hogs? I deny that the woolgrower by matter of right is entitled to the benefit of a tax. Why he more than any other citizen of the United States?

According to the Republican idea of a tax, that it is a blessing to be given some favored individual—a cheap way of giving subsidies in return for campaign contributions and support during election time—then the argument that because there is a tax on clothing made from wool there should also be a tax given the man who raises the wool is consistent.

But the Democrats do not believe in that kind of taxation. They believe that taxes are not a blessing, but a burden. They believe that it is wrong to levy taxes for the purpose of paying campaign debts. They do not believe in levying taxes so that certain industries may be insured a profit in their private business. They do not believe because one article is taxed that that is a reason why some other article should be taxed. The Democratic theory of taxation is that taxes should be levied solely and alone for the purpose of raising revenue to meet the necessary expenses of the Government.

The taxing for revenue of a suit of clothes composed, as many of them now are, partly of wool and partly of cotton, is no more the concern of the man who raises the wool than it is of the man who raises the cotton. This tax is levied for the purpose of raising revenue and not for the benefit of the man who raised the wool nor the man who raised the cotton nor the man who made the clothes. The manufacturer is no more entitled to this tax than those who contributed the materials which went into the article he produced. If any protection results and the manufacturer happens to be benefited, why the protection that he receives is incidental, because the purpose of levying this tax is to raise money to carry on the expense of the Government.

What peculiar right has been given to the sheep barons, with their thousands of acres and millions of sheep, that all the people should be taxed to increase the value of their flocks? Why is the man who owns a large ranch with countless sheep roaming all over it any more entitled to a benefit and a privilege from the Government than the man behind the plow, the clerk in the store, the blacksmith at his forge, and thousands of others who toil but who never dream of asking the Government to insure their business a profit by the donation of tax money?

The aggrieved attitude and the indignant protests of those who for years have been receiving these governmental favors, when they see that these favors are to be removed from them, marks one of the glaring evils of the protective-tariff system. Looking for favors destroys self-reliance and does away with commercial independence.

I would rather, Mr. Chairman, that the American people should have warmer clothing to protect them from the chilling blasts of winter.

I would rather that the children of the toiling masses should have woolen underwear to keep sickness and cold from their little bodies than to place these necessary articles above their reach in order to insure, through the operation of law, an added profit to a few woolgrowers, who graze their flocks in the wild and undeveloped lands of the great and golden West.

But the removal of this tax will not destroy the sheep industry in the United States. It is the tax that is more harmful to practical sheep husbandry than perhaps any other one cause.

It is well known that the owners of small flocks of sheep get little or no increase in the price of their wool by reason of the tax of 11 cents a pound, because the price of wool is controlled by the great packers and wool merchants, and the owners of the small flocks have to sell to them at a price fixed by these packers. The trust controls the wool industry, as it does so many industries in the United States. Now, the wool owners of the West, with their millions of sheep, do perhaps get an increased price for their wool by reason of the tax, but there are only a few of these wool barons, as they have frequently been called, and the reason that they get the increased price is because of the agreement that exists between them and the manufacturing interests, and they are also closely related to the wool-buying packers, and for the further reason that because of the great amount of wool they have on hand they can afford to hold it and put it upon the market in such a way and at such a time as to secure this advanced price. But it is ridiculous to contend that the farmer with a flock of from 50 to 100 sheep gets any material part of this tax levied on raw wool.

To those who have given little study to this question it would appear, from the great number of protests against reducing the rate on raw wool, and especially against putting it on the free list, that wool is the foremost of our agricultural products. The amount of space the subject of wool occupies in the bibliographies on manufacturing textiles and on agriculture gives further color to this belief. But such is far from being true.

The total value of the raw wool produced in the United States in 1911 amounted to $66,591,017, while the corn crop amounted to $1,565,258,000. The hay crop amounted to $694,570,000. The wheat crop amounted to $543,063,000. The oat crop amounted to $414,663,000, and the cotton crop, based on the year 1910, amounted to $820,320,000; making a total of $4,037,874,000.10 in cotton, corn, wheat, hay, and oats as against only $65,591,017 in wool. As compared with other agricultural products wool is not one-tenth so much in value as cotton; not one twenty-third so much in value as corn; not one-fifth so much as oats; not one-eighth so much as wheat; not one-tenth so much as hay; not one-third so much as potatoes; not one-half so much as barley.

Why is it, then, that the bibliographies of agriculture and manufacturing textiles devote so much space to this subject? It is because there is an agreement I mentioned a few moments ago—an understanding between the woolgrowers on the one hand and the manufacturers on the other. The sheep barons will stand for the tax on the finished article if the wool manufacturer will stand for the tax on raw wool, and they have combined their interests and their strength. Why should the manufacturer want a tax on the material he needs to finish his product? There is not a manufacturer in the United States who would not prefer having his raw material free. There is hardly a woolen manufacturer in this country who is not vexed and hampered by this 11 cents tax on the material he needs to make his cloth and his clothing. Then why is this agreement? Why is the manufacturer willing to pay more for his material and to take his chances on getting the proper compensatory duty on the raw product?

Because the manufacturer knows that when wool is placed upon the free list the last connecting link between a tax on agricultural products and a tax on manufactured articles has been destroyed. Destroying this link means an abandonment of the protective system by the agricultural interests of the United States. If you deny the woolgrowing interests a tax of 11 cents a pound on raw wool, these same interests are going to use their best endeavors to prevent the manufacturer from receiving a prohibitive rate on the clothing they themselves have to buy; but as long as the sheep-raising barons are receiving a protective tariff of 11 cents per pound on raw wool they are more than willing for the manufacturer to receive all the protection he can secure upon the finished article.

So the manufacturing interests know that if the sheep industry is removed from politics the protective system will then have to depend solely for support upon the manufacturing industries which are receiving these benefits. When the agricultural interests find that they are no longer connected with protection through the medium of a tax on wool, those interests, those farmers who in 1911 raised $4,037,874,000 worth of cotton, corn, wheat, oats, hay, barley, and potatoes; who were taxed and forced to pay exorbitant and unreasonable prices for all woolen clothing that they had to buy, in order to insure an added profit, which in many instances never reached the producer of wool, the value of which was not one-sixtieth of the amount of the value of the seven products I have just referred to, the protective system will become hateful to them. The farmer will of all others be more opposed to a theory of governmental taxation which permits him to sell his products in the open markets of the world, but yet compels him to pay a tax on everything he buys for the comfort of his family and for the carrying on of his business.

The highest protective tariff on wool in the history of the Republic, during the last 10 years, has not prevented a decline and falling off of over 11,000,000 sheep.

Yet during the same period, with the exception of cattle, there has been an increase in all other farm animals. We have a tax of only about 10 per cent on hogs, and since 1903 the number of hogs in the United States has increased from 46,922,624 to 65,620,000. The tax on horses and mules is nothing like so high an ad valorem equivalent as the rate on wool, yet notwithstanding the great number of automobiles and horseless vehicles, now so much in use in social and commercial life, since 1903 horses increased from 16,557,373 to 20,508,000 in 1912, and mules have increased during the same time from 2,728,088 to 4,362,000.

Yet when we come to the sheep industry, we find that with a tax of over 15 per cent on the animal itself and a tax of 11 cents per pound on wool in the grease and 33 cents per pound on scoured wool, that notwithstanding all this enormous protection the number of sheep in the United States has decreased from 63,964,876 in 1903 to 52,362,000 in 1912, a decrease of over eleven and a half million sheep. In less than 10 years, under the highest protective tariff in the world, the sheep industry of the United States shows a falling off of nearly 12,000,000 sheep, while during the same period of time, with less than one-fifth and in many instances less than one-tenth the amount of protection given the sheep and its wool combined, the value of all farm animals shows an increase from $3,102,515,540 to $5,276,438,000, a total increase in the value of farm animals of over $2,000,000,000. And yet we are told that if we take the tax off of wool that the sheep industry in the United States will be destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that one of the greatest handicaps to the proper development and growth of the sheep industry in the United States is the political influences which surround that industry. We do not raise cattle for their hides; we raise them for their beef. The hides are a by-product. We ought to raise sheep for the mutton that is in them and let wool be the by-product. There is always a demand at high price for mutton and lamb chops. We ought to raise sheep for their mutton, but instead of that we have been raising sheep for their wool and mutton has been the by-product. The sheep industry in this country is not upon a proper basis.

Instead of improving the breed, like is done in the raising of hogs and other farm animals, instead of improving the breed, slaughtering the young males, and supplying at high price the ever-increasing demand for roast lamb and mutton chops, the sheep growers, devoting all their attention to the production of wool, have not made progress in the sheep industry.

As long as wool is the prime object in sheep raising the industry in the United States will languish, because sheep can not profitably be raised for wool by reason of enhanced values of real estate, except in certain lands of the West.

The merino sheep produces a large amount of wool, but is not a mutton sheep. Yet by reason of the fact that merinos are the only breed of sheep which will closely herd together the woolgrower of the West, paying absolutely no attention to the mutton value of the animal, persists in raising only those breeds which have one-half or more mixture of merino blood in them because of the increased amount of wool, and also because of the expense in herding and loss by strays which characterize breeds of sheep other than the merino.

This tax on wool keeps the sheep industry in politics all the time. It prevents the selection and improvement of the breeds of sheep necessary to make that industry a success.

But remove this industry from the unnatural political atmosphere which surrounds it and sheep, like hogs and other animals, can be profitably raised in the United States without all the people contributing a subsidy to keep up an industry the tax has helped to destroy.

The enhanced value of our lands can be put to more profitable use in other directions than in raising large flocks of sheep for their wool. The proof of this is strikingly shown in New England, where land values are high, and conclusively proves that woolgrowing is a frontier proposition. From 1840 to 1910 the number of sheep in New England have decreased from 3,820,000 to 300,000. In the Middle Atlantic States, where land values also are high, during the same period the number of sheep has decreased from 7,106,000 to 1,263,000 in 1910, while, on the other hand, Wyoming, Montana, Utah, Idaho, and other Western States, where land values are low, and in which the country is practically unsettled, the territory of the sheep industry has shifted, for in those States the number of sheep has increased from 380,000 in 1850 to 18,338,000 in 1910.

In the State of Texas, where a number of ranches have been divided up in farms since the passage of the Dingley Act, there has been a decrease in the number of sheep from 2,520,068 to 1,400,000. A falling off of nearly 1,200,000 sheep since the passage of the Dingley law. At an average value of $5 per head this would appear to be a loss to the State of Texas of about $7,000,000, but the value of the cotton crop in that time has increased from 1,471,242 bales in 1899 to 3,072,932 bales in 1910, an increase of 1,601,690 bales of cotton, valued, including the seed, at $50 per bale, which has added to the wealth of the State of Texas in the value of its cotton about $80,000,000. Texas may have lost $7,000,000 in the falling off in the number of sheep since the passage of the Dingley bill, but since 1899, corn, some of which was grown on lands formerly used to graze sheep, has increased from 81,151,398 bushels in 1899 to 140,080,000 bushels in 1910, which at the low rate of 30 cents a bushel would add over $15,000,000 in wealth to the State.

While sheep showed a falling off of about 50 per cent since 1898, when the Wilson bill was repealed, removing wool from the free list and placing a high protective tariff on this product, yet the value of the live stock in Texas increased from $240,576,955 in 1900 to $318,646,509 in 1910, an increase of nearly $80,000,000. Texas may have lost $7,000,000 in the sheep industry in the last 10 or 12 years, but the value of farm property has increased in that State since 1910 from $962,476,273 to $2,218,645,164, an increase in that one item of over 178 times the amount lost in sheep. What are you going to do with this tremendously increased value in farm property? Turn some of it back into sheep and cattle pastures? Are you going to lose a part of the benefit of all these values, amounting to considerably over a billion dollars, to make up for $7,000,000 lost in sheep? I simply mentioned the State of Texas because it is typical of all other sections of the United States, where the value of farm property has so increased that it is impossible to raise sheep profitably for their wool, with mutton as the by-product.

Mr. Chairman, with the aid of hothouses and artificial heat we could raise coffee in New England and tea in Pennsylvania, but it would be the sheerest folly for us to attempt to compete with Brazil or with Japan and China in raising these commodities. Such industries could never be fostered in the United States if we were to erect around those hothouses a tariff wall mountain high. So, like sensible people, we turn our attention to those things that we can profitably raise at home, and with some of the money realized we buy our coffee from Brazil and our tea from China and Japan. As long as the American farmer is realizing $20 or $30 an acre on cabbages or corn or cotton or wheat or strawberries or in any other product, he is not going to abandon that field of productiveness and turn his fertile acres into a sheep pasture, if you were to give him a tariff rate on wool as high as the gallows upon which Haman was hanged.

Certain lands in Australia and elsewhere are by nature adapted to the raising of sheep and are not suitable for other agriculture. We can not compete with them in raising wool, but in many parts of our country sheep can be profitably raised for mutton. The merino is not a good mutton sheep but a good wool sheep, and the wool barons of the West for this reason and also because of the gregarious qualities of that breed have continued to direct their attention to these kind of sheep, paying no attention to the selection of their flocks, for the purpose of raising mutton, which will always command a high price in the market because of an ever-increasing demand.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that placing raw wool on the free list benefits every class and condition of our people, even including the woolgrower.

It will result in giving clothing and blankets and underwear and other woolen articles at a greatly decreased price to the American people.

It removes the discrimination against the American manufacturer in the purchase of his raw materials.

It relieves us of the necessity of giving the American manufacturer a compensatory duty equal to the tax on his raw material.

It prevents this compensatory tax from being added to the price of necessary articles of woolen clothing.

It permits us to cut down the rates on the finished product equal to the duty on the raw material.

It furnishes better grades of wool to American manufacturers, and the people can buy more durable clothing.

It increases the output of our mills, so that more employment will be given to American labor.

It takes away from the rank of the protectionists the last link which connects them with the agricultural interests.

It will direct the attention of the American farmer to a profitable industry, the raising of sheep for mutton, with wool as a by-product.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill not only was the compensatory tax added to the price of the finished product in woolens, but an outrageous, and in many instances a prohibitive, duty was placed upon these articles.

Take, for instance, blankets, flannels, and underwear. Under the Payne-Aldrich bill blankets came in bearing a duty of from 72½ per cent to nearly 75 per cent, while flannels for underwear bore a tax of from 93 per cent to over 100 per cent. We have reduced the rates on these highly necessary articles down to 25 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, when we find that the tax on flannels for underwear was over 100 per cent, we should not have been surprised when it was discovered that in the examination of the 120 children who were among the thousands working in the woolen mills at Lawrence that only 7 of these children were able to secure underwear at all. And yet, by a strange irony of circumstances, they were working on the manufacture of those very articles they themselves were unable to buy.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. COLLIER. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman might add, speaking a babel of 16 different tongues and dialects, and not 10 per cent of them were Americans and the sons and daughters of Americans.

Mr. COLLIER. Still, they were suffering for the want of those articles which by reason of a prohibitive tax they were unable to buy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is a peculiar pathos connected with those who want in the midst of plenty. There is nothing more pathetic than the hungry watching others eat. This sorrowful condition was emphasized in the lives of those children in the factories at Lawrence who helped to make woolen clothing for others, but yet, by reason of a protective and prohibitive tax, were unable to own even one of the little garments they were making.

Cinderella clad in rags, sitting in the kitchen, forced to work upon the gorgeous and resplendent costumes of her older sisters, caused our youthful breasts to throb with indignation and resentment. That beautiful story has touched the heart of childhood whenever it has been told.

But there has been no fairy godmother with magic wand to assist those tired, shivering, hungry, half-clad children working in the woolen mills at Lawrence.

Shut out from God's sunshine, behind the dark, damp, moldy walls of a huge factory, those children, who never had the time to learn how to play, who had forgotten how to laugh, with cavernous eyes and solemn, pallid faces, breathing dust and ashes, choking on the foul odors of wool and grease and new-made cloth mixed with chemical compounds, dying by inches from neglect and exposure, these children of our poor dedicated their puny little bodies to the spindle and the loom. [Applause.]

In that severe New England winter, forced by stern necessity to wear their young lives away, making warm, comfortable woolens for others, which they themselves were unable to buy, the prohibitive rate of 100 per cent in Schedule K hangs like a millstone around the necks of those, who enriching themselves by the operation of law, placed the price of these articles above the reach of those children whose labor and sweat and blood and toil had helped them to amass their wealth. [Applause.]

We have tried to lessen these burdens. We have tried to lighten the load bearing down on the shoulders of the poor, the weak, and the oppressed. We have reduced these prohibitive rates to a healthy competitive basis, so that these articles may be placed within the reach of all.

We have reduced the rates on ready-made clothing from 80 per cent to 35 per cent. It is upon this class of clothing that the consumer will be especially benefited. The reducing of this rate will cause millions of dollars of importations to be brought into the United States. The price of this clothing will be materially reduced to the American people. There will be a keen and healthy competition established between our manufacturers and foreign makers of this clothing, and the American manufacturers in order to meet this competition must reduce the price of their clothing to that of the foreign manufacturers. If not, the consumer will purchase from the foreigner, for he will have an opportunity to buy clothing where he can get it the cheapest.

Mr. Chairman, we have presented in this bill an honest revision of Schedule K, a schedule which in the Payne-Aldrich bill was practically without defense and with but few defenders, even among the ranks of the protectionists. With prohibitive rates in most of its classifications the schedule relating to wool became a law, only to be denounced by a Republican President as indefensible.

We have taken care, Mr. Chairman, of the great agricultural interests of our people. Despite the attempt of those on the other side to make it appear that we have discriminated against the farmer, this tariff bill will give him more relief from the exorbitant and confiscating system of taxation now in operation in the United States than perhaps any other class of our people. For years the American farmer has been selling the fruits of his labor and his toil in the open markets of the world without any protective tax to insure his business a profit, and at the same time everything he buys for himself and his family has paid a heavy tribute to the tariff.

This bill removes the tax from agricultural implements. We have given the farmer free plows, free harrows, free harvesters, free reapers, free planters, free mowers, free cultivators, free thrashing machines, free gin stands, free wagons, free carts, free harness, free saddles, free trace chains, free bagging and ties, free binding twine, free nails, free barbed-wire fencing, free sewing machines, free needles, and free fertilizers of all kinds.

We have given to the toiling masses free meat, free bread, free coffee, free salt, free flour, free meal, and free boots, and free shoes.

We have reduced the rate on knives from 53.77 per cent down to 30 per cent. We have reduced the rates on all tinware from 45 per cent to 25 per cent. We have taken the rate of 35 per cent off of furniture and reduced it to 15 per cent. On india rubber manufactures we have reduced the rate from 35 per cent down to 10 per cent. We have reduced the rate from 35 cents a gallon on castor oil down to 15 cents a gallon. We have taken the tax of over 45 per cent off of window glass and reduced it to 28.20 per cent. We have reduced the rate on shirts and collars from 64.03 per cent down to 25 per cent.

We have reduced the rates on plates and dishes and cups and saucers and all kinds of earthenware in common use from 25 per cent down to 15 per cent. We have reduced the rate on cotton clothing from over 50 per cent to 30 per cent. On the cheapest stocking hose and half hose from 50 per cent down to 20 per cent.

On cotton underwear, so necessary during the summer months, we have reduced the Payne rate from 60 per cent to 30 per cent. On all oilcloths we have reduced the protective rate of over 45 per cent down to 15 per cent.

We have put mechanical ground wood pulp on the free list. Our cheap paper used for book and periodicals is composed chiefly of mechanical ground wood pulp. Over 80 per cent of the ingredients in this kind of paper is composed of this pulp. We, therefore, gave it free, so that newspapers and periodicals and magazines and schoolbooks will be placed in the reach of all.

We have carried out in this bill the Democratic theory of taxation—that the luxuries shall bear the highest rates of duty, and all articles of necessity and common use are either placed upon the free list or else the rates are materially reduced.

We have placed the great basic materials, such as coal, lumber, and iron ore, upon the free list. Coal is a commodity which is not given to us by the ingenuity of man, but by the goodness of God. It lies in the bosom of Mother Earth, placed for us by the beneficent hand of the Creator, waiting to be carried to the furnaces of the factories and to the homes of thousands. It is an article in common use; it should never be taxed for the profit of those who have succeeded in corralling all the coal lands in the United States. It is so connected with the commercial and private life of so many of our citizens that an unnatural increase in its price would cause the wheels of industry to be stopped and create suffering and distress throughout the land.

Lumber is another commodity that comes to us not through man's skill, but also by and through the goodness of God. It is needed by every class and condition of our people. The man in the city needs it to build his home. The farmer needs it to build his barns, his fences, and his stables. We need it to build schoolhouses and churches. The Democrats have always stood for free lumber. Our party does not believe that the taxgatherer should ever stand between an American citizen and the building of a home for his family, a schoolhouse for his children, or a church for his God. [Applause.]

The Steel Trust owns nearly all the iron ore in the United States. We put this ore upon the free list, so that the independent manufactories could buy their ore to be put into finished articles on equal terms with the trust. The increased importations of iron ore mean that the American people can secure cheaper articles made of steel. It enabled us to give the farmer his agricultural implements free of duty. By reason of the increased importations there will be greater output from American mills, which necessarily means increased employment to American labor.

We have given the American people an income tax. After listening to the splendid address upon the subject of this tax by my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], this morning, I shall not go into the details of this provision other than to say that for years the American people have been longing for a tax where the wealth of the country will pay its proportionate share of the burdens of government. [Applause.] Under our protective tariff the taxes are collected upon what we eat and upon what we wear, irrespective either of ability to pay or protection received from the Government. The poor man with a large family pays more Federal taxes than the rich man with a small family. Under the present system colossal fortunes have been built up and gigantic trusts have been created, which do not in many instances pay one cent of the revenue necessary to meet the expenses of a Government under whose laws these fortunes were amassed and these trusts established.

Under existing law the man in the factory working for scarcely living wages, the farmer toiling all day, the miner who goes down into the earth to drag therefrom the precious metals to be used in commerce and in trade, the clerk behind the counter, the blacksmith at his forge, the artisan at his bench, the shop girl in the store, each and every one paying a tax upon the food that they eat and the clothes that they wear, often contribute more to the expenses of the Government than the man worth millions, and who is constantly calling upon the Government to protect his property and to insure his business against loss.

We have placed the nominal rate of 1 per cent per annum upon all incomes over $4,000. When this income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $50,000 an additional tax of 1 per cent shall be levied, and where the total net income exceeds $50,000, but does not exceed $100,000, 2 per cent additional shall be levied, and when the net income exceeds $100,000, 3 per cent additional shall be added.

This income includes all gains, profits, and incomes derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services of every kind, or from sales of property, or for rents, interest, and dividends. There shall be allowed as deductions the actual expenses of the business, all interest paid on indebtedness, all county, State, and municipal taxes, losses actually sustained, incurred in trade, or caused by the act of God and are not compensated by insurance, and a reasonable allowance for the wear and tear of property, but no deductions shall be made for personal living or family expenses, or for any improvements intended to increase the value of an estate.

But as I stated before, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] has this morning gone into this matter with such detail that I shall not detain you further upon this subject.

We have redeemed our promise and given the American people an honest tariff bill with an honest revision downward.

The dismal prophecies of ruin and disaster coming with tiresome monotony from the other side for over two years are now falling upon deaf ears. The Democratic Party was never stronger in the history of the Republic than it is to-day. Like a sentinel upon a watch tower the Democratic Party, founded upon principles of truth as eternal and as everlasting as the hills of our native land, has witnessed the wreck and decay of many political parties whose glittering generalities captured for a while the popular fancy of the people of the United States. But whenever the country was in trouble, whenever panics and financial disaster fell upon the land, whenever the burdens grew heavy upon the tired shoulders of the toiling masses, the sober judgment and good common sense of the American people would return, and, going back to the faith of the fathers, they would repudiate the false doctrines and relegate their promoters to the background of political oblivion and cling to Democracy as the only safe and sure anchor in time of trouble.

For over 100 years Democracy has been either in control of the affairs of our Government or else the dominant minority party, warning the American people against false idols and false gods, and the history of the Republic shows that, without a single exception, sooner or later, the sound sense of our people heeds the warning.

Founded upon the eternal principles of constitutional government, honest and fair taxation, and equal rights for all and special privileges to none, Democracy has stood the test of time, and will endure as long as love of liberty finds lodgment in the human breast.

When these principles of Democracy shall perish, then, but not till then, will popular government be destroyed and our country be known no more among the nations of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, the Dingley law had been in operation but a brief period before the American people began to make demand for its revision and relief from its exorbitant exactions. So persistent and universal did this demand become that both the political parties in the campaign of 1908 made response, and the people felt assured of some relief from the excessive burdens of tariff taxes. There was no dispute as to the position of the Democratic Party. It was a straightforward declaration for a downward revision of the tariff, and the Republican platform simply promised revision, leaving to the members of that party an interpretation as to whether that revision was to be upward or downward. The people demanded an explanation of that platform, and the Republican candidate for President was compelled to give his party platform official interpretation. As the temporary leader of his party, he declared that if his party was given the mandate of power it would perform its promises in good faith, and that that promise was a substantial revision downward. Upon that interpretation of the platform and the promise of its candidate for President, the people intrusted the revision of the tariff to the Republican Party; and, faithful to its established custom of forgetting the pledges made to the people before an election, the representatives of that party returned to their seats of power, and the friends of the tariff again revised it in the interests of its beneficiaries. To the promises of revision downward of the Dingley law, the answer was the Payne law; to the demand for relief, the answer was additional burdens; to the cry for lower taxes, the reply was higher contributions; to the appeal for the reduction of the cost of the necessities of life was the assurance that higher prices would bring added prosperity and happiness; to the appeal that the poor were unable to stand greater burdens was the reply that our Nation would continue to prosper and that this prosperity in some way would diffuse itself among all the people, with its blessings of happiness and contentment.

The Payne law, taken item by item upon the same importations, showed an increase of the average rates of 1.071 per cent. A statement showing the facts in detail was prepared under the direction of Mr. PAYNE's committee and was never disputed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman to figure that out in some way. I challenge him to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DIXON. Yes. I will say that statement was shown by the report that was filed by the Ways and Means Committee, of which the honorable gentleman was chairman. It was in the hands of all the Members of Congress, showing that upon the same importations the average rate was 1.71 per cent larger.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that a member of the Committee on Ways and Means is inexcusable for making such a statement as that to-day.

Mr. DIXON. May I ask the gentleman a question? Did not his committee file a report showing the importations of that year under that rate and under the new rate?

Mr. PAYNE. It did.

Mr. DIXON. And those added together showed that the average rate upon the same importations was in excess of 1 per cent and a fraction over——

Mr. PAYNE. It did not, and the statistics the gentleman's committee present to-day show that the statement is utterly unfounded and false.

Mr. DIXON. I will bring to the gentleman a statement prepared by the gentleman's own committee and the clerks of his own committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. And I will bring those prepared by your committee within two weeks.

Mr. DIXON. I am not asking the gentleman to take the report of the Democratic committee. I am only asking him to take the report of his own committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. And I am asking him to take what he has solemnly admitted, showing that his statement is entirely without foundation to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIXON. The papers—the documents—are public property and can be verified by anyone who will investigate.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know; there are some gentlemen who do not understand them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention—the gentleman from New York, of course, knows the rule——

Mr. DIXON. I am sorry I did not have those statements with me, made up by the gentleman's own committee.

Mr. PAYNE. So am I.

Mr. DIXON. To the protests of the people of the repudiation of its promises, the Republicans claimed that it was a substantial compliance with the promises and the proof consisted of the alleged fact that of the 2,024 items in the Dingley Act nearly 220 were increased, 1,150 were unchanged, and 654 were reduced. These figures constitute the argument and proof, yet they disclosed the fact that of over two-thirds of the items, as counted by the President, there was no reduction downward. An investigation and analysis of the items increased and lowered disclosed that the reductions were so small as to make it hardly perceptible; in fact, the total reduction in 4 of the 14 schedules taken together were less than 1 per cent. As an instance we find sugar was reduced four one-thousandths of 1 per cent, and it was necessary to buy 100 pounds of sugar to get the benefit of a nickel, while, as a matter of fact, the ordinary purchases are for a smaller amount, and this reduction could not be handed out to the consumers. The ordinary consumption was 80 pounds a year for each individual, and the result that it would require a year and a quarter of consumption of sugar to secure the benefit of the 5-cents reduction, if secured at all. Our reduction is substantial, and it would require several thousand years to secure the total reduction under the Payne law that we have given in one year.

The duty on lard was reduced one-half of a cent a pound; in 1912 we collected $66.45, and this is a reduction of $22.15—and if this was distributed among our total population, who can say that it would have contributed largely to the reduction of the cost of living?

They reduced the tariff on corn meal 5 per cent, and last year we collected $24.91 upon the importations, thereby saving the whole American people together a couple of dollars, and these are parts of the substantial reductions; but these tariff duties were absurd, the importations trivial. We export corn and corn meal and lard, and their values exported runs into the millions of dollars, and we have placed them on the free list.

They reduced the duty on agriculture implements from 20 to 15 per cent, but the manufacturers of agriculture implements have not only been able to supply our home market but to sell abroad nearly one-fourth of the amount manufactured, and we placed them on the free list. These instances could be cited in large numbers, but the ones here mentioned are indicative of the character of the large class of other reductions.

At the first opportunity the people had to resent the conduct of their Representatives in the passage of the Payne bill there was a change in the House from a Republican majority to a Democratic majority and at their next opportunity they transferred the control of the Government into the hands of the Democratic Party. In the last Congress the Democrats sought by a number of tariff bills to redeem their promises made to the people, but these bills were either unacted upon by the Republican Senate or vetoed by the Republican President.

In less than two months after our return to power the Underwood bill has been submitted to the House of Representatives for its consideration and action. Trace Republican legislation from its beginning and there has been no measure of relief to the people ever enacted by that party that covers so large a benefit as the pending Underwood bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The effect of the protective tariff is to distribute unfairly the rewards of labor, prevent its natural diffusion, and concentrate it in the hands of a few people. It is a tax levied by the Government on all the people for the benefit of the favored few. The Government, deriving so much of its revenue by means of the tariff, will give in a measure protection on the articles thus selected and to this extent these advantages will ever be given to the American manufacturers. The tariff originally adopted was for the purpose of encouraging infant industries; it was never intended to make the people forever contribute toward their support. It was not originally established or justified in order to shield the American manufacturer from the world's entire competition in trade and to deprive the American consumers forever of the benefits of the world's market, but it was intended to encourage the American manufacturer to embark in competition with the world in trade and production, and to give him the advantage of a moderate tariff, so he could equip himself to compete with the world. The idea of partitioning off the American people as forever excluded from the benefits of the world's market and doomed to be victims by legal compulsion of protection prices and protected trade only is a modern curse that looks to the Republican Party for perpetuation and fellowship. In obtaining foreign trade the United States manufacturer must always meet the world's competition, as well as legislative barriers beyond this jurisdiction, and could expect but a reasonable profit. His chief aim and richest harvest is the market of the United States, the widest and largest of the world, and the only one over which he could obtain dominion by law. It is this market that is the object of his chief concern.

The domestic consumption and interstate commerce of the United States is twenty times as great in volume and value as our foreign trade has ever been. Our home market is twenty times as profitable to the manufacturers of the United States as our foreign trade, at its utmost figures. Competition and legislative barriers must ever be met by the American manufacturer in his foreign trade; his home market will forever remain in great excess of the foreign trade and if he can only remain the master by law of the American markets, free from the foreign competition and at liberty to fix his own price for his wares, he can levy his extortions on the people as he wills, and swell his fortunes as he chooses. We are told that our policy will reduce the wages of our workingmen, and force them out of employment. Our tariff shields the manufacturer from foreign competition, but it does not lessen competition among those whom he employes to make his goods. Its object has been, "not the protection of the seller of labor, but the protection of the buyer of labor; not the maintaining of wages, but the maintaining of profits." Men ask protection for labor in public, but in their business buy the cheapest that can be secured. Investigations that have been made at different times into the industrial condition of the country shows that the people for whom we have taxed the American people for the protection of their industries employ the very foreign labor against whose products they seek protection. Wages in the protected industries are as a rule lower than in the unprotected industries, yet they tell us that if the tariff rates are reduced the wages of their employees must be reduced also. Labor wants competition that reduces the cost of living. "He has competition in his labor in what he has to sell, he has a right to ask that there may be competition in what he has to buy."

It is true our laborers receive larger wages per day, and they ought to; they are the most efficient laborers in the world. The actual price of labor is the amount of the necessities of life you can buy with those wages. The laborer does not work for the sole sake of employment, but to supply the needs and comforts of his home. What he wants is the highest return for this labor. His prosperity is measured by what is left after the necessary supplies for his home is purchased. If his wages are increased but the necessities of life are increased more rapidly, then he is poorer, though, in fact, his wages may be larger. Wages have increased in the last 10 years about 20 per cent; the cost of the necessities of life have increased over 50 per cent. The Underwood bill will not reduce the wages of labor, but it will lessen to him the cost of the necessities of life. Upon no class of our people does the present fiscal burden bear as heavily as it does on our farmers. We boast of the great wealth of our country; the farmers created that wealth. They are the basis of the prosperity of our country. Agriculture is the oldest and most important of all industries, and our progress is measured by its development and advancement. In the prosperity of the farmer is involved and dependent the happiness and prosperity of all classes. Bountiful harvest to the farmers brings prosperity to all classes and diffuses its blessings among all the people. Failure to him brings want and misery to all. The Nation prospers when the farmers prosper, and the results are felt throughout the world. He asks no special favors from the Government and has received none. The favors shown to the special interests by high-protective laws have been to the detriment of the farmer, and upon his back have rested most heavily those unjust burdens of tariff taxation. He asks for a fair deal, and from Republicans he has asked in vain. We propose to do justice to this large class of citizens who have made this country the envy and pride of the world. Upon the farmer rests the burden of feeding and clothing the world, and the Republican policy has taken from him by tariff taxation a very large part of the profits of his labor. We are told of the great increase in our national wealth under protection. This country is so situated and has such immense resources that its development and increase of wealth would be wonderful under any kind of tariff laws. We have fertile soil, inexhaustible mines of hidden wealth, and the most intelligent people on the globe. Prosperity is not produced by law. Prosperity comes through natural processes; it is not handed out by Congress. It comes by industry, fertility of the soil, and the intelligence of our people combined. Our country, with its broad and fertile plains, vast mines of mineral wealth, and enormous resources will be prosperous and progressive.

We have immense wealth, and last year it amounted to nearly $178,000,000,000, yet 70 per cent of it was owned by 200,000 people, and the other 30 per cent was owned by the remaining 95,211,000 people of the country. Five thousand men in this country actually own one-sixth of our entire national wealth, leaving the balance to be divided among the remaining 95,406,000 people. The tariff has contributed more than all other things combined to produce this unequal distribution of wealth—stimulating, supporting, and producing trusts. These advantages are given by law. It is the duty of our party to change the system by which the money is taken by law from the man who earns it and given to the man who has not earned it. Greed, avarice, and selfishness should not be the basis upon which men should ask some special benefit from the Government. Our policy of government should be to encourage the individual to his best effort, not a policy that stifles competition and destroys peaceful rivalry. We are opposed to a policy that will guarantee profits to some individuals at the expense of others. No individual can be given a right that does not belong to him, except by taking from some man a right that does belong to him. The system that allows these wrongs we will change.

The Statistical Abstract, published by the Government, shows that the value of the finished product of all the manufacturing industries of the United States for 1910 is $20,672,051,870. The amount paid in wages in said year in the production of said manufactured articles was $3,427,037,884, which gives the total labor cost for all of the said articles as 16 per cent, while the tariff rates are from 30 to 100 per cent on said articles. In other words, the tariff rates cover the entire labor cost. It not only covers whatever alleged difference exists between the labor cost in this country and in foreign countries, but it also covers the entire labor cost and then gives a profit many times the cost of labor.

The first schedule is that of chemicals. The average rate under the existing law is 25.91 per cent. We reduced it to 19.64 per cent, a reduction of $6.27 upon each $100 worth imported. Who will be injured by this reduction? They will tell us the laboring man. The protection left of 19.64 per cent is more than the entire labor cost; it not only covers an alleged difference in cost at home and abroad, but it covers the entire labor cost.

The next schedule is earths, earthenware, and glassware. The average duty under the present law is 50.92 per cent, and the pending bill reduces this to 33.17 per cent, a total reduction of 17.75 per cent. This estimate is based upon the estimated importations, but based upon the same importations of 1912 the average rate would be about 37.97 per cent, a reduction of 12.95 per cent.

The items in this schedule that are used by the manufacturer in his business are reduced 50 per cent in order to allow him to purchase his raw material cheaper, where we have reduced the duties upon his finished products. The high-priced and necessary fire bricks used in the construction of the furnaces in the iron and steel and glass industries have been greatly reduced and to the injury of no one but to the benefit of all. The clays and earths used in the paper, pottery, and tile industries have been reduced 50 per cent, as their finished products have been reduced. Earthenware and china have been separated, in order that the wares used by the many could be purchased cheaper and those regarded as luxuries carried at much higher rates. Window glass has been reduced, as some of the rates were over 100 per cent, and practically no glazing glass has been imported for years. The rates have been in the past so adjusted as to allow no competition. Plate glass has been greatly reduced. There has never been any competition in this glass used for glazing purposes.

The manufacturers of iron and steel produced in 1910 $1,277,151,817 worth of finished products and paid in wages for the manufactures $187,807,288, or 13.63 per cent of the value of the finished product. In 1905 the wages represented 15 per cent of the value of the finished product. These articles were given by the Payne bill protection of more than twice the entire labor cost. In 1912 the average for this schedule was 34.42 per cent. The pending bill will average a rate of 20.19 per cent and will cover the labor cost, and any attempt to convince the laboring men that their wages must be reduced on account of the passage of the Underwood bill will be unfounded and only made in order to arouse prejudice against the measure.

We have not changed the liquor schedule and but slightly the tobacco schedule, because we believe that the people who use the articles mentioned in these schedules could afford to pay the duties levied on them. They were both good revenue producers and should be classed as luxuries rather than necessities. The people are compelled to buy the necessities of life, and for this reason we have sought to reduce the duties upon them in order to make them cheaper.

The cotton manufacturers turned out in 1910 $628,391,813 worth of manufactured goods and paid in wages $133,859,145, or 21 per cent of the value of the finished product. The Payne bill gave these manufacturers in 1912 protection of 55.59 per cent. No possible justification could be given for the extravagant protection offered this industry. The Underwood bill reduces these exorbitant rates to 30.48 per cent.

The manufacturers of wool products produced in 1910 goods to the value of $507,166,710 and paid in wages $87,962,669, or 17 per cent. The protection given this industry by the Payne bill is more than the entire cost of labor in the manufacture thereof. We reduced the average rate from 55.98 per cent to 35 per cent.

Manufactures of silk products in 1910 amounted to $196,911,677, the value of wages $38,570,085, or 19 per cent. In 1912 the average duty was 52.03 per cent. We reduced these rates to an average of 43.98 per cent, but these goods are luxuries, are good revenue producers, and the reduction was small.

We have transferred from the dutiable list under the Payne law to the free list articles that were imported last year of the value of $102,402,579 and paid duties amounting to $24,698,226. The largest single item is raw wool, value at $33,141,408, and paid duty of $14,454,234. Wool was free in all the tariff laws until 1824. We intend to reduce the price of woolen goods by taking the tax off of wool in order to allow our people to buy woolen goods for winter. If there is one schedule more than another that has received the condemnation of the American people it is the woolen schedule. Its rates are now, and have been for years, exorbitant and unwarranted and its burdens fall upon all, but most heavily upon the people who are least able to pay. Our climate requires and our health demands comfortable and warm clothing, and the existing law practically forbids a large number of people from securing these needed articles. Woolen clothing and blankets should never have been luxuries. Nature demands and our climate requires that their use should be general and not restricted. We have reduced woolen blankets from 104 per cent to 25 per cent, ready-made clothing and articles of wearing apparel from 75.76 per cent to 35 per cent, shawls from 101.35 per cent to 35 per cent, woolen hats from 82.44 per cent to 35 per cent, carpets from 88.53 per cent to 20 per cent and 35 per cent—reversing the Republican plan of placing the highest duties upon the cheapest articles.

We have put lumber on the free list in order to allow our people to shelter themselves from the cold. The Democrats are in sympathy with the poor. In fact, our party is known as the poor man's party, and it is the highest encomium that can be given to a party that it guards and protects those who are unable to protect and defend themselves. Of the 16,000,000 families in this country less than 5,000,000 of their houses are unencumbered by mortgages, and the remaining 11,000,000 either have no homes or have mortgaged ones. We propose to make it easier for our people to own their homes. The price of lumber has increased so much that it is almost impossible for the man with moderate means or a fair salary to manage to build a house; it is impossible for the men with small wages to do so. The easier for our people to own their own property the better for our country, since it will result in better citizens and a better citizenship.

We have given the farmers free agricultural implements—plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, drills, planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines, and wagons—binding twine, cream separators, horseshoes, nails, barbed wire, and fencing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As Democrats we have no political debts due to the special interests, and we rejoice at the opportunity to relieve the people of their exactions. This bill, with its inestimable benefits, will be soon presented for passage. Its support by the Democrats is assured. We hear the cry and protest against this bill. The industries affected loudly protest and object, and we must disregard the protest or continue to tax the people forever on their special productions. If we wait to gain the consent or receive the approval of the people who make money from the present rates, there will be no revision now or hereafter. No tariff rate can be lowered if we consult the judgment of the beneficiaries of the rates. Our party promised to reduce the tariff, and there was no proviso to the promise that we would reduce it only after having received the approval of its beneficiaries. That was the course of the Republican Party. Its first consideration was to the beneficiaries, and the interests of the people were forgotten, and as they neglected the people in their legislation they were neglected by the people at the ballot box. The contest is one between the interests of the people and the beneficiaries of special legislation, who believe the people should be taxed for their enrichment. In this contest we have not hesitated to choose. We will stand with the people and against the special interests and upon the pledges of our party platform.

We give the farmers free barbed wire and wire fencing. These articles are a necessity to the farmer. He is no longer able to maintain rail and board fences, as the price of timber is too high to be used for this purpose. He must of necessity resort to the wire fencing, and it is an item of considerable expense in his yearly accounts. He should be able to purchase it at the lowest possible price, and for that reason we have placed it on the free list. The tariff rates on these articles have compelled our people to depend upon the great steel industry for their supply. The Steel Trust is the greatest combination of wealth in the country, and this wealth has accumulated by means of tariff legislation. With absolute control of our markets and with power to fix their prices at will, they have drawn from the American farmer a constant flow of gold to their own treasury.

Not satisfied with the control of this market, they have annually exported immense quantities of their goods. We export several million dollars worth of barbed wire each year. In 1911 we exported $4,643,391 worth. We export about as much barbed wire as all other wire combined and sell it in all parts of the world. By this bill we give to the housewife her sewing machine with the duty free. This article is no longer a luxury but a necessity, and is found in almost all the homes of the people. Our machines are used in almost every country of the world, and an American traveler sees them for sale in every European port. We exported in 1911 $9,039,840 worth of sewing machines.

We have greatly reduced the duties on chemicals, glassware, and pottery, cotton and woolen goods, hosiery, gloves, underwear, clothing, oilcloths, carpets, blankets, flannels, furniture, and household furnishings, in fact, upon every necessity of life. We have sought in every way to lighten the burdens of the people and reduce as far as possible, by the tariff, the cost of living, and this bill is presented as an answer to the people who have asked for help and relief. [Applause.]

I submit below the statement of the clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the estimated revenues under the law of 1897 and the Payne bill, as reported by the Ways and Means Committee and referred to by me in the above speech:

Tables showing the rates and duties collected under the law of 1897, for the year ending June 30, 1906, also the rates and estimated revenues under proposed bill (H. R. 1438) as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Mar. 18, 1909, Sixty-first Congress, first session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield——

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the minority have any rights which he is bound to respect?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the minority has exercised more rights recently than anybody on the floor of the House.

Mr. Chairman, having the floor, I desire to ask how the division of time stands.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman wants to find out whether I have used more time than he has, I will admit it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to find out just exactly how the time balances.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has used 12 hours and 9 minutes, and the gentleman from New York 13 hours and 8 minutes, the latter including the time yielded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. PAYNE. That is the way I supposed it was, Mr. Chairman. That is not what I am complaining of. I told the gentleman on the start, when he was asking me to take time in the evening, because I was ready and he was not, that he must be fair and equitable about it, and he said that he would be fair and equitable about that. I said that I wanted to occupy some time in the daytime. Now, we have commenced at 11 o'clock, and I have had 45 minutes, and it is now half past 3. When is the gentleman going to get equitable on this subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I will be more than equitable. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not propose to have him reflect on this proposition, and I will enforce an equitable condition from now on if he is not satisfied. I will say this, that the gentleman from New York was yielded time yesterday when he was ready. To-day his leader complained to me that we had not occupied time in the afternoon, and that we were taking the morning time, and that the night time was better to speak in, and I made the agreement with the leader of the gentleman from New York to-day that I should occupy the time this afternoon and even up to this time, and now I am proceeding to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN.]

Mr. PAYNE. I will get my time some day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a fortunate time for the American people. For the first time in many long years a tariff bill has really been written in the interest of the people. No trust magnate, no tariff baron, dictated to the great leader of the Ways and Means Committee what should go into this bill, and those associated with him on that committee have joined in giving extensive tariff hearings upon all matters touching this legislation. That could not be said of the Ways and Means Committee that framed the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. The American people have repudiated the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and they have repudiated the party that enacted it, and once more they have called into power the great party of the Constitution—the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The divided and discordant remnants of the old Republican Party are trying to deceive the people and befog the issue by discussing and denouncing the Democratic caucus. The few stand-pat Republicans remaining in the House have lifted up their voices in solemn protest against the secret caucus of the Democratic Members of this House, and the insurgents, Progressives, or whatever they call themselves at present, have also condemned the secret Democratic caucus. Both of these minority parties have gone through the ridiculous and farcical performance of holding what they call an open caucus. Pray tell me what they have to caucus about. [Laughter.] They take their orders from trust magnates and tariff barons. Their program is prepared by the bosses of special privilege, and they must do the bidding of the tariff masters. Then why try to fool the people by sitting in an open caucus with cold feet killing time. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we are the representatives of the people and we discuss in secret caucus ways and means to secure wise and just legislation for the people. We do not take orders from the privileged few who have grown rich through favors granted by the Republican Party. We have full and fair discussion in the secret caucus by Democratic Representatives from every section of the country. There we discuss our differences and settle them, if we can. There we prepare the measures that we will present to the House and be responsible for to the country, and no Republican agent of a subsidized newspaper has any business in a Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The measures that are submitted to the caucus and the measures that we agree upon are given to the public, and the vote by which the agreement is reached is also given to the public. Why should the enemies of the Democratic Party be allowed to sit in its council chamber when it is suggesting and discussing party procedure regarding measures that we must stand responsible for to the country? If we bring out of the Democratic caucus just and meritorious measures the people will applaud and indorse the action of the caucus. Gentlemen of the opposition who think they are deceiving the people are fooling themselves. The people do not care so much about what is said in reaching a conclusion as they do about the conclusion reached by the Democratic caucus. The caucus will be judged by its fruits, and so far the Demoratic caucus has borne good fruit.

Mr. Chairman, the American people indorsed the work of the Democratic caucus of the Sixty-second Congress, and they will indorse the work of the Democratic caucus of the Sixty-third Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You stand-pat Republicans can not deceive the people by trying to take their thoughts off of you and your miserable subserviency to special interests by howling about a secret Democratic caucus. Face the issue squarely and join us in our efforts to grant relief to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me say to you gentlemen, the people do not care how many secret caucuses we have so long as the caucus seeks to bring about the greatest good to the greatest number. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, some of these Insurgents or Progressives insurged and progressed a good deal at home during the last campaign, and when they came into this House I watched and waited to see what stand they would take when the battle line was marked between the people and those who oppress them. In a little while I heard the tariff gong sound on the race track of privilege and a trust magnate's voice saying "they are off"; and lo, in the dust and noise of the race, I could not distinguish stand-pat horse from insurgent steed, and when they passed betwixt the flag of monopoly and the wire of high protection, they were neck and neck, and stand-pat horse only won by an eyelash, but the insurgent steed performed so admirably and pleased the tariff judges so well that they gave him a prize also. So side by side you go, and you will sleep together in the protective-tariff stall, John Anderson and Joe. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Insurgents who insurge at home and Progressives who progress in their talk at home, but are nonprogressive in their action here, will have to explain their conduct to those who sent them here. You can not be Progressives or Insurgents at home and then stand here and aid in keeping on the statute book an iniquitous tariff measure like that which now benefits the manufacturers of Lawrence, Mass., where human beings are working for small wages. Half clad and half fed, they are eking out a miserable existence.

Children are working there, and the hearings had regarding a strike in the mills at Lawrence not long ago disclosed the fact that these children get meat to eat only once a week; that some of these children had their fingers chopped off by running machinery, as they were compelled to clean the machinery while it was in motion. When a little fellow was asked if he sued for damages when his finger was mashed off, he said: "No, sir; I was afraid I would lose my job." I remember a little girl who had half of her scalp torn off by the machinery in a mill at Lawrence, Mass. She, too, was cleaning the machinery while it was in motion. When asked if they paid her damages for the injury done her she answered "No." She, too, was afraid she would lose her job if she tried to get damages.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I plead this afternoon for the underpaid, overworked, illtreated children who work in these tariff-protected industries. I want the Progressives and insurgents to join us in our efforts to strike the shackles from the limbs of America's industrial slaves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But what are you doing, Progressive and standpatter, under one and the same flag, when it comes to doing the bidding of the tariff masters? You Progressives said, we are a separate and distinct party, nothing in common between us and the standpatters. Get together; no, sir; nevermore. [Laughter.] But you are together on this question. You remind me of the old fellow who was sitting in front of a little shanty in a certain southern city. He was gazing into space and fanning himself furiously, for the weather was warm, and he was noticeably under the influence of fermented millet juice. [Laughter.] A friend approached him and said: "John, what in the world made you do this—get in this condition?" John said: "Well, I was just sittin' here and not a'bothering nobody at all, and a durn ballon went up, went right straight up, and I can't stand everything." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Some of these insurgents who said nevermore will we have anything to do with the standpatters, were found sitting right in the camp of privilege, right under the protective-tariff flag, side by side with the bellwethers of protection. [Laughter.] What made you do it, old fellow? "Well, I was just sittin' here looking for something to happen, and a durn tariff balloon went up, went right straight up, and I can't stand everything." [Applause and laughter.] So here you are.

Now, then, what is the chief difference between you Progressives and standpatters? The fact is nearly all of you are really and truly hide-bound protectionists, and the chief difference between you now is one of you wants to revise the tariff by a tariff commission, so you say. The others say, "No, no; we want to revise the tariff by a tariff board." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The commission would be composed of five men and the board would be composed of five men. This is a serious matter, and there is a broad chasm between these two propositions. [Laughter.] It looks as though you will never be able to bridge it and get a revision of the tariff, and both of you are hoping that you never may. [Laughter.]

What is the Democratic proposition? We propose to revise the tariff by the people's Representatives, coming fresh from the people every two years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, gentlemen, in the early days the Senate sought this power, but so jealous were the fathers as to where this power to levy taxes should be lodged that they said, "No, we will not even intrust it to a Senate composed of ambassadors from the sovereign States of this Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This power must remain as near the people as possible, and we will keep it in the hands of our Representatives in Congress, who go up fresh from the people every two years." [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will be a sad day when a commission or a board composed of a few men shall have the right to exercise the taxing power in this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In all the tariff bills that you have written when you were increasing the tariff taxes of the people you did not ask for a commission then; you did not want a tariff board; but now, when we seek to reduce the tariff tax, you clamor for a board or a commission, and they mean one and the same thing. What is your commission for? You know as well as I know that it is for the postponement of tariff revision. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What is your Tariff Board for? You know and the people know what it is for. It is for the postponement of tariff revision. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen of the committee, do you recall the story of the mother bird and her young in the wheat field? One day the farmer came, surveyed the situation, made a few observations, and returned to his home. That night the mother bird said to her young, "Who has been here to-day?" They said, "The farmer." "And what did he say?" "He said, 'This wheat is getting ripe.'" "What else?" "He said, 'It ought to be cut.'" Then the next night the mother bird said, "Who has been here to-day?" "The farmer." "What did he say?" "He said, 'This wheat is ripe and needs cutting, and I will get my neighbors to cut it.'" The mother bird said, "Do not be alarmed, my children, you will not have to move yet." But again the farmer came, and that night the mother bird said, "What report have you now, my children?" They said, "The farmer has been here again, and he said, 'This wheat is ripe and falling down. It must be cut, and I will come myself to-morrow and cut it.'" Whereupon the mother bird said, "It is time to move, my children; he is going to do it himself." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What are you gentlemen of the opposition asking for—tariff board and a tariff commission? The tariff baron smiles, and he inquires, "What did the standpatters say?" They said they wanted to revise the tariff, but that they would get a tariff board to do it. "Ah, ha," said the tariff baron, "Do not be alarmed, my brethren, we will not have to move yet" [applause on the Democratic side], and then he said with a merry twinkle in his eye, "What do the Progressives say?" They said, "We want to revise it, too, but we will get a tariff commission to do it." "Ah, ha," said the tariff baron, "Do not be disturbed, my brethren, we will not have to move yet." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] But, Mr. Chairman, what did the Democrats, coming up from the various sections of the Union, marshaled behind OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, say? They said, "The tariff needs revising. It must be revised downward, and we will do it ourselves." [Applause on the Democratic side.] And then the tariff baron said, "My brethren, it looks like we will have to move." [Laughter and applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, in the name of all that is just and right, I declare to you and to the country that they are going to have to move. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The cost of living is so high that it presents a serious problem to the average man, and he is hard pressed to secure the bare necessities of life.

A teacher in a Sunday school said to a little boy, "Jimmy, do they ask the blessing at meal times at your house?" The little boy made no reply. The teacher turned to the other members of the class and said, "What is the first thing your father says when he goes to the breakfast table in the morning?" For a moment no one replied. Finally a little red-headed fellow looked up and said, "I can tell you what my daddy says." He says, "Go slow on that butter, kid; it costs 40 cents a pound." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The Payne-Aldrich tariff law carries the highest tariff tax rate ever enacted by the Congress of the United States, and the people are afflicted with tariff burdens as they never have been before, and yet Mr. Taft said that it was the best tariff law ever written, and when I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] talking about a speedy return of the Republican Party to power I was greatly amused, and I thought of the conundrum propounded by a little boy to his father when he said, "Papa, what is the difference between Taft and Moses?" "I don't know, son," said the father. "What is the difference?" The boy said, "The Lord buried Moses where the people could not find him and the people buried Taft where the Lord could not find him." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, for fear that these insurgents may take themselves and their leader at Oyster Bay a little too seriously and that a few of these standpatters may fool themselves into hoping for the return of the Republican Party to power, let me dispose of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft in passing. A Western poet in a certain town who had been dealing for quite a while with the firm of Hart & Leonora was slow to pay his debts, and one of the partners, Leonora, instructed Hart not to sell him any more on credit, but one day the poet came in and persuaded Hart to sell him a $5 derby hat. When Leonora discovered his name on the book opposite the amount charged for the hat, he had many unkind things to say about the poet and quarreled with his partner Hart. Hart wrote the poet the following touching note: "Leonora has quarreled with me for selling you the hat and he abused you terribly. Please remit for the hat at once. Remember that I trusted you, trusted you implicitly." The poet turned the note and wrote on the back, "Trust on, fond Hart. Leonora, fare thee well." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when the battle line was drawn across the Republic on the 5th day of November last, old men, middle-aged men, and young men stood with their ballots in their hands ready to perform a patriotic service, aye, to save their country from the dangers that threatened it. The big, fat man from the Philippines and the wild man from Africa [laughter and applause] came charging down the line, and the American people in one united chorus said, "Move on, sweet William; Theodora, fare thee well." [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, now having answered all of the arguments of Republican standpatters and insurgent Progressives [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], I shall proceed to speak in behalf of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The spirit that covets unduly
Holds sin that 'tis hard to forgive,
For religion never preaches more truly
Than when she says, live and let live.

From the earliest glimmerings of history men have manifested serious concern about the use of the taxing power. If the dead republics could tell the story of their dissolution and downfall, it would be about the use and abuse of the taxing power. The taxing power in the United States has been used for the benefit of a few men to the detriment and great injury of the masses of the people. A protective-tariff tax in a republic a hundred years old is unjust, inexcusable, and indefensible. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The tariff tax, increasing under the long reign of the Republican Party, has become a burden to the average man. Henry Clay, who pleaded for protection in the early days, never advocated a tariff tax above 20 per cent. He justified that rate upon the ground that our industries were young and needed protection until they were older grown. He and others said to the fathers, we must have industries. We want factories here to manufacture what we need in the way of wearing apparel, cooking utensils, agricultural implements, and so on. The consumer said, "What do you mean?" Well, to illustrate, they said that we must have a man to manufacture hats. The hat you have on cost $1.50. It came here from Europe. We will manufacture the same hat here and levy a tax of, say, 50 cents on it. That will make the hat cost you $2. That tax will enable the American hat man to build a hat factory and manufacture hats here.

The consumer said, "Then I am to be taxed for his benefit." The fathers said, "We know that it is wrong, but it is the only way that we can build up industries in the United States, and we must have industries. Submit to it only for a little while and we will reduce the tariff tax to the revenue basis." The consumer said, "You are taxing me to build a hat factory here. Who will own that factory? Will I have any interest in it?" And the fathers said, "The hat manufacturer will own the factory and you will have no interest in it, except you can point with pride to it and say that you were taxed to help build it." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

That is what was done in the early days in order that industries might be established in the United States. So it was clearly the purpose of the fathers to reduce the tariff tax and to wean these industries just as soon as the industries of America passed the period of their infancy and got a foothold in the commercial and industrial world. The Democratic Party believes that these hoary-headed infants are old enough to be weaned. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Bryan has said that you can wean anything in the world, even a mule colt, but that it is hard to wean a tariff baron. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, these tariff barons remind me of the Kentucky boy. He was 15 years old, barefooted, with trousers rolled up to his knees, shirt open in front, and one suspender hanging down, perspiration trickling over his dust-covered face as he ran up the road, with his hat in one hand and a rock in the other. He met some gentlemen, and said, "Gentlemen, have you seen anything of airy woman, kind of sandy haired and trottin' like?" They said, "Yes; about a quarter of a mile up the road." He said, "That's ma, durn her; she thinks she's going to wean me, but she ain't." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the American consumer has been demanding for a long time that the tariff tax be reduced. The tariff tax would have been reduced four years ago but for the betrayal of the American people by the Republican Party. At last the people are triumphant and the consumer has a friend in court. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me say a word in behalf of the American consumer. But for him the various industries of the world would perish from the earth. These industries are dependent upon the consumer for the sale and consumption of their products, and yet so unjust have been the exactions in tariff taxes and trust profits that the consumer's ability to provide for himself and family has been seriously impaired. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Time was when the industry and enterprise in the individual stood for something in every community in the land. These were the mighty forces that wrought for American progress and prosperity. Then competition was the life of trade, and hope and opportunity called to the enterprise and industry in the American youth and bade him go forth to labor and achieve. Then the fields of opportunity were broad and inviting and the average man's efforts were fairly rewarded. He had intelligence, industry, and enterprise and opportunity. Opportunity was calling to him and he asked no more. He could go out and match his skill and energy against the skill and energy of others in the broad field of industrial endeavor, where competition was the life of trade. Then more men had money in the banks, more men owned their homes, and more men were prosperous and happy, according to population, than ever before or since in the history of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That time was when we had a Democratic tariff law—the Walker law. Then we had a tariff for revenue only and competition was the life of trade. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Competition was the mighty force that called out the best that men had in them, but, Mr. Chairman, in an evil hour the enemies of the people conceived the idea that by raising the tariff tax high enough they could shut out foreign goods, establish a monopoly, crush out the independent concerns of the country, and destroy competition in the United States. The protective tariff has been the hotbed of wicked combinations and monopolies, and Havemeyer, the sugar king, spoke truly when he said "the tariff is the mother of the trust." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This cruel offspring of the Republican Party began its operations in the United States. It went into politics, made barter of the ballot, and cut the wage of the laboring man and denied that he was worthy of his hire. It did not stop there, Mr. Chairman; it suspended the operation of the law of supply and demand and fixed the price of all that it had to buy and of all that it had to sell. What is a trust, you ask me? A trust is a combination of men with capital, and has for its purpose the control of the output and price of a certain article of commerce. It kills off competition by reducing the number of men engaged in the manufacture of that article; that reduces the number of buyers of the raw material and decreases the number of sellers of the finished product; so this offspring of the protective-tariff system, this law-guarded monopoly, deprives us of a competitive market—holds up the producer with one hand and robs the consumer with the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the Scripture tells us that when the servant returned from the field where he had been to inspect the young wheat, he said, "Master, there are tares in the wheat," and the master said, "An enemy hath done this." The servant said, "Shall I go out and pull up the tares?" "Not now," said the master, "the tares and the wheat are green and look something alike, and the wheat stalks are tender and easily broken down." What else did the master say? He said, "Wait until the harvest time, so that you can distinguish the tares from the wheat; then go and pluck up the tares, bind them, and burn them." The Democratic Party says that in the wheat field of fair competition, of individual enterprise and effort, where equal opportunity called to the skill and energy of men, an enemy hath sown the tares of monopoly and the trust is flourishing there. The harvest time is here. You can clearly distinguish the trust tare from the wheat stalk of fairplay and honest competition, and the Democratic Party bids us go and pluck up these trust tares and bind them and burn them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the American manufacturers now sell abroad cheaper than they sell to us at home. Is the tariff system beneficial to the American citizen when it forces him to pay a higher price for what he buys in the United States than the foreigner has to pay for the same article shipped to him in a foreign country? Can a tariff system be defended that enables a man to sell cheaper in foreign countries than he sells at home? The money now taken from the American people by the raising of a protective tariff tax does not benefit the Government but enriches a few men at the expense and to the great injury of the masses of the people. If the money now wrung annually from our people by the protective tariff system of the Republican Party could be left with them for a few years we would have the happiest and most prosperous people in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The trouble is, Mr. Chairman, the average man does not get acquainted with his earnings before they are taken from him through this oppressive tariff system. The average man is industrious and enterprising, and if he could be allowed to enjoy what he makes there would be less unrest and more contentment and happiness in the country, but when the tariff tax amounts to one-third, and in many instances more, of the price that he must pay for the real necessities of life, he is embarrassed to meet his obligations and hard pressed to supply those who are dependent upon him with the bare necessities of life. Now, then, when you realize that the tariff tax paid by the average man is so high that it seriously embarrasses him and denies him many of the necessaries of life, and that this tax does not go to the Government but into the pockets of a few men, who have grown rich at the expense of the many, you are indignant, and no wonder you are crying out against the cruelties of a system that takes from the weak and gives to the strong, that taxes one class to enrich another. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Government that uses the taxing power to enrich the few at the expense of the many has entered upon a dangerous road. The welfare of the citizen is of the greatest concern to our country.

It is the highest end and aim of constitutional government, and I deny that the Republican Party has the right to sell the taxing power to a band of tariff marauders who employ it to pillage and plunder the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, through this system a few men are coming more and more to own and control the fields of American opportunity and industrial endeavor. The people are anxiously awaiting our action. What are we going to do? What would the fathers think if they could come back and find that by the improper exercise of the taxing power one class had become enormously rich and another and a larger class had been denied the common necessities of life? That one, a very small class, by the unjust operation of tariff laws, had come to own four-fifths of the wealth of the United States, and that another class, composed of more than 50,000,000 American people, did not own their homes? Where are those who believe with Lincoln that the man should be placed above the dollar? Where are the representatives of the sturdy stock who followed Jackson in his war against plutocracy when he said, "The people shall rule"? Where are the descendants of the men who gloried in the doctrine of Jefferson of equal rights to all and special privileges to none? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends, the battle is on between justice and injustice, right and wrong, the people and their oppressors, God and mammon. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Your country is calling you. On which side are you battling? Will you battle in behalf of the American home and the family at the fireside or will you be found on the side of those who oppress them? Will you vote to remove the obstacles from the path of the American boy that he may have a fair chance in the struggle for existence or will you aid those who are shutting the door of opportunity in his face and denying him the blessings and benefits that should come to him? We owe it to him and we owe it to the country to look to the health and happiness of the American boy. So much depends upon this little fellow's future. He is more important than your tariff-protected monopolies, and I demand for him a fair chance in the struggle of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic Party is determined that you shall not crush out the spirit of usefulness that God has planted in the breast of this American boy. You shall not deny to his little bright eyes the blessed light of hope. You shall not crucify him upon the altar of monopolistic greed or barter his birthright to the enemies of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Upon the treatment and encouragement of this American boy depends the future strength and glory of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then I appeal for protection to the American home. There this boy gets his first glimpse of human government and there he hears for the first time the story of our country's goodness or the tale of its injustice and oppression. Then how important it is that his surroundings should be such that he may have wholesome food and comfortable clothing and the opportunity to become healthy and strong and tutored in the blessings and benefits of constitutional government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has it in his power to preserve the Republic. The perpetuity of this Government will rest upon his shoulders; aye, the course of liberty in this western world will be marked and bounded by his chart and compass and in the years to come he will be the guardian of constitutional liberty in this Republic of the West. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What are we doing to inspire in him love of country? What are we doing to strengthen his faith in the justice of our laws and in the integrity of those who make them?

Mr. Chairman, the strength of the Republic is in the homes of the people. Then the most important institution in our country is the American home; and the Democratic Party has registered a vow that it will go out and drive this band of tariff marauders from the door of the American home. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These cruel tariff marauders are sowing pestilence and want in the path of the American boy. They are spreading the poison of distrust and bitterness along his way, and by their pillage and plunder of the American home they are making an anarchist or a socialist of the American boy before he reaches the age of accountability. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if the Republic is to live this condition of things must change; but every time the effort is made to reduce the tariff tax so that the American consumer can live more decently and comfortably and obtain the necessaries of life at a reasonable price those who profit by the tariff tax put into operation every force that they can employ to frighten the American people into the belief that if we dare to reduce that tax business will be disturbed and industries will be destroyed. These mighty interests spend vast sums of money and do all in their power to safeguard their privilege to pillage and plunder. This is the business that they do not want disturbed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What are you doing to prevent them from destroying the American consumers' business—that of providing a decent living for himself and family?

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, they tell us that the tariff is a local issue. It is a local issue in one sense, for it haunts the housewife throughout the day, and when she retires at night she is surrounded on every hand by tariff-taxed household utensils. It confronts the father at all times, and is forever clawing at his purse strings. It follows the children to play, for their little toys are taxed. It follows them to school, for their wearing apparel, books, and the building itself are taxed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is also a national issue, because it affects everybody everywhere in the Republic. There is no escape from the remorseless taxgatherers of the Republican Party. They pursue the American citizen from the cradle to the grave, for the swaddling clothes of the infant, the wearing apparel of the adult, and the winding sheet of the dead are all taxed, and heavily taxed, by the Republican tariff law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, we will not despair of the Republic so long as against the ills of evil we hold the remedy of right. We will reduce the tariff tax, dissolve the trusts, restore competition, open the door of opportunity to the American boy, and give the average man a fair chance in the struggle for existence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to see the time come when every man who wants to work will find work to do and will be well paid for that work and not have to indulge in strikes, boycotts, and demoralization of trade in order to obtain it. Mr. Chairman, I want to see a prosperity felt by the common man, heard in his cheerful voice and seen in his happy home. Not the kind of prosperity produced by the Republican Party as expressed in a few money kings, who tower above the mass of the people like peaks above the plain, but a prosperity that will permit every farmer to garner in his own barn and every citizen to enjoy at his own fireside the full and fair fruits of his labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A prosperity that spreads peace and plenty o'er a smiling land and is reflected in a happy nation's eyes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Four years ago the Republican Party came into power under false pretenses, broke its promises, and to-day stands convicted of deceit and unfaithfulness to the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The mask of hypocrisy has been torn from the face of that party, the veil has been rent in the temple of high protection, and trust magnates and tariff barons have been located in the temple of the people, and Woodrow Wilson is calling them to judgment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This oppressive tariff-tax system of the Republican Party is the deadly upas tree in the political life of America. Its roots are planted in the ruins of American competition, its branches are uplifted to a sky black with special privileges, its poisonous odors choke and stifle individual enterprise and effort, and its deadly fruits are socialism, anarchy, distress, and want. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In this hour of sore trial and oppression amongst the people God has raised up a man who, like Aaron of old, will stretch forth the healing rod to give the land deliverance. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Once more he will wave the flag of the people's rule and once more proclaim the doctrine of Jefferson, "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

Back on her native mountains where the flag waved long ago
We will plant again that standard white as the driven snow.
It's the flag that Jefferson loved dearly—
It's the banner that Jackson bore
In his battle for the people's rights in the happy days of yore.
I can hear the Army marching;
I can see the flag unfurled;
And Woodrow Wilson now waves it to the world.

[Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think——

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] go on now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there is an hour and 50 minutes still due to this side, and I had an understanding with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if I yielded this morning to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] I could go on and endeavor to make up my time this evening, the time which it was complained we were not occupying.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] hardly states the understanding with me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated to the gentleman, when he asked me to yield—notwithstanding that we were about three or four hours behind time, so that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] could come in at that time—that I would do so with the understanding that I would have an opportunity this afternoon to make up my time. But I will say this, that I have two gentlemen here who are anxious to get away to-night, and consequently very anxious to get in this evening. Each one of them wants 20 minutes of time, and if the gentleman will allow me to yield to those gentlemen, although I am nearly two hours behind that side, I will yield to that side, and he will have an opportunity to go on to-night, because I do not want to carry the time into to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Alabama that he has used 13 hours and 2 minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has used 14 hours and 8 minutes. The gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 6 minutes remaining in order to equalize the time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought it was more than that.

Mr. MANN. I protested to the gentleman from Alabama at the beginning of the debate against this side of the House being obliged to use time from half past 4 until practically the adjournment as being unfair to this side of the House. To-day the gentleman stated that he expected to proceed until he had made up his allotment of time. I went to the gentleman and said to him that I thought that was not fair to this side of the House, when he or his side had been unprepared to use time in the evening and we had used it then, that he should endeavor to make it up in the afternoon or during the day. The gentleman stated that he would consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] should come in, and that he would then proceed to make up his time. To that I again protested that is was not fair to this side of the House.

That statement was afterwards made by the gentleman from Alabama on the floor, and my statement was made by me on the floor again. It is not fair to the minority, in my opinion. I think we are entitled to stand upon that. If we proceed with the debate between 5 and 7 or between half past 7 and 8 o'clock, when the gentleman from Alabama has no one who is willing to proceed, it is not fair that the gentleman shall then take the time in the afternoon to make up for the time which he did not occupy, and I think the gentleman himself will concede that much.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I desire to have everybody satisfied. I did not desire the gentleman to go on yesterday evening. As a matter of fact, yesterday evening is about the only time when we ran late. We ran until after half past 8, and the last speaker was a gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. He was the next to the last speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY].

Mr. MANN. He was the next to the last speaker. The last speaker was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If gentlemen do not want to speak at this time of the evening, then when I have made up the little over an hour that is due me I am willing to move to take a recess and come back here at half past 7, so that the gentlemen on that side may have a full audience, and then I will divide the time equally.

Mr. MANN. But I think the gentleman ought to proceed and take some of the time between 5 and 7 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I expect a little later on to move to take a recess for dinner. The only reason why I desire these two gentlemen to come in now is that they want to go away, although they would have a better audience this evening.

Mr. MANN. Everybody wants to get in early. We have a great many applications for time on this side. I think that as for myself I may be cut out of the privilege of addressing the House, although I would like to address it, because of lack of time. Now, the gentleman proposes not to use any of the time between 5 or half past 5 and 7 o'clock, which he ought to use; yet if we use it he wants to charge us with all that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is attributing to this side of the House something that it ought not to be charged with. It is true that at one time there were more speakers at a later hour. The gentleman complained that we did not put anybody in yesterday until half past 3 or 4. Now, we have given the gentlemen on that side of the House one-half of the time and they have only one-third of the membership. The gentleman complains that he can not take care of his men. I have two-thirds of the House to take care of and the gentleman has only one-third. I do not insist on the gentleman making his friends speak here between 5 and 6, and I shall not do so.

Mr. MANN. But there is no way of getting 10 or 12 hours a day, as the gentleman suggested in the first place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to even up, and I do not want to put the gentleman's friends in the position of speaking here at a time when they do not want to speak. We can adjourn until half past 7 and continue then until 11 o'clock, and they will have a better audience then than now. I think I am entitled at this stage of the proceedings to even this time up when I have two-thirds of the House to take care of.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has a majority of the House, and he can do what he pleases, but I do not think that is fair to this side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I repudiate that proposition. I have been fair, and more than fair.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will even up the time, and then we will divide it as it comes. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] is recognized.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, the American people have been chasing after strange gods. They have set up brazen images in the wilderness and have fallen down and worshiped them.

Get rich quick without work is the motto of this pantheon. Among the lesser gods were fiat money, depreciated currency, trusts, stock watering and stock and produce gambling, lotteries, bucket shops, patent medicines, and fakes in general, but the great boss god Baal is the protective tariff. Baal has not always been so great or so greedy as in his latter and his last days. He was once an infantile, honest-appearing mendicant that asked for food in order that he might grow and acquire strength enough to work for self-support. But the beggar's life was easy and demoralizing, so that while Baal grew big as per schedule and heavy in the belly, which was unexpected, and weak in the legs, which was a natural sequence, he refrained from cultivating an appetite for work and more and more hated the thought of supporting himself while becoming ever hungrier and more insistent. And then Baal proceeded to claim that he dropped the rain on the thirsty soil, that he daily turned on the sun, and caused the waters to run to the sea. He made us fear that he would withdraw the coal and oil and iron beyond our reach if we ceased to pay him tribute. And ever he got bigger in the belly and weaker in the legs and ever hungrier and more blatant.

Then people agreed that Baal should bant and exercise himself and eventually eat less and do something, as became a grown person, but when Baal got through arguing with his priests he persuaded them to feed him more, and after they increased his rations they allowed that he was the best fed god that ever reigned and therefore would be the best acting one. Then the people tired of Baal and ran off his priests and sentenced him for his crimes. There were many who urged that he ought to be starved down to moderate proportions before being knocked in the head, for, said they, the remains will make an awful mess before we can bury them. Others were in favor of immediate execution regardless of results, while a very few of his old priests continued to chant calamity, the failure of yield of field and factory, the drying of the watercourses, and the darkening of the sun if Baal and his maw and his craw were disturbed.

The protective tariff, like any other tariff, be it understood, is a tax. A tax is the process of abstracting money from the individual pocket for the ostensible benefit of some of us or all of us. The protective tariff having duly abstracted the coin from the pocket of the man who is supposed to have earned it, then turns and pretends to place it in the pocket of some individual who needs it because the product of his labor is not an adequate wage.

If this Robin Hood system of distribution were a taking from the rich and a giving to the poor, its false economy might in a measure be condoned as emanating from a kind heart, albeit connected with a weak head, but it has proven a taking from the poor and a giving to the rich, so that neither head nor heart are to be trusted.

If we were organizing a new system of taxation and distribution, with no traditions, no muddling precedents, we would first of all lay down the dictum that the burden of proof lies heavy on him who would take from any man any portion of the product of his toil. The protective-tariff doctrine, on the contrary, takes much from everybody, and then gives what portion is not otherwise absorbed by the taker to somebody who happens to be unprofitably employed and unable to pay himself out of his product.

Through many years we have gone along under this absurd reversal of premises. We have been laboriously taught that this form of taxation has been enriching us. It has been a noxious disease that we have suffered, akin to one that stimulates the heart to undue exertion. In our Nation, suffering this disease, we have done what the human body does under such conditions—we have adapted ourselves to it, and have lived in spite of it. It would be dangerous to stop the poisoning all at once, and now the burden of proof measurably rests on him who would suddenly withdraw the stimulant. [Applause.]

There are in the world a number of persons who believe, and who have the temerity to assert, certain economic premises. They hold to the thought, already expressed, that men must be, and are, paid for their work out of product; that they are not, and can not be, paid in the aggregate out of any other fund, because there is no other fund; that the primal need of society is production, and that production should be as cheap as possible, always taking into account human and social elements. Next we may remark that product out of place is of no value; so that unhampered commerce, cheapening of transportation, is as important as the act of production itself. Again, cheapness of distribution is as important as cheapness of production and celerity and cheapness of transportation.

The man who eats the food, who wears the clothes, must pay the producer's cost, must pay the transportation charge, must pay the middleman in the system of distribution. The protective tariff theory declares that all of us shall be taxed to pay some of us more than we should be paid out of our production. Also that natural and cheap trade routes should be cut by national boundaries; that physical geography should be defined as un-American; that production and distribution should be regulated, stimulated, asphyxiated, subsidized, taxed, and generally tinkered until we have the fearful and wonderful result which has apparently become displeasing to the majority of our fellow citizens. I had great hope of the Progressive Party as an organization, which, to use the eloquent phrase of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER], would not only set its collective face, like flint, against us when we are engaged in wrongdoing, but which, now and forever, stands for social and industrial justice, "with hearts of steel," by the way. This party, that proposes to invoke the wrath of the American people upon the heads of us reactionaries on both sides of this House—this party ought to know its sworn enemy, a special privilege, when it happens to meet one; but it shakes hands most amicably with the first one it meets, the protective tariff, and hopes for political success as a result of the compromise.

It is as if a knight of Arthur's table went out to rescue damsels and, as per schedule, met a dragon, and as though he turned aside from the road, remarking that he did not see anything but a benevolent angleworm which he would later take fishing with him. One may have respect for the infant-industry theory out of which has grown the high protective tariff; one may countenance the plain, unvarnished greed of some of the old schedules, but in Heaven's name what is this chastened, this holy, this pale-blue purified essence in which, unless we believe, we shall most assuredly be damned, if we are to believe the gentleman from New York, who is about to call down the wrath of the American people upon us. What is the "protective principle"? Has it not been defined? It surely has, and the definition is worse than the disorder. The protective tariff "should equal the difference in cost of production at home and abroad," with or without a profit to the producer. What could be fairer than that? Coconuts in Maine, mahogany in hot beds, vanilla beans in Potomac Park, and our husky mechanics making ancient tapestry, the bricklayers' union whittling out German dolls, and every laborer drawing down good pay while trying to raise something that ought to be raised somewhere else or to do something that some one else can do better. [Applause.]

My little daughter is collecting elephants. Alas, what fiends she and I are, to encourage Japanese and Chinese to carve them of ivory and teak, Dutchmen to mold them in pottery, and Hindus to cast them in bronze. These elephants are, of course, utterly and entirely useless, but we could pay more for them if we took some of our people from raising corn and wheat and hogs and put them at the task of making elephants. [Laughter.]

The protective tariff is one of the brood of special privileges. The protective principle, as progressively enunciated, is but an attenuated form of a fundamental fallacy.

What is a special privilege? It is a scheme whereby part of one man's product can be taken from him for the benefit of another. There may be times when this performance is justifiable, but at least the burden of proof should be on him who would put his hand in the pocket of another. When the community, the State or Nation, does this it is called taxation, and when done for purposes of safeguarding the Nation and of caring for the individual, it is obviously justifiable. Without such cooperative expenditure, without such common levy of funds, no nation could endure. But when this power of taxation is invoked for the purpose of redistributing product, those favoring it land in an interminable morass and in their flounderings get entangled with "differences in the cost of production," which are to be squared by taxing our people, and then they proceed to call this thing, which closely resembles piracy, a "principle."

I fully sympathize with our really truly Progressives—although I believe I am now classed as an assistant reactionary—in their attempt to push forward a splendid program of humanitarian legislation. I join with them in a desire to see every man well paid, to have no children engaged in life-destroying occupations. I wish to see society take the risk from the shoulders of the sick and the aged. I shall work and vote for measures to bring these results, but I shall do it with the full knowledge that there is more than one side to the ledger and that all of us must pay the bills we incur and pay them in the only way they can be paid, by giving up privilege, by increasing product, by freeing commerce.

I believe in a tariff commission, expert and nonpartisan, to report to us, who are the framers of financial legislation. The last commission mined for facts and published facts to which all men should have access.

It is a delightful millennial hope that some day, somehow, we may get the tariff out of politics, but I can not foresee that desirable consummation while there are two or more parties professing belief in enrichment through taxation—two schools of "boot-strap" aviation. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the majority, you are doing a brave deed in carrying out your campaign pledges to reduce the tariff. It is not going to be a pleasant experience for the American people to lead a more sober existence after the long course of stimulants in which they have indulged. They will experience what Daudet, in his great novel "Sappho," alluded to as the "gray sadness of the morning," and some of you, perhaps many of you, will fall by the wayside. But, at any rate, you will have done your duty. "The way to resume is to resume," and not unlike the hardships that came after the resumption of specie payments will be the effect of your action.

You are already hedging on your promises to reduce the cost of living, and you are wise in so doing. It is not the direct tariff charge that counts most in the articles for which we pay extravagantly. It is the burden of the distributing cost, the toll levied by the land-owning privilege, the toll paid to watered securities, the unnecessary extravagance and burden of those people that look for an unearned livelihood in the overloaded distributive avocations, and last of all, the waste and misuse and the destruction of the capital needed for production.

It is not so much the burden of the few drones in our national hive that makes our country far less productive than it should be. Rather is it the vast amounts of unprofitable toil, the fearful toll of wasted, unproductive effort, and the charges levied by privilege, of which the protective tariff is but one.

This ought to be said: That a man who can not see the burdensome, anticommercial character of such a tariff as we have had can hardly be expected to recognize other forms of abuse. A knight who would mistake a dragon for an angleworm would probably mistake a one-eyed giant for a prairie dog, and go on crusading with the new crusaders without picking trouble where he ought to have had trouble.

The gentleman from Alabama, in charge of this bill, and other gentlemen on the majority side, are guilty of serious error when they talk of a "consumers'" tariff. It has been often pointed out that in any well-ordered community the consumer is also the producer. The tramp and the idle rich are the only nonproductive consumers.

The sort of tariff we need is a tariff for the benefit of the unprivileged, for the men who have no means of shifting the burden of taxation on the man below him, and we all know what that shifting is. Does the landowner pay the tax? Not if he can make the tenant do it for him; and the tenant, if he keeps a store, makes the man who deals with him pay his rent and his tax, and eventually the tax drops on and stays on the back of the man who can not shift it onto the back of some one else.

We need a system that will lead toward productive endeavor, not one that will encourage misplaced effort. The call for labor, capital, and brains is heard wherever our resources lie.

Some of our wise men are talking about a "competitive tariff." That is a loose phrase, but there is back of it definite meaning. Privilege is always wasteful. A railroad that is permitted to overcharge for freight or passengers cares little for economy. It takes pressure to force improvement. In many lines we may hope for remedy from the pressure of competition; from others, essentially noncompetitive, as our public utilities, we must look to regulation. It is our hope that this tariff will wake up our backward people; that it will cause our merchants to cut across lots to the elimination of unnecessary costs, and that when our economic thinking gets on a straight track it will stay there and go on down the line and not again get off on a blind stub siding.

But this is no time or place for a lecture on political economy. Whole books would be required to follow through the argument against malemployment, waste, and that form of private taxation known as privilege. I should like, before I close, to consider a few matters that are of interest to the unprivileged, leaving them with you as facts to be met, without pretending to offer any definite remedy at the present time.

First, as to our costs of distribution. The findings of the Tariff Commission show that in the case of three typical articles of cotton manufacture in England there was a margin of from 40 to 70 per cent between the factory price and the consumer's price. The same articles showed a margin of from 90 to 150 per cent in this country. Here is something outside of the difference in the cost of labor at home and abroad. It is obvious that our distribution is preyed upon by parasites to a greater extent than that of England.

Col. Wilson, of the commissary service in the Isthmus, is selling the best quality of American corn-fed porterhouse steaks at 20 cents a pound, with bone and fat trimmed off. This is just about half of what such steaks would cost in Washington. He buys them of the iniquitous packers at prices thoroughly satisfactory to them. He has a monopolized market. He has no waste, he is not conducting the business for profit. He pays no rent. One man on a fair salary runs a business supplying 20,000 people with their daily meat at one-half the costs of competitive marketing here. Must democracy forever be wasteful and inefficient? Must we call ourselves socialists before we can fight against waste and unproductive employment?

In 1887 I sold land in Nebraska at less than $20 an acre. The men who bought it could pay for it with six crops of 20-cent corn. That land is now worth $100 an acre, and six crops of 50-cent corn will not pay for it.

The mechanic who has no land wherewith to tax some one else pays twice as much for his ham and his bacon as he used to do. The land value is an item, and a most important item, in the present cost of food. The community creates the land value. The individual owner gets the value and the community over and over and over again and forever pays for the value it has created in interest or in rent.

The cities are too big. They represent two legitimate functions—manufacturing and distributing. It is in the cities that we realize the tremendously overloaded condition of the distributing business—too many banks, too many brokers, too many wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers, with all their employees, and all eating. The limit of the city's usefulness as a manufacturing center is reached and overreached by extravagant land values. There is a continuing exodus of productive enterprises from the city into the suburbs, yet the city apparently eats just as much as it did before the removal. Who pays for the extravagance of the big buildings for the transportation systems in the overgrown city? Who pays interest on $100 to $500 per square foot of land value? It all is loaded on the distributing and manufacturing costs of the country.

The Panama Canal represents the opening of great commerce, a great world service, but the building costs of underground and overhead railways in the city of New York represent a greater fixed capital than used in the great canal.

If we grant that New York is too big, if we are willing to admit that a city a quarter of its size could perform its functions just as well, then we must realize the terrible waste of capital found not only in the great buildings, but in providing these means of transportation for a surplus and an unproductive population.

We know how scarce is capital when called upon to develop productive rural industry. It must be scarce somewhere to make up for the extravagant misuse of funds in great cities. The great insurance companies have continuously taken from the country communities, where capital is needed, and with one or two honorable exceptions have used their funds almost entirely toward increasing the burdensome development of the overgrown cities.

There is no panacea, there is no patent serum, that can cure our economic ills, but it is time that we at least have a diagnosis, that we faced the situation, and know what is the trouble with us. All the numberless forms of waste are destroying our substance. The liquor traffic, military expenditures, our luxuries, these are some of the visible items in our course of extravagance, but after all there is nothing to compare with the vast destruction caused by the great army of people who are honestly, patiently, and laboriously doing useless things, or useful things in the wrong way and the wrong place, an army that must be supported by those productively and profitably employed. It is for this malemployment that the protective tariff is largely to blame.

I shall vote for the Democratic bill because it represents a lowering of the tariff. It is a blow at one form of privilege. It represents an attempt to secure direct taxation, which is better than a cowardly system of indirect taxation. [Applause.] I wish some of the schedules were treated differently. I wish cattle were on the free list, so that we can secure our young stock from Mexico, where it can be raised cheaper. [Applause.] I believe there may be a mistake in totally eliminating the tariff from wool, for though wool is now practically on a free-trade basis, despite the 11-cent specific duty, the psychology of the situation may discourage the woolgrower and thereby cut down an important part of our meat supply. It would have been better, in my opinion, to have levied one-half the duty proposed in the Republican bill, or 9 cents on clean content, for a short term of years.

I wish that more time were given to considering the condition of the citrus-fruit industry, where a crop only comes at the end of eight years of cultivation and where reduction should be more gradual than in the case of annual crops.

There is no sense whatever, as I see it, in protecting rice or wheat or other annual crops from the appetites of our hungry people.

There are doubtless many clauses in the bill that are open to criticism, but as the average of it is good I shall not stand by and make faces at it, not even the sort of flint faces promised us by the gentleman from New York, but shall take the medicine, which I believe to be wholesome and in general terms for the public welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I print as a part of my remarks the following articles from the Valve World, by R. T. Crane:

Mr. R. T. Crane, at the time of his death in 1912, was one of the greatest manufacturers in the world. Aside from combinations of railroads, his company, the Crane Co., was the greatest consumer of American steel. After having paid tribute to the Steel Trust on all their watered stock and tariff privileges, the goods manufactured by his organization went throughout the world on a competitive basis.

Mr. Crane preached and proved the doctrine that well-paid, intelligent, efficient labor is the cheapest labor. His firm not only paid the maximum wages but annually shared their profits, to the extent of an aggregate of millions of dollars, with their employees. While they practiced and taught the theory of efficiency, the theory and practice were always carried out with the utmost regard for the well-being of the employees. Theirs, one of the greatest manufacturing businesses in the United States, has been just to labor, has provided promotion through merit, and, while burdened with the protective tariff exacted by the producers of steel and iron, has never asked for even compensating privilege from the Nation.

The views of such a man, with such a record of honorable success, on the subject of tariff are certainly worthy of public consideration.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A SCIENTIFIC TARIFF.

Much is heard nowadays about a scientific revision of the tariff. I have been endeavoring to find out just what a scientific tariff really means, and have reached the conclusion that it means the application of common sense and honesty, not only in the revision of the tariff but in the levying of the tariff itself.

The relative merits of free trade and protection I do not care to discuss. Each has its plausible arguments. The free trader insists that there should be nothing that will interfere with a man selling his product or making his purchases in the best possible market, and that the same freedom of trade should exist between nations as now exists between the individual States of the Union.

On the other hand, the protectionist claims that all countries are natural trade enemies and that a tariff is but one form of expressing the instinct of self-preservation; that it enables new industries to get started, which in turn furnish employment to labor; that the laborer in a protected industry is doubly benefited by the tariff, personally, because it has given him employment and generally, because anything that gives employment benefits all; hence everyone is benefited either directly or indirectly. Undoubtedly this has been true in hundreds of cases in this country, but that does not prove that a tariff is necessarily a good thing when it is applied to every infant industry just because it is an infant industry.

My idea of a scientific or common-sense tariff is one that is based upon these principles: First of all, can this industry be profitably developed under all the circumstances? Second, does it need help or protection to get started? And, third, if protected in getting a start, will it, when started, be able to take care of itself or must it be forever bolstered up by the tariff? Unless these can all be answered in the affirmative a tariff is not only unscientific but nonsensical, not to use a harsher term. There is no sense nor justice in requiring all to pay a higher price so that a very few may be temporarily or permanently benefited.

There should be not only a possible profitable development of the industry, but a very strong probability that the industry when once started will be able to take care of itself and show a profit without the help of the tariff in order to justify its imposition in the beginning.

Another instance for the application of a scientific tariff, although at first thought it may not seem that a tariff should be levied at all, is in the case of a country whose agricultural wealth has been greatly depleted and which produces goods that we require, but which, because of lack of skill and training, we can not advantageously produce, while we in turn are exporting food products to that country. A common-sense method of handling this situation would be to induce these people to emigrate to this country where their skill and training would find a ready market, while at the same time they could secure their foodstuffs to better advantage. This would obviate the present expensive method. In advocating this I do it on the theory that these people would make a desirable class of citizens. One of the indirect benefits of such an emigration would be that these people would help to populate and develop the country.

Having pointed out the general principles which underlie a scientific or common-sense tariff, with illustrations thereof, let me now cite a few instances in which a tariff would not only be unscientific and nonsensical but positively harmful to the community at large. Such would be the imposition of a tariff to protect and develop an industry in which we are at a decided disadvantage; for example, the tin industry in California or the raising of pineapples or bananas in this country.

An equally palpable blunder would be to attempt to force the development of any line of business in which we are at a disadvantage, when by so doing we would bring in an undesirable class of people. Our experience in attempting to develop the silk industry is an illustration of my point. Before the introduction of a high duty on silk we were buying our silks abroad from countries where the workmen did not receive in excess of $1 per day. These wages formed the basis of the price which we were compelled to pay for the silk we consumed. But when the high tariff was levied we brought these men over here, paid them $3 a day, and since then we have purchased our silks at a price fixed on that basis. In many cases these people turned out to be undesirable citizens. Thus the tariff failed to produce any good at all.

Another illustration of our extremely unscientific tariff is a tariff that has for its object the protection of an agricultural product. If it can not be raised to advantage in our soil—that is, in successful competition with any other country—it would be better to buy it elsewhere and devote our soil and energy to the things that we can produce advantageously and profitably.

Practically all of the land of this country has either been given away by the Government or sold by it to the farmer at $1.25 an acre. The amount of money that has been made from the products of these farms and through the increased value of the land is something stupendous. It represents probably 75 per cent of the entire wealth of the country. I can imagine nothing more absurd or ungrateful than for the owners of this land to ask for protection for any of their products. When they do so they become greater hogs than the hogs they raise.

What is true of the agricultural products is equally true of the lumber and mineral products. They are parallel cases. Immense fortunes have come from what was essentially a gift in the first instance. Then for the owners of the land, after all that has been given them, to ask for protection for its products is very selfish, to say the least.

The Americans have always boasted of their great mechanical ability and of the agricultural and mineral richness of their country. There is not the slightest doubt but that the American mechanic is the most able and productive mechanic in the world and that we have a greater wealth of natural resources than any other country. Either the above statements are not true or a protective tariff is not necessary. For surely a combination of the greatest natural resources and greatest mechanical ability should be able to compete with the world. In view of these facts it is entirely inconsistent for this country to perpetually maintain a protective tariff on anything.

Undoubtedly the general idea of protection is that given at the beginning, namely, the protection of those lines in which we can come very near competing with foreign countries without any tariff assistance, but that these infants should not be protected after they are on their feet. It is one thing to help a child to his feet and quite another to act as a crutch for him to lean on the rest of his life. The public has been taxed enough in helping them to get established and should be relieved from furnishing any further assistance. Any further help is mulcting the general public.

When an industry has been established a great many years, there has been an abundant opportunity to determine whether its goods can be produced in this country to advantage or not. Then if the people engaged in it continue to ask for protection it would seem to be conclusive evidence that it never should have been protected.

To continue this protection to any considerable extent after they are on their feet is nothing short of highway robbery, and when these people become bold and arrogant and form large combinations for the purpose of robbing the public it is time that the American people sat up and took notice.

But this abuse of the tariff, despicable as it is, is not its worst feature. The worst feature of a high or unjust tariff is that it corrupts the public service, demoralizes the public, and offers an incentive for smuggling, undervaluation, etc. It leads to the bribing of Congressmen, revenue officers, and everyone who is in any way connected with the administration of the tariff law. Evidence that this demoralization permeates every corner and class of the country is too recent to need mention. Exposures in New York, where large quantities of foreign goods are being received continually, are so numerous that except in rare cases they cause no comment.

Undervaluation and fraud have been reduced to a science. Every possible scheme has been diligently studied that the Government may be defrauded with ease and dispatch. Some time ago a gentleman engaged in the manufacture of crockery informed me that a German firm had taken a man out of the internal-revenue department at New York City and was paying him $100,000 a year to look after its interest in defrauding the Government.

This country is full of men who apparently stand pretty well in society and business, but who defraud the Government whenever they have any possible opportunity to do so, and they have abundant opportunity. Let me illustrate just how far this has gone. Some years ago a highly respectable firm in New York City wanted to get spelter into this country without paying a duty, so they had it made in the form of statuary, which was not subject to duty. After getting the statuary safely deposited here, they proceeded to have it melted and put back in the form of spelter slabs.

But decidedly the worst feature of this demoralization is the smuggling of jewelry, which is carried on to an unlimited extent and by those who are called our very best people, and particularly by the women. In fact, persons who would not think of stealing $5 will defraud the Government out of thousands of dollars in this way, and instead of considering it disgraceful they will frequently boast of it. The same may be said of opium, which demoralizes in more ways than one. What is true of jewelry and opium applies equally to many lines of expensive fabrics which are easily concealed.

I think this is another argument in favor of a scientific, honest tariff. In other words, I believe that a scientific tariff would not tend to make thieves and liars of people to such an extent as our present tariff does. It is my opinion that it would be much better to have no tariff at all on such articles and raise the revenue in some other way than to use a method which has such demoralizing effects.

Nine-tenths of the people who defraud the Government justify it on the ground of the unreasonableness of the tariff, but that is no excuse in morals. Of course a man is unfortunate when his fellow men feel justified in defrauding him, but a Government is doubly unfortunate when its people feel that way toward it, and especially so when they can point out glaring inconsistencies, absurd classifications and distinctions, and excessive duties, where, according to the true principle of the protective tariff, there should be no tariff at all.

This is not said in extenuation of those who defraud the Government—far from it; but character is not particularly abundant to-day, and if the Government can do nothing to build up character in its people it certainly can ill afford to make laws whose tendency is to destroy what little character the people now have and whose effect is altogether reprehensible.

[From the Valve World, July, 1911.]

OUR PRESENT UNSCIENTIFIC TARIFF.

In the Valve World, January, 1911, we published an article giving our ideas of what constitutes a scientific tariff. We wish at this time to consider the question of an unscientific tariff, or one which is not constructed in a business-like way, but consists principally in giving everybody what they ask for as a payment for campaign contributions.

In the previous article we laid down the following principles as the basis of a scientific tariff. First, can the industry be profitably developed under all the circumstances; second, does it need help or protection to get started; third, if given protection to get started, will it, when started, be able to take care of itself, or must it be forever protected? Our contention is that unless the above questions can be answered in the affirmative a protective tariff should not be levied.

Judged by the above principles, or by any other principle, our present tariff is highly unscientific. It is founded on no scientific principle; it makes no effort to discover whether the industry can ever be practically developed or not. It pays even less attention to whether an industry really needs any help in getting started. Third, and most reprehensible of all, it assumes that the industry once protected must be forever protected; that the infant industry which has become an industrial giant shall be most liberally protected. The whole thing is a crazy-quilt, hodgepodge affair. The tariffs are largely returns for campaign "fat," tariff favors being promised and awarded in proportion to the liberality of the campaign contributions of the interested parties. It was framed with the deliberate intention of aiding the few at the expense of the many.

HOW TARIFFS ARE MADE.

Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the tariff committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, gives the best explanation of the method pursued that we have noticed. He says, "The people instruct and trust Congress to grant just, equitable, and ample protection; Congress trusts the Ways and Means Committee; this committee trusts such persons as Dalzell, PAYNE, Aldrich, etc., and they trust the trusts." The method is very simple, very convenient, and very satisfactory indeed to the protected interests who write their own tariff schedules.

He relates an instance of where a representative of the Government was asked for relief from a tariff schedule. He referred the party to a New England manufacturer, agreeing to act in accordance with this protected manufacturer's wishes. Said the manufacturer, "I wrote that schedule myself, and I will not consent to a modification of it." The present unscientific, not to say dishonest and tricky manner of making a tariff, is so patent to any observer that it is not worth while to discuss it.

The tariff is highly unscientific because it is not needed. The last thing that this country needs is a protective tariff. A protective tariff, practically considered, has for its object the supplementing of nature and man to this extent, that the conditions of production shall be as nearly equalized as possible, and to that extent only. Therefore if a country is extremely rich in natural resources, especially favored in climate, and blessed with an inventive people, the whole combination making for a greater per capita production and hence a decreased unit cost of production, it follows that that country does not need and should not have a protective tariff, except possibly as a makeshift for raising revenue. The advisability of using the tariff as a revenue producer is not within the scope of this article.

CONDITIONS FAVORABLE TO CHEAP UNIT COST OF PRODUCTION.

Conditions in America are, on the whole, more favorable to a cheaper unit cost of production than in any other country. Climate and blood under the fostering care of Democracy have produced the American laborer, who, because of his intelligence, his ingenuity, his inventiveness, and his efficiency is at once the wonder and the admiration of the world.

Add to these our wonderful natural resources, the juxtaposition in which they are often found, and our wonderful growth of capital, and together they form a combination which should enable us to meet and vanquish the world. We not only should, but we can and are doing it to-day. The boast of America has always been that she has the greatest agricultural and mineral resources, the greatest mechanical ability, and the most productive laborers. These boasts are every one true.

No argument is necessary to prove the truth of the above statement in regard to the richness of America's natural resources. A catalogue of the ingenious and useful inventions is but a roll call of American inventors. To anyone who has considered the question the efficiency of the American workman, as compared with any other, is equally apparent. Why, then, is a protective tariff needed to equalize conditions of production when every advantage is in favor of this country?

To-day America stands head and shoulders above the world in manufacturing, and consequently the manufacturing interests no longer need a protective tariff. The world's working power is estimated to have doubled in the last half century, due largely to the use of steam. During the same period America's efficiency has increased tenfold, while that of her nearest competitor has increased only fourfold.

Just what this means in the volume of output and in decreased cost of production is certainly not appreciated, even if understood, and least of all by Americans. It is claimed that 50,000 people, with the aid of machinery, now do what it required 16,000,000 persons to do a few years ago. Man for man the American laborer produces 50 per cent more by hand labor and 100 per cent more by machine labor than any of his competitors. The following furnishes a good illustration: In Lancastershire a man who can tend two looms is counted a very fair workman; in New England a man who can not tend eight looms is rated as an apprentice, and paid accordingly. As a result we have risen from fourth to a close second in textiles, eclipsed Sheffield in cutlery, and now produce one-third of the hardware of the world, while consuming but one-seventh.

High-priced labor produces a cheaper article than low-priced labor. Manufacturers say that they can profitably export hardware which contains a great deal of labor and a small amount of raw material, but that they can not export hardware in which the raw material constitutes a large proportion of the value.

WHY ARGUE? WE ARE EXPORTERS.

After all, what is the use of arguing this question? Why not take the facts? The fact that we are exporting all the great staples in manufacturing lines in successful competition with the world is absolutely conclusive evidence that no protection is needed. We can not afford to take our time nor that of our readers to go exhaustively into what articles we are exporting, but will mention only a few.

Everyone, of course, knows that we are exporting enormous quantities of steel; agricultural implements by the shipload; locomotives, sewing machines, typewriters, electrical machinery, and shiploads of machinists' tools, and it follows that if we can profitably export these lines we can also do the same on all collateral lines.

The steam engine is the product of skilled labor, and yet we defy competition. We commenced exporting locomotives very soon after they were invented. Our people took large contracts for them in Russia, and have been exporting them in large quantities ever since.

In the last three years they have been supplied to Great Britain, France, and southern Germany, and remember, they were formerly our competitors in South America. Skilled labor constructs our electrical machinery, and yet we fear no foreign competition, even in the markets of the world. Our agricultural machinery is made by skilled labor, and yet we export it to all countries. Our sewing machines are manufactured by skilled labor, yet scarce a country could be named where they can not be found.

The list could be extended to include practically every item in the nine groups of articles of domestic manufacture which form the principal manufactured articles exported from the United States. These nine groups, which form about 80 per cent of the total value of manufactures exported, are iron and steel manufactures, $179,133,186; copper manufactures, $88,004,397; agricultural implements, $28,124,033; wood manufactures, $14,570,064; mineral oils, refined, $93,813,031; chemicals, drugs, dyes, etc., $21,415,935; leather and manufactures of leather, $52,646,755; cotton manufactures, $33,397,097; paper and manufactures of paper, $16,083,271.

AMERICA CAN MANUFACTURE CHEAPER.

Our preeminence abroad is directly due to the products of our factories and workshops. In discussing the cause of our rapid rise and domination of the industrial world the Hamburger Fremdenblatt says: "The steel manufactories of the United States, which two decades ago were in their infancy, to-day control the markets and the prices of the world and have attained not only a position that enables them to compete with the older iron and steel producing countries, but even to profitably export their products to England"—and why not? Mr. Dalzell, who represents Pittsburgh in Congress, and who should be competent to speak of conditions in the iron and steel industry, was asked:

"Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania name me any steel mill in the world that can make steel rails cheaper than they are made at Pittsburgh? Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania name me any iron furnace in the world that can make pig iron cheaper than at Birmingham?"

Mr. Dalzell answered: "I think not; I am coming to that question." That question was never answered by Mr. Dalzell; to answer it truthfully would at once break down the whole theory of the protectionists, because if steel can be manufactured at Pittsburgh cheaper than anywhere else, and iron in Birmingham cheaper than elsewhere, there can be no excuse for a protective tariff on such products either to protect the manufacturers or the laboring men employed in those industries, for no one can successfully compete with them.

For 25 years the American workingman has been told that he receives higher wages than the English workman solely because of protection, but he now knows this can not be true, because the English workman receives higher wages than the German workman, although the German tariff is higher than the tariff of Great Britain. Protection does not make good wages. The American workman receives higher wages because of his greater intelligence and skill and because of the greater hope which free institutions give; because of improved machinery, because of the better conditions that surround him. In a word, because he produces more; that is, earns more.

Down to 1890 the imports of iron and steel were far in excess of our exports. It is now calculated by the Bureau of Statistics that during the 10 years ending June 30, 1910, the value of iron and steel manufactures exported was more than four times the value of the imports of iron and steel for the last decade. At the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1910, manufactures formed 45 per cent of our total exports as compared with 35 per cent in 1900 and 21 per cent in 1890. For 1910 automobiles and parts of automobiles exported was to the value of $11,190,220; manufactures of india rubber, $10,175,634; scientific instruments, $12,535,643.

To-day every manufacturing country in the world looks upon America as her greatest rival. From the above facts several conclusions appear. America has secured her position in the markets of the world on her merits. She has had no encouragement from foreign countries in entering their markets, but has entered them, in many cases, in the face of great prejudice. Patriotism has tended to make the entry extremely difficult. Consequently America has won her supremacy strictly on the merits of her products or on her prices, or on both.

Therefore, if the American manufacturer can successfully compete abroad when paying a high price for raw material caused by the tariff, he certainly could more successfully compete if he had cheaper raw material. Especially would this be true of the large number of manufacturers whose completed product is not protected, but whose raw material is. The success of the American manufacturer under the present adverse conditions demonstrates conclusively our contention that the American manufacturer neither needs nor deserves a protective tariff. It merely serves to enrich the favored class at the expense of the whole people. It is as wrong in theory as it is reprehensible in practice.

AMERICAN LABORER IN SUCCESSFUL COMPETITION WITH THE WORLD.

Advocates of protection insist that it would be manifestly unfair to put the American laborer in competition with the cheaper labor of other countries. As a matter of fact, he is in successful competition with that very labor in its home countries to-day, as we have shown above. It might be added that as a rule the workers in the most highly protected industries in America labor under the worst conditions, as the investigations at Homestead and elsewhere have shown.

This plea is a fraud. Consider for a moment the number of laborers affected by foreign competition. If the proportion of other censuses govern, there is not to exceed 1,500,000 laborers, those in gainful occupations, who could possibly be affected by foreign competition, while there are about 28,000,000 in gainful occupations who would not be affected. Since when does 1,500,000 deserve more consideration than the 28,000,000? No effort is made to protect the American laborer from the foreign laborer who comes to this country, brings his standard of living and wages with him, and who is employed in some highly protected industry.

This talk that protection is wanted in order to protect the laborer is simply one of the means used by the protectionists to pull the wool over the eyes of the public, and is on a par with the claim that the big manufacturers demand a tariff in order to protect the small manufacturer.

Were the tariff to disappear, the American manufacturer could more easily continue his conquest of foreign markets. This would give an added impetus to manufacturing which would in turn furnish more employment for labor and tend to give employment for the large amounts of capital that are being exported. We are exporting not only the products of our factories and workshops, but money, skilled laborers, and brains. Within the last few years a number of our large concerns have established plants in Europe, Mexico, and Canada and elsewhere for the manufacture of goods for which there is an active demand. We have established plants for the manufacture of electrical supplies in Canada, England, and France; air brakes in Russia, England, and Germany; shoe machinery at Frankfort on the Main; and tanners' machinery at Frankfort, Vienna, Liecester; radiators in Germany, England, and Italy; and so on. Thus the Government is deprived of the duty which this raw material would bring; the foreign laborers receive the wages that should go to American laborers, while America's exports fall off to just that extent.

Therefore the real object of a protective tariff—the employment of both capital and labor at home—are both being defeated by our present tariff. Hence a protective tariff under such conditions is an inconsistency, a fraud, and a worker of injustice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, even the distinguished chairman of the committee which drew the measure now under consideration does not claim it to be a perfect one. It falls far short even of his ideal. It is in large part a compromise of conflicting elements, and in certain details it is sadly disappointing, especially to those who had hoped that in a Democratic tariff no vestige of privilege or favoritism would be found.

But faulty as the measure may be in particular items, far as it falls short of perfection, sadly as it may lack in consistency, it is still a long step in the right direction. It has merits so surpassing that its shortcomings are almost negligible; it goes so long a way toward the redemption of Democratic promises and the fulfillment of popular expectation that even the free trader like myself may applaud it with sincerity and vote for it without stultification.

Had I been writing it items which now find a place in the dutiable list would certainly have been dropped therefrom. In a score, or perhaps a hundred, instances duties which seem to me excessive and indefensible upon any revenue ground would have been brought lower, if not eliminated. But in a matter of this sort it is a question of give and take. Something must be yielded here and something yielded there; but if the main purpose shall be kept in sight these concessions can not greatly detract from the final result.

And so in this Underwood tariff we find an achievement along Democratic lines which may well appeal to Democrats of all shades and all persuasions. It so splendidly enlarges the free list that we may forgive its errors in the direction of accorded privileges to special interests. It so generously answers the prayer of the masses for cheaper food, cheaper clothing, cheaper farm implements, cheaper lumber, cheaper manufactures of all sorts that it is possible to disregard the lapses from grace which here and there obtrude in certain of the schedules.

Not since the Walker tariff of 1846 have we had one drawn so nearly in harmony with the revenue idea. It goes further toward the unshackling of trade and industry than any other tariff which this generation has known. And we may well anticipate that its results will be equally salutary, for, like the Walker tariff, it is bound to stimulate industry of every sort. It can not fail to lift burdens from the masses and make it possible for the man of toil to stand more erect and free. The Walker tariff inaugurated an era of prosperity the like of which had not been known before and which has not since been surpassed. This is not my testimony alone; it is the testimony of the late James G. Blaine. As a historian he was compelled to tell the truth about the tremendous awakening which followed the so-called free-trade enactment. It was not a free-trade measure any more than this one is, but it was a measure insuring freer trade; it was one which conceded the least to favor and the most to desert; it was one which held out the fewest premiums to the classes and the fullest inducements to the masses.

But it is said that a lowering of tariff rates will react unfavorably upon wages. This might be true if there were any relation direct or remote between tariff rates and wage rates. No such relation now exists or ever did exist. Wages no more depend upon tariff schedules than they do on the tides. In the last analysis they depend upon what labor can produce on the best free land in use. And so it was urged in the argument supporting the Walker tariff that what labor needed was not protection but opportunity; it needed access to the land; this denied, wages were bound to decline, no matter how high tariff rates might be lifted.

We have had 50 years of protection, yet in relation to the product labor is receiving less to-day than it was half a century ago. Even nominal wages are scarcely higher in 1913 than they were in 1860. Measured in the product they are actually lower. That is to say, while labor is producing on the average a much greater volume of wealth, it is retaining a relatively smaller proportion in wages. It is therefore not so well paid relatively as it was before protection set up shop as the dispenser of alleged benefits to the worker.

When one begins to look into the real effects of a tariff it is found that they are different from those usually advertised. Not only does it fail to keep faith with labor, it equally fails to keep faith with capital as capital, for it robs both, it discourages both, it impairs the development of both. It does this by diverting both from the normal and the natural into the abnormal and the unnatural; it draws them away from the naturally productive employments into employments which can succeed only at the expense of other employments; and in the long run every tariff benefit is absorbed by the owners of natural resources. Thus a tariff on lumber slips through the hands of lumber workers and lumber manufacturers into those of the owners of stumpage. A tariff on sugar does not benefit the cane grower as a cane grower or the labor employed in sugar making; it is reaped by the owner of sugar lands. And so all along the line. It is true of iron; it is true of coal; it is true of citrus fruits; it has been true of every single industry for which tariffs have been laid on the theory that those employed in them or who had money invested in them were to reap benefits in higher wages or augmented interest. The benefits, in fact, have always accrued at last to the owners of the sources of supply.

If this could be once understood in all its real and vital significance by the masses of the people, the end of all tariffs would soon be reached. [Applause.] But the world has so fuddled itself regarding wages and tariffs and the relation of the one to the other and there has been such hopeless confusion of counsel with respect to the ultimate effects of protection upon business in general that it is almost impossible to get the average man to study the questions at issue in the light of reason or even in the light of actual experience. There might something be said for the tariff proposition if under protection we had always and everywhere enjoyed prosperity, with high wages, satisfactory profits, and a diffused social comfort. But under the very highest protection ever known we have undergone some of our very worst depressions, with wages sinking to the minimum, with employment precarious, with credit unsettled, with all industry in a state of paralysis, and with general conditions so distressing that the very foundations of society seemed to be crumbling. Nor has this been peculiar to our own land. The very same phenomena have been witnessed repeatedly in other lands where protection was supposed to spread its beneficence over all. It has been the same delusion there as we have found it here. It has never in any country or at any time kept its promises to those who accorded it a place in their scheme of things.

It is the failing of our Republican friends that they are somewhat like the African, with his crooked stick. To it he ascribed all the good things which happened to him. All the bad things he ascribed to something else. And is not this precisely what our protectionist friends are doing and have always done? Do they not ascribe all our prosperity, our growth, our expansion, our progress, and our development to the blessed tariff, while ascribing to something else the panics and depressions which have come upon us under that tariff? As a matter of fact, the tariff has neither bred nor prevented these panics and depressions. They have come in spite of tariffs, and they would recur were tariffs to be wiped out root and branch. But tariffs have undoubtedly played some part in them, though generally but a small part, the real cause of them lying in the monopoly of opportunity and in the evils springing therefrom. If one will but take the trouble to study the history of industrial depressions in this and other countries he will discover that they have always and everywhere been preceded by a speculative rise in land values.

That Robert J. Walker, away back in the first half of the last century, saw the wage question in its true relations, and that he most effectually disposed of the protectionist claim that wages depend upon tariff schedules, is shown by the report he submitted to Congress as Secretary of the Treasury. In that reoprt he said, among other things:

It is an argument urged in favor of the tariff that we ought to protect our labor against what is called the pauper labor of Europe. But while the tariff does not enhance the wages of labor, the sales of public lands at low prices and in limited quantities to settlers and cultivators would accomplish this object. If those who live by the wages of labor could purchase 320 acres for $80, 160 acres for $40, 80 acres for $20, or a 40-acre lot for $10 the power of the manufacturing capitalist in reducing the wages of labor would be greatly diminished, because when these lands were thus reduced in price those who live by the wages of labor could purchase farms at low rates and cultivate the soil for themselves and families instead of working for others 12 hours a day in the manufactories.

The logic of Walker's position is as true to-day as it was in 1845, and that logic is a complete refutation of the protectionist argument; it is a complete answer to every question raised in support of the Republican proposition that the tariff raises and maintains wages. The tariff never did anything of the sort. The lowest wages ever paid in the steel mills of my town were paid under the highest kind of protection, and the salient fact should never be lost sight of that the highest wages obtaining in this country are commanded by labor in industries where so-called protection is impossible.

We have heard a good deal in the course of the discussion on this bill of the decline of agriculture in the United States, and alarmist pictures have been drawn in this connection, some going so far as to predict that we should soon cease to be an exporting country, so far as foodstuffs are concerned, and that we must look forward to the time when we must go abroad for these. But why has agriculture declined in the United States relatively, if not actually? Is not the answer obvious? Has it not relatively declined simply because of the stupendous premiums we have been holding out to labor and capital to engage in manufacturing? How could it be expected that, with lures of 40, 50, 75, 100, and even 250 per cent premiums dangled before them in the shape of tariff duties, labor and capital could be kept on the farm?

If there has been anything in the last 50 years of Republican legislation which has not been actually discouraging to agriculture, the fact has been overlooked by most observers, for not only has enterprise been tempted away from the soil by the special rewards offered to it in making steel and weaving cloth and blowing glass and producing a thousand and one things in mills and factories, but we have gone further than this in driving capital and labor from the primitive pursuit by compelling the tiller of the soil to pay tribute to sugar, to steel, to copper, to lumber, to woolens, to chemicals, to leather, and to 500 other protected interests.

Mr. Chairman, I come from the seat of one of the largest steel plants in America. It is, in fact, the mother of all the other steel plants on American soil. It has grown great and it is growing steadily greater, less by reason of the protection it has been accorded by Republican legislation than because for many long years it has enjoyed exemption from local and State taxation on its products. For in Pennsylvania we have been enlightened at least to this extent—that for a generation or more we have ceased fining men for manufacturing. We still fine them for building houses and for having certain kinds of property in their possession, but we no longer fine them for producing iron and steel and textiles and all the myriad things coming from our mills and factories. This is the one advantage which Pennsylvania has enjoyed over her sister manufacturing States, and she has surpassed them all in many lines simply because this advantage was like that of a discriminating freight rate in her favor. Pennsylvania has been called the royal palace of King Steel, and surely he has luxuriated there if any where. But Pennsylvania has been his royal palace much more because our great State has refused to punish him for operating his furnaces and transforming ore into the finished product than because Congress has built a tariff wall at our coasts to protect him from his foreign rivals. And I have not the least fear that the great steel mills in my town will cease operations, or even relax operations, because of the changes we have made in the steel schedule. Those mills are now running to capacity; they are meeting competition in the open markets of the world; they are growing steadily in capacity and in the volume of output; and I feel that the time has gone by when the 25,000 men employed in them can be frightened by the old bogie which was once so effective.

I shall be greatly disappointed should this tariff fail enormously to stimulate both imports and exports. As freer trade relations with the Philippines and Porto Rico have stimulated trade between those islands and the United States, and as both the islands and the United States have been tremendous gainers through this growth of commerce, it is fair to assume that freer trade relations with the world in general will produce similar results. Freedom in trade has never failed to bring an answer in better social conditions, higher wages, and a fairer distribution of wealth. And it seems to me that if our protectionist friends would but look around them and consider the tremendous fact that the United States comprises the largest free-trade area in all the world, they would look to this rather than to their fetish of protection as the true explanation of the progress and prosperity which have been ours in such generous and unrivaled measure. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in the course of a short address in the House yesterday the Hon. SAMUEL W. SMITH, of Michigan, declared that the Democrats could not point to any free trade or tariff for revenue legislation which did not injuriously affect all our industries. He said:

It is not possible for one of you gentlemen to point to any free trade or tariff for revenue legislation in this country under which we have not had results like we had in 1837, in 1857, between 1893 and 1897, and I am frank to say to-day that I would like to have somebody give to the country some consolation and comfort that we can hope that this bill will be an exception to every other tariff for revenue or free-trade piece of legislation written on the statute books.

Were we to produce the testimony of Democratic authorities or even the testimony of disinterested and impartial observers to prove that the Walker tariff law (under which the lowest tariff duties were levied) produced the greatest period of prosperity this country has ever known, our Republican friends would say that we were attempting to falsify history for political effect.

Therefore I will produce the testimony of a man who for a generation was the acknowledged and undisputed national leader of the Republican Party; he was Speaker of this House, a Member of the Senate, the Republican candidate for the Presidency in 1884, and Secretary of State under two Republican administrations. I have reference to your great popular idol, James G. Blaine. As a philosophical historian he was obliged to confine himself to the facts and tell the whole truth in his admirable work "Twenty Years in Congress." In that great work he said:

TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS.

[By James G. Blaine.]

The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant any attempt, even had there been a desire, to change the tariff. Gen. Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure; and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character. Moreover, the tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue; and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his administration was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849; large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent; and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government and had gradually become a free-trade party. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for a time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people, but among the protective economists and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented presidential candidates.

It was not surprising, therefore, that with a plethoric condition of the National Treasury for two or three consecutive years the Democratic Congress in the closing sessions of Pierce's administration enacted what has since been known as the tariff of 1857. By this law the duties were placed lower than they had been at any time since the War of 1812. The act was well received by the people and was indeed concurred in by a considerable proportion of the Republican Party. * * *

The free traders consider the tariff of 1846 to be conclusive proof of the beneficial effect of low duties. They challenge a comparison of the years of its operation, between 1846 and 1857, with any other period of the history of the country. Manufacturing, they say, was not forced by a hothouse process to produce high-priced goods for popular consumption, but was gradually encouraged and developed on a healthful and self-sustaining basis not to be shaken as a reed in the wind by every change in the financial world. Commerce, as they point out, made great advances; and our carrying trade grew so rapidly that in 10 years from the day the tariff of 1846 was passed our tonnage exceeded the tonnage of England. The free traders refer with special emphasis to what they term the symmetrical development of all the great interests of the country under this liberal tariff. Manufactures were not stimulated at the expense of the commercial interest. Both were developed in harmony, while agriculture, the indispensable basis of all, was never more flourishing. The farmers and planters at no other period of our history were in receipt of such good prices, steadily paid to them in gold coin, for their surplus product, which they could send to the domestic market over our own railways and to the foreign market in our own ships.

Now, I admit that the low duties under the tariff law of 1833 were a factor in producing the industrial depression of 1837, and that the low duties under the tariff law of 1846 produced the industrial depression of 1857; but they were not produced in the way the Republicans imagine. The fact is that low duties have always and everywhere produced periods of marvelous material prosperity; that this prosperity has naturally and necessarily increased the demand for land; the increased demand for land has increased its economic value, and this in turn has led to land speculation. The speculative advance of land values tends to force capital and labor to less productive fields, thus reducing their proportionate shares in the aggregate wealth produced by their combined efforts. It is evident that speculative rent can only advance at the expense of labor and capital, and that the only way that they can counteract the forcing down of wages and interest is by the cessation of production.

Take any industrial community in which population is increasing and the consequent cooperation of individual powers is developing old industries and creating new ones, and land must increase in value, constantly and continuously. This assured increase of land values naturally leads to speculation, in which future increase is confidently expected, and speculative values are forced beyond the point at which, under the normal conditions of production, their usual earnings would be received by labor and capital. Their failure to receive their just returns disposes them to stop production. This cessation of production at some parts of the industrial system must necessarily show itself at others in a lessening of effective demand, which retards production there, and thus the depression communicates itself through the whole industrial system, resulting ultimately in widespread industrial depression. This is how seasons of marvelous material prosperity and progress have produced industrial depressions and financial panics.

The taxation of land value, irrespective of improvements, would remedy this by destroying the incentive to land speculation.

During this debate much has been heard from the other side of the Chamber regarding the low labor cost of production abroad in comparison with labor cost in the United States. I deny that we are at any such disadvantage, and I reassert the proposition that ours is actually the cheapest labor on earth. And in this connection I want to call attention to the testimony of Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, a Republican of high standing, formerly a Secretary of the Treasury, and to-day regarded as one of the foremost business men of the country. He went abroad soon after his retirement from the Treasury Department to study the commercial and economic conditions of Europe, and on his return he wrote a series of articles for an American magazine, not included in the "yellow" or muckraking class, on "The American commercial invasion of Europe." Let me quote from Mr. Vanderlip to show the idleness of the talk on the other side of our inability to cope with European competitors on account of our so-called higher wages and higher standard of living. Here is what that eminent Republican authority says:

THE AMERICAN "COMMERCIAL INVASION" OF EUROPE.

(By Frank A. Vanderlip, in Scribner's Magazine, January, 1902, p. 10.)

American locomotives, running on American rails, now whistle past the Pyramids and across the long Siberian steppes. They carry the Hindoo pilgrims from all parts of their Empire to the sacred waters of the Ganges. Three years ago there was but one American locomotive in the United Kingdom; to-day there is not a road of importance there on which trains are not being pulled by American locomotives. The American locomotive has successfully invaded France. The Manchurian Railway, which is the real beginning of oriental railway building, bought all its rails and rolling stock in the United States. American bridges span rivers on every continent. American cranes are swinging over many foreign moles. Wherever there are extensive harvests there may be found American machinery to gather the grain. In every great market of the world tools can have no better recommendation than the mark "Made in America."

We have long held supremacy as a producer of cotton. We are now gaining supremacy as makers of cloths. American cottons are finding their way into the markets of every country. They can be found in Manchester, as well as on the shores of Africa and in the native shops of the Orient. Bread is baked in Palestine from flour made in Minneapolis. American windmills are working east of the Jordan and in the land of Bashan. Phonographs are making a conquest of all tongues. The chrysanthemum banner of Japan floats from the palace of the Mikado on a flagstaff cut from a Washington forest, as does the banner of St. George from Windsor Castle. The American typesetting machines are used by foreign newspapers, and our cash registers keep accounts for scores of nations. America makes sewing machines for the world. Our bicycles are standards of excellence everywhere. Our typewriters are winning their way wherever a written language is used. In all kinds of electrical appliances we have become the foremost producer. In many European cities American dynamos light streets and operate railways. Much of the machinery that is to electrify London tram lines is now being built in Pittsburgh. The American shoe has captured the favor of all Europe, and the foreign makers are hastening to import our machinery, that they may compete with our makers. In the Far East, in the capital of Korea, the Hermit Nation, there was recently inaugurated, with noisy music and flying banners, an electric railway, built of American material by a San Francisco engineer, and now it is operated by American motormen.

Also, in Scribner's Magazine of February, 1902, page 202:

In Vienna I met an American who is at the head of one of the large boiler works in this country. He has been interested in making comparisons of the cost of labor and of the methods of work in the Viennese factories, and I found him amazed at the wasteful methods and the high labor cost that resulted from the Austrian manufacturers failing to use modern machinery.

"I was informed in one shop," he told me, "that a boiler of about 150 horsepower cost for labor alone $750." That boiler would have been built in an up-to-date shop in America for a labor cost of $150. In the United States three workmen with modern tools would accomplish as much in one day as would be done by four workmen in a Vienna shop working one week. The cost of labor in the United States would be about $5, the men receiving for this class of rough work a little more than $1.50 a day. Of the four men in the Vienna shop, two would receive 80 cents a day, one 60 cents, and one 40 cents; but even at those low wages the total labor cost there would be $15.60 against about $5 with us. I found an almost total absence of labor-saving machinery in some of the largest shops in Vienna; plates were being handled by hand; there were no riveting machines, no traveling cranes, no modern hoists.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask now how the time is balanced?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The gentleman from Alabama has used 13 hours and 47 minutes and the gentleman from New York has used 14 hours and 8 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. About 20 minutes in my favor.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-one minutes difference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I do not desire to force the Members on his side of the House to speak at this time in the evening, and if it is agreeable to him I will move that the committee rise, and will then move that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock, so that they may have a full audience.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has just been asking me for time. I do not know whether he wants it now or when he wants it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let me say, if the gentleman from Alabama will yield, that I asked the gentleman from New York for time and he refused to grant me any time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the House that we have had 45 minutes to-day.

Mr. MURDOCK. And we have had none.

Mr. PAYNE. You are not entitled to any yet. I have told the gentleman from Kansas that I would yield to him the next time I got time, and, to say the least, it is unfair for him to make any such statement as he has made to the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. I asked the gentleman if he would yield to me, and he refused to answer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if other gentlemen desire to go on, I am willing to stay here now. If not, in fairness to the minority, so that gentlemen on that side of the House may have a reasonable audience, if it is agreeable, I will move that the committee rise and to take a recess and come back at half past 7.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama, if we take a recess, can we have a chance to accommodate those who want to speak after half past 7?

Mr. PAYNE. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Kansas shall have time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman endeavor to accommodate us between that time and 11 o'clock?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will endeavor to run as late as we can to accommodate everybody, but I have no control of the time on that side of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I am willing that the gentleman from Kansas shall have 30 minutes now, if he wants it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why did not the gentleman from New York say that a few minutes ago when I went and asked him?

Mr. PAYNE. I told him the next time I got time I would yield to him for 30 minutes. I said that very distinctly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to go on now?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would prefer to take a recess.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. The gentleman from Kansas says he prefers to go on after supper.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, you gentlemen both prefer to go on when there is a crowd here.

Mr. MURDOCK. Suppose the gentleman from New York takes 30 minutes now.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from New York wants to keep things pretty nearly on an even keel, as he can not get any understanding with reference to an equitable division for Monday. I do not care to take 30 minutes now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 26, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as member of the committee appointed to attend the unveiling of the Jefferson statue at St. Louis.

Very truly, yours, FRANK P. WOODS.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. PROUTY in the place of Mr. WOODS.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until half past 7 this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts to act as Speaker pro tempore for the evening.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 7.30 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 7.30 o'clock p. m. by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321—the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321—the tariff bill—with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, it has been but a few days since this tariff bill was presented to the House, and therefore there has not been sufficient time for the Members to give careful consideration to the 660 paragraphs of the various schedules and the free list, which, taken together, comprise more than 4,000 separate items.

Each of these items raises a distinct tariff question. A Member may have made a careful and extensive study of one or more schedules without thereby learning anything valuable about another. He may, for example, have acquired wide and accurate knowledge of the conditions under which wool is grown and the cost of its production in Argentina, Australia, and South Africa, in Ohio, Michigan, Montana, and Wyoming; he may know manufactures of wool, from carpets to cloths of the most delicate weave; he may be familiar with rates of wages, with capitalization of the industries and with the quantities and prices of the products of factories at home and abroad, but the great labor by which he acquired this information has given him no special knowledge that will enable him to vote intelligently on the fixing of rates on glassware and earthenware, or chemicals, or other goods imported. If there is to be an intelligent vote to fix the various duties, special knowledge of each schedule is necessary, and in some cases special knowledge of each item.

Yet this bill, with its more than 4,000 items, is to be pushed to a final vote in less than three weeks after it has been put into the hands of the Members. There has been and there can be no opportunity for the Members of this House to become familiar with the data on which the rates are based, much less to learn the probable effect of the law upon American industries, upon the wages of workingmen, upon the farmers, or even on the prices to the consumer.

With all respect to the able and distinguished gentlemen who constitute the Democratic majority on the Ways and Means Committee, and who adhere to the majority report of that committee, it may be doubted whether even they have mastered the intricacies of the bill, whether they are able to tell us what its effect will be on prices to the consumer, on the wages of the workingman, or on the prosperity of the manufacturer or the farmer.

To raise such a doubt is not to question either the ability or the diligence of these gentlemen. According to the tariff doctrine which they have adopted, they do not need to know very much about these things. The report of the Ways and Means Committee, presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], repudiates any desire to compare the costs of production at home and abroad or, at any rate, to use the knowledge gained by such comparison in tariff making. I quote from that report:

> The so-called theory of the cost of production as a regulator of rates was fully discussed at the time tariff revision bills were introduced by the Ways and Means Committee during the Sixty-second Congress. It will be recalled that much was said by protection advocates in support of the view that it was incumbent upon the United States to maintain a system of tariff rates that would cover differences in cost of production between the United States and foreign countries in addition to a reasonable margin of profit. That doctrine became the basis of the work of the Tariff Board which furnished reports to the President, later transmitted by the Executive to Congress, concerning wool and woolens, cottons, pulp, and paper. Many manufacturers have presented arguments based on the doctrine of comparative costs. The statement is therefore made that no part of the committee's work has been founded upon a belief in the cost-of-production theory, and the theory is absolutely rejected as a guide to tariff making.

Now, this theory, rejected by the framers of the bill, is one about which the protectionist does and must concern himself. The Progressive Party is pledged to a protective tariff which shall equalize conditions of competition between the United States and foreign countries, both for the farmer and for the manufacturer, and which shall maintain for labor an adequate standard of living. In order to frame such a tariff we desire the creation of a tariff commission for the investigation of facts and conditions which this committee deems so unimportant that the study of them as a guide to tariff making, we are informed, has been no part of the committee's work.

With its peculiar view of the tariff question it follows, of course, that the Democratic Party will have no use for a tariff commission organized to study the costs of production and the general competitive position in this country and abroad of industries seeking protection from Congress. There is a vital difference, therefore, in this respect between the tariff policy embodied in this bill and that to which the Progressive Party is committed.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration, as explained with great frankness by the men who made it, is intended to destroy the economic policy of protection. Let me quote again from the report of the Ways and Means Committee, presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. After reciting the tariff plank from the Democratic platform of 1912, the report says:

> We believe that this pledge contains two essential ideas, both of which have been applied in the formulation of H. R. 3321, as follows:
> 1. The establishment of duties designed primarily to produce revenue for the Government and without thought of protection.
> 2. The attainment of this end by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

For many years we have been told that the Democratic Party believed in a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, but now we are to have a new and radical policy—a tariff for revenue without thought of protection. However radical this may be, it does not go beyond the Democratic platform of 1912. The tariff plank adopted at Baltimore declares that it is—

> A fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue.

This may be now a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party, but it was not always so. James Madison, the father of the Constitution and one of the founders of the Democratic Party, believed that the Federal Government had authority to levy import duties for the purpose of protecting manufactures. On April 9, 1789, in the course of the debate on the first proposition made in the House to levy duties on goods imported into the United States, he said:

> There is another consideration. The States that are most advanced in population and ripe for manufactures ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions; by adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands. They must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.

Later in the same speech Mr. Madison laid down a general rule that commerce ought to be free and labor and industry left at large to find their proper objects, but to this general rule he admitted certain exceptions. In particular he said that where the trade regulations of a State had succeeded in building up an establishment the National Government ought not to allow the industry to perish, for, he said:

> It is not possible for the hand of man to shift from one employment to another without being injured by the change.

This Democratic statesman, and father of the Constitution, could not then have held opinions which would harmonize with the declaration of the Democratic platform of 1912.

Let me call attention again to the statement already quoted from the report of the Ways and Means Committee. The two essential ideas which have been applied in the formulation of the bill now under consideration are hostile to each other and can not permanently abide together. A tariff law which levies duties without thought of protection can not but injure or even destroy some legitimate industries. If it were intended to convey the impression that both of these "essential ideas" have been applied to the bill at once, and with equal thoroughness, then the only escape from the charge of inconsistency would be for the committee to maintain that no industry which needs protection can be a legitimate industry.

But if this is not what is meant—if an effort has been made not to injure or destroy legitimate industries which need protection—then it can not be maintained that the first essential idea of the pledge has been consistently applied to the bill; the tariff duties have not yet been fixed "with no thought of protection." That is to be done with greater thoroughness in the future. Three years from now, when sugar is to be placed on the free list, what other rates are then to be adjusted to this new tariff policy? We are fairly warned that whatever slight trace of protection the present bill may leave in the tariff system will be done away with as soon as the industries of the country have adjusted themselves to the new rates. It is the pledge of a tariff for revenue "and with no thought of protection" that is the permanent element, the abiding, essential idea of the Democratic policy.

It is said that the Democratic Party comes into power with a mandate of the people to abandon the protective system and inaugurate a new era. The Democratic Party has no such mandate from the people. The Republican Party reaffirmed its belief in a protective tariff, and its candidate received 3,484,980 votes. The Progressive Party condemned the Payne-Aldrich tariff as unjust to the people and demanded immediate downward revision of those schedules wherein duties are shown to be unjust or excessive; but the platform which was adopted as a contract with the people declared unequivocally for a protective tariff which would equalize conditions of competition between the United States and foreign countries. The candidate of the Progressive Party received 4,119,538 votes. The two large parties pledged to the protective system together polled 7,605,518 votes.

The Democratic voters, who presumably approved the platform which pronounced a protective tariff unconstitutional, numbered 6,293,454. Therefore, taking into consideration only the three large parties, the voters who approved the policy of protection outnumbered their opponents by 1,312,064. The tariff bill now under consideration will therefore incur the disapproval of a large majority of the voters of the Nation. Nevertheless it will pass the House, and perhaps the Senate, without material change, because by a stroke of luck, dependent upon a division among their opponents, a minority of the people happen to be represented by a majority in both Houses of Congress.

Your bill will pass, and you, of course, will be responsible for it. If it should lead, as you believe it will, to increased prosperity; if it should lower the cost of living without materially diminishing the incomes of the consumers, then I shall rejoice with you and be glad; but if it should lead to business depression, decreased wages, or unemployment, then your party will never be in a position to carry into effect your promise of further legislation three years from the present time.

I am a Progressive and heartily concur in the party's condemnation of the present tariff known as the Payne-Aldrich law. It is unjust to the people. In at least one of its schedules, judging from the report of the Tariff Board on manufactures of wool, the rates are so high that the manufacturer need fear no foreign competition in prices. Under no necessity, therefore, to compete in the quality of his goods he no longer needs to pay the wages necessary to secure skilled workmen. He crowds wages down far below what is necessary to maintain a decent standard of living and puts in his own pocket profits protected by an extortionate tariff. In this case, and in others like it, if you will give me the opportunity, I shall vote for a large reduction in the duties; but the bill as a whole is a dangerous experiment for which the Democratic Party alone must be responsible. There is undoubtedly a demand on the part of a great majority of the people for immediate downward revision of such schedules as have been shown to be excessive; but it is a minority of the people, and a decreasing minority, that will support a tariff framed "without thought of protection." [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Pennsylvania use all of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Progressive Party I am not a free trader; at the same time I have never smote upon my breast and declared "I am a high protectionist" with the pride that the Apostle Paul once proclaimed "I am a Roman citizen." I am willing to take my protection in broken doses. I believe the country has suffered under high-protection policies, and I am for the immediate downward revision of the tariff.

I also favor an income tax. Almost any kind of a tax on incomes above $4,000 is an improvement on our present method of collecting taxes. I introduced in the State Senate of the State of Washington a resolution ratifying the income-tax amendment, and when the reactionary sentiment among both the Republicans and the Democrats refused to adopt the resolution and sidetracked it into a temporary desuetude, I waited another term and helped mold sentiment in its favor. When I reintroduced the resolution at the next session the Republican and Democratic leaders had been forced into a progressive attitude on the subject and the resolution passed.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court that national income tax could not be enacted under the Federal Constitution—a decision by a majority of only 1, the minority of the court dissenting—has cost this country about a billion dollars. That sum at least has been taken from the pockets of the consumer since that decision was rendered by unconscionable tariff levies and by subtle indirect taxation that should have come from the incomes of the rich.

Would it not have been the part of common sense and good judgment to have submitted to the people this decision, with all the arguments pro and con, and permitted the people to recall the decision and tax incomes at once if they so desired rather than to have required all these years of fighting and struggling to compel the reactionary representatives in Congress and in the several legislatures to submit and approve the amendment to the Constitution? The Progressive says "Yes," and it stands with the people for authority in their hands to rule not only Congress and the President but the courts of this land.

The reactionary forces have a fit every time the recall of judges or the recall of decisions is mentioned, but I should like to suggest the connection between the recall of the decision of a jury in the State of Washington by the pardon of C. D. Hillman by President Taft, and the theft of the Washington vote in the Chicago convention for the Republican Party, and I would like to cite the fact that the two Oregon delegates who, in violation of instructions, voted against Roosevelt, obtained the long-cherished desire of their hearts after the convention adjourned in the presidential pardon of Frank P. Mays and Hamilton Hendricks.

There are industries, I believe, that ought to be protected against cheap foreign labor. There are instances where this protection can be afforded without even violating the Democratic ideal and standard as enunciated by the distinguished and able leader of their party on the floor of this House.

I now refer especially to the shingle industry of the State of Washington, which employs about 15,000 men. There are 400 mills, many of these very small mills, located on small streams and on the shores of Puget Sound. The men employed live and work close to their homes, and, of course, have their families dependent upon them. There is about $9,000,000 invested in the industry, and the pay roll of the shingle mills makes prosperity and activity of every kind in almost every community on Puget Sound.

The free list is supposed to contain, largely, raw materials, but the value of the red cedar shingle placed on board the cars in western Washington is largely labor. Stumpage is valued at from $1 to $2.50 per thousand for cedar, according to its accessibility. This means the raw material in 1,000 shingles is worth from 10 cents to 30 cents, the balance is labor—labor in the woods, labor in bringing the logs to the mills, labor in the mills manufacturing the shingles. There are few industries where the selling value is so largely labor. Why then should this industry be one singled out for the free list? Can wool or cotton or steel show so large a percentage of labor? I think not.

I hope that the disaster that is prophesied as a natural consequence upon the enactment of the proposed tariff law will fail to materialize, and I believe it will; but I submit to the consideration of the majority in this House that if men are unnecessarily thrown out of employment in one such industry as this, the balance or equilibrium of industry will be disturbed, and thus the fiscal condition of an entire State imperiled.

There is no question of the ability of our mills to supply the demand for shingles in the United States. Never in the history of the industry have the mills been able to operate at full capacity on account of the fact that the supply would then exceed the demand. There is intense competition in the industry.

There are a number of reasons for the retention of the present duty on red cedar shingles. In British Columbia, just north of the State of Washington, and working in the same belt of timber between the Cascade Mountains and the coast, there are a number of mills, and the timber is there to furnish material for a large number of mills. About 80 per cent of the labor employed in these mills is oriental—the Chinese, the skilled workman, and the Hindu, the common laborer—whose scale of living is far below our standard.

I am reliably informed that the British Columbia manufacturers have for the past two years had an ironclad combination. The consumption of shingles in Canada is divided up among the different manufacturers, according to the number of machines which they have, and they are allowed to cut only their apportionment.

Our laws will not permit of this. They have, however, been able to run about half their capacity and are looking anxiously to the American market to permit them to run full time, holding up their market on their own shingles in Canada and using our country as a dumping ground for their surplus.

I accordingly appeal for consideration of the shingle industry, and the men employed in it, most of whom reside in the State of Washington.

In the campaign that has been waged the tariff has been a tremendous issue. It has been a potent means in the hands of so-called "captains of industry" and representatives of great wealth to gain for themselves privileges and to take away from the people their fundamental rights. The people do not know anything about a scientific tariff law nor the principles of political economy and fiscal legislation which underlie the tariff. Neither does Congress nor the Members of Congress know these things.

I have no doubt, in fact I know, that the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has the ability, if it should become his duty, to devote himself to a nonpartisan investigation of the tariff, and I have no doubt that he would make a splendid commissioner for that purpose, if he could lay aside his party obligations and accept the burdens of such an office; but I say that it is impossible for any man to make or prepare a scientific tariff or to levy its schedules with that degree of impartiality that is required while he is a great party leader and his great purpose and object is party success. Howsoever competent he may be, whatsoever his ability, he is necessarily hampered by partisan ties and his conclusions are necessarily distorted by party platform and party theories.

The Members of Congress who are members of the Ways and Means Committee are some of them expert in these lines and others are not. Those who are expert are necessarily hampered and limited by the same restrictions of party and the same prejudices of sectional representation as is the distinguished and able leader, the chairman of that committee. There are doubtless some who are Members of Congress and are on that committeee who are experts and have expert knowledge as to the tariff, but all of them are likewise circumscribed by party connection and the particular wants of the section which they represent.

But the vast majority of the representatives in Congress are in no sense qualified as experts on tariff and tariff legislation and do not claim to be. If I were to ask for a show of hands, requesting every Member of Congress here present who considers himself expert in these matters to raise his hand, I am sure but very few in honesty would respond and acknowledge that they consider themselves entitled to any such classification. I know I could not so classify myself.

The plan of the Progressive Party platform for the appointment of a nonpartisan scientific tariff board, with ample powers and sufficient compensation to enable them to devote their whole time to securing the necessary data to inform Congress as to tariff schedules and the multitude of fiscal and economical features involved in the tariff legislation so the tariff can be revised without logrolling, schedule by schedule, is the only proper plan for intelligent and scientific tariff revision. But, as I have already stated, I do not claim that any form of tariff legislation, howsoever accurate and scientific, can satisfy the people or restore to the confidence of the people the late Republican Party.

What the people want is that the power of government usurped and taken out of their hands by corrupt politicians be restored to them, so they can compel tariff revision after the best method. The people demand equal opportunity. Human welfare is being placed above the right of a few to pile up colossal fortunes. The people want to know how the Members of Congress stand on these fundamentals. They know how the delegates to the last Republican national convention stand. They know how they were elected. They know how in many cases they were rewarded and how in all cases they expected to be rewarded. They also know how William J. Bryan declared the majority of the delegates to the Democratic convention at Baltimore stood for a time at least.

In Gary, Ind., a few weeks ago 15,000 people gathered from all walks of life to pay homage to a dead newsboy. The rich jostled elbows with the poor; the doctors of law with the collectors of garbage; the lawyers with the lawbreakers; the society leader with the hired girl. Such a crowd assembled that traffic was blocked.

A crippled newsboy in a city hospital had voluntarily lain down his life to save the life of another. By his self-effacement and his humanity he had touched a chord whose notes are sweeter to the ear than the strain of an Aeolian harp played by the angel fingers of the mythical gods. We are a Nation of people prone to listen to the cry of humanity.

> When earth's high councils meet in splendid halls,
> To higher build the structure of their laws,
> Each statute framed in truth and righteousness,
> Has Sinai's code for deep foundation stone,
> And bears upon its crest the Golden Rule.

The mighty, but peaceable, revolution that is now being felt over this country was brought on when the people realized that these fundamental sentiments and principles were not observed by those who had control. In utter disregard of every humanitarian impulse, unrestrained by the authority or dignity of the law, unashamed by the exposures of criminal aggressions and fraudulent exactions, unawed by the people's demands and the people's want, criminal wealth with its organized power became superior to the Constitution and the law. They forced upon the people legislation for their own special interest.

The people's representatives were led to violate their pledges, and they foisted upon the people a "best ever" tariff that forced higher the cost of living and closed tighter the door of hope. Through child labor, overworked women, impure foods, and every form of injustice they continued to pile up their ill-gotten gains.

In gleeful rivalry corporations raced to beat each other to the remaining coal deposits, the timber, the minerals, and other resources that belonged to the public. In the spirit of pillage and by the power of the "beast" they sought to rend asunder any man in public life who would attempt to stay their hand in the name of justice and on behalf of the people. By illegal combinations the special interests increased their power until they were able to defy Congress and control the decisions of the highest tribunals. Legislatures were debauched and officers of the law made to do the bidding of their moneyed masters.

It was perfectly natural that the people should not always permit this condition to exist. Finally all over this land they became awakened and showed their determination to solve the problems that were presented by the unusual conditions, and to take part in politics as they had never done before.

Forgetting party men they sought principled men. Tired of the sounding brass and tinkling cymbal of party name and catchword, they sought for leaders in their several communities who would recognize the principle of humanity in government, and would strive to eliminate selfishness and greed to the end that the children of the poor should no longer be sacrificed to industrialism; that the virtue of their girls and the lives and bodies of their men should be conserved and their necessary wants supplied.

With this purpose in their hearts they went forward willing to sacrifice to win. They had listened to false prophets long enough. They were prepared to go the limit. By patient, earnest work they had already secured the Australian ballot, which gave to them the right to vote without being supervised or checked up by the mill foreman, the mortgagee, or the political boss.

They had gotten the direct primary, by which they were guaranteed the right to make their own nominations to public office and to take from the party howler and the political ward heeler his old-time prerogative to control conventions and put up candidates. Not content, ever progressing, in many communities they acquired the right to initiate legislation and to recall legislative acts, as well as to recall their officers who proved recreant to duty.

At each step in this record of progress certain men in each State were invariably found objecting and attempting to block the way. In some instances they were Democrats and in others they were Republicans. But it was the same old gang moved by the same impulses, acting in the same way, accepting instructions from the same forces, and receiving and appropriating to themselves the same kind of rewards. They stood in each State of this Union, interfering with all their might with the movement on the part of the people. These men, when they came to Congress, voted with dogged determination and unremitting zeal for the highest protection that could be suggested and for many unconscionable enactments.

They were the "high-protection men"; they were the "government-by-law men"; they were the "sacredness-of-the-Constitution men." After the party said in its platform that the tariff must be revised, they were ready to fake and trick the people by the silly suggestion that the word "downward" was not included in the platform.

When the people demanded popular rule these high-protection men declared that the right to initiate statutes and laws was "un-American," and that this was not a government of men but was a government of laws.

When the people endeavored to adopt pure-food laws and legislate into law the plainest fundamentals of justice, these same men (as many of them as were demanded) came to the front to defend the Constitution—the "sacred Constitution," as the ark of the covenant which it were a sin to touch.

Finally, the people determined to overturn election machinery, and despite the protests of these high-protection interest-controlled men they fairly and squarely won in their struggle to nominate to the Presidency a man of their own selection, a man whose deeds were to their liking.

I shall not recount the happenings which led up to the scene at Chicago, but I desire to remind the disorganized and defeated remnants of the Republican Party that the people played the game according to the rotten rules that existed. They rightfully won, despite southern-delegate iniquity and the abominable rules that permitted the islands of the sea to vote at the convention. Then it was that these same high-tariff men, these lovers of law, these adorers of the Constitution, these same men who had fought the fight of the special interests in every State of the Union, deliberately, infamously, and outrageously, in the name of the Republican Party, stole from the people the victory they had gained.

Then came the election of Woodrow Wilson, but I insist that the election returns do not show that the people of this country flocked to the Democratic Party on the issues presented by the party, for the popular Democratic vote was not increased at the election.

One result of the election, however, was to forever eliminate from leadership and successful political activity a great percentage of the men who had theretofore conducted these fights for special privilege and managed the campaigns. The Republican Party was disgracefully and shamefully condemned and kicked out of power, their candidate receiving only seven presidential electoral votes.

It is now claimed, however, that the Republican Party will atone for its blunders by calling its delegates together from all the States of this Union and having them voluntarily reorganize and eliminate themselves so far as they constitute objectionable features.

And I want to say that in my opinion it ill becomes the Republican Party here in its death throes, speaking through one of its most distinguished and able members [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Wyoming, to hurl at the Democratic Party, as he did the other day, any suggestion that the Democrats continually shout "Nigger, nigger!" in the South.

It was your Republican Party that, after the death of your great, kind, pure-purposed founder, Abraham Lincoln, gave to the ignorant black man in the South the suffrage. They were not ready for suffrage, and it was a crime to the black man for you to grant it to him then.

A black spot on your escutcheon. But you did not let it stop there; you sent into the South a band of corrupt spoilsmen and carpetbaggers to despoil and rob the people, and they did rob and steal, and your party backed them up. In order to perpetuate your system in power you stole the electoral vote of my native State of Louisiana and foully inaugurated a President who had no right to sit in the White House; that was a blacker spot on your escutcheon.

As the Southern States labored valiantly one by one to free themselves from the scourge of ignorance and superstition your party had wrongfully placed upon them, you mocked them and hindered them and threatened to take from them their congressional representation, but all the while you used the votes of your carpetbaggers, your negro delegates, your pie-counter serviles to vote down and out the decent men of the North, the old soldiers who had fought your battles, and the better element in every State in the Union who felt that allegiance to your party was necessary because of the recollections of the war and the noble impulses that its memories awakened in their breasts.

You took presidential nominations in that way, and finally, after the better element in your party had risen up in the spirit of reform with the greatest living American as their leader and had won the game and whipped you under even those old rotten rules, you refused to accept the verdict, and your Rosewater and Crane and ROOT and Barnes and PENROSE deliberately ordered that the delegates of the people so elected should not be seated and that imposters, suppliant tools, should have their places. Then, after trying half-venal tactics on the good-looking man with the posey in the buttonhole of his coat—the man who wanted his picture like T. R.—your party, persisting in its madness and contemptuous disregard of every principle of honor and Americanism, proceeded to nominate for the Presidency the man who in a pitiable and humiliating burlesque of the Revolutionary patriot had exclaimed "Give me the nomination, or give me death."

In thus overturning the will of the people, even after they had met you and whipped you according to the partial and rotten rules of the game you had devised, you added the blackest spot on your escutcheon; and so I say to the Republican Party that you will get no sympathy in your death throes by your railings of "Nigger, nigger, nigger." The American people are done with sectionalism, and the Progressive Party alone is free from its taint. It alone can invite support on the issues of the present day and the rightful purposes of the future.

It is now proposed to render nugatory the plans of the rank and file as expressed in the formation of the Progressive Party through the patriotic, but, I believe, misdirected efforts of certain well-meaning men who are too progressive to be Republicans, but yet too Republican to be progressive.

I would like you to think a moment of the prospective proceedings of the coming national rebirth convention of the G. O. P. Chairman Hilles, we will say, has been forced to call a national convention of the representatives of the 3,000,000 minority. Let it be remembered that the 4,000,000 members of the Progressive Party will have nothing to do with this rebirth movement. The delegates gather at Chicago, we will say. Of course President Taft, the leader of the party, will be there, and BOIES PENROSE will sit on the rostrum. William Barnes will journey back and forth among those in attendance, occasionally conferring with the "culled delegates" from the Southern States—all of them will be there. The islands of the sea will give up their quota, and Rosewater will lend his sweetness and fragrance to the occasion. Who will call the thing to order? Why Senator ROOT, of course, with a railroad brief against free canal tolls in his hands.

There will be another contingent of men present for whom the Nation at this time has profound respect, and no doubt the distinguished chairman will call upon Senator CUMMINS to explain the purpose of the convention. He will arise and frankly state to the convention that the reorganization is necessary, and as President Taft pricks up his ears he will say that the people were outraged by the last national convention. At this juncture Mr. Barnes will rise to a question of personal privilege and the "culled delegates" will engage in a free-for-all fight. You remember the chap who tried to lift himself over the fence by his own boot straps. The situation of the Republican Party will be as pitiable. There is no use to go further to show the utter impossibility of such a rebirth. It requires saving grace for regeneration, and the Republican Party has sinned away its day of grace.

These good men who hold on to the old party may as well know that the Progressive Party has come to stay. There is nothing in common between us and the old organization. There can be no amalgamation between the quick and the dead.

It may, in the course of this debate, be alleged by the opposition that I have used improper language or applied terms that should not be used in debate. But the meanest words that have been used by any of the Progressive leaders, either in the last campaign or in Congress, do not measure up to the bitterness and vituperation of an article published in the RECORD with the indorsement and at the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] on the 22d of this month, referring to the cause of conservation, to which the Progressive Party is particularly pledged and which the article itself admits is a cause dear to the hearts of the American people, and one so strong in their sympathies that in its name they have been able to accomplish things unheard of in governmental administration. I take emphatic exception to a portion of the article and declare its sentiment is unworthy of the indorsement of so distinguished a Member of this House as the gentleman from Wyoming. The portion of this article—which is a newspaper editorial under the heading "Bureaucracy hit hard"—to which I refer is as follows:

This monopoly of defiance and oppression in restraint of human rights and national development has been kept in office by pressure of misdirected public sentiment and Executive tolerance. Thus fortified these promoters of bureaucracy have made and unmade Cabinets, written party platforms, packed juries, suborned witnesses; falsified the records—all in the name of conservation.

I assert here that there is no national character whose name is identified with the cause of conservation more loved and respected by the masses of the people in the State of Washington than is Gifford Pinchot, and it did not diminish the popularity of the Progressive Party, which defeated the Republicans by a majority of 50,000 in the State of Washington, that Theodore Roosevelt had subjected himself, while President, to these "monopolies of defiance and oppression in restraint of human rights" to which the article refers as "men who have packed juries, suborned witnesses, and falsified the records."

Every conservationist admits irregularities of administration and stands for certain changes. A great portion of the Taft administration was especially given over to such irregularities. But it is useless for anyone to assail conservation on its fundamental principles when lawfully enforced in this country.

In the appendix to my remarks I shall extend in the RECORD an article written by Gifford Pinchot, entitled "Conservation as practiced," that appears in Pearson's Magazine for the current month, and I ask the Members of Congress to compare the statements contained in this article with the vituperative assault contained in the newspaper publication.

You ask what has all this to do with the tariff? The Republican Party used the tariff as a means of extortion and of favoring the few—the different interests were always correlated. The people demanded its immediate downward revision, and I shall stand for that very kind of revision at this very time. I sincerely hope some amendments may be made to this bill, and particularly that of the shingle schedule, and I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Democratic Party will make this one concession to the people of my State, a concession that will help American labor almost exclusively and will save many a family from the pinch of poverty in the Puget Sound country in the State of Washington. We are so near the British Columbia (Hindu-Japanese) oriental labor.

I make the plea in the name of humanity, and in doing it I only seek that meed of fairness which I believe is warranted by the golden rule. [Applause.]

The article above referred to is as follows:

CONSERVATION AS PRACTICED—FORMER CHIEF FORESTER REPLIES TO WIDELY CIRCULATED REACTIONARY ARTICLE BY EDITOR THOMAS, OF THE POST-INTELLIGENCER—SHOWS NUMEROUS IMPORTANT DISCREPANCIES.

[By Gifford Pinchot.]

APRIL 2, 1913.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BRYAN: Knowing your interest in the conservation question, which is of such importance to your constituents, both as a Representative and as an editor, and also knowing of the good work your newspaper has done in former campaigns for Progressive principles and Progressive men, I venture to send you the inclosed proof of an article which will appear in Pearson's Magazine for May. It answers an article by Ed. H. Thomas, of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, which has had wide circulation in Washington, and which can be and ought to be answered. If you can find space for my answer I shall very greatly appreciate your courtesy.

Very sincerely, yours, GIFFORD PINCHOT.

The editor of Pearsons has courteously given me access to his columns to answer an article by Ed. H. Thomas, entitled "Conservation as practiced," which appeared in the January number of the magazine. I am particularly glad to avail myself of the opportunity thus afforded, because attacks on conservation usually contain few specific statements and are therefore difficult to answer specifically. This is not true of Mr. Thomas's article.

It will, I think, be most convenient to the reader if I take up certain statements in "Conservation as practiced" in the order in which they are made. Generalities which are more or less matters of opinion may well be omitted from the present discussion.

Mr. Thomas says, "The West * * * has no voice in administration, as the Forestry Bureau at Washington is made up of eastern theorists."

WESTERN MANAGEMENT.

The office of the Forest Service at Washington is managed by four men. The first of them was born west of the Alleghanies in a public-land State, and began his practical acquaintance with western forests 17 years ago, when he became, as I can testify from personal experience, a first-class mountain man. The second, born west of the Rockies, was for 10 years a small cattleman in Arizona, then went into sheep raising, and was secretary of the Arizona Woolgrowers' Association when he entered the Government service. He had never been East in his life until he was 34 years old. The third went to California when he was 10 years old, worked his way through the University of California, and had been for seven years in charge of practical forest work in California, Montana, and Idaho before he was called to Washington. The fourth, born east of the Rockies, like Mr. Thomas himself, moved West in 1892, and went into business in the same city, Seattle, where Mr. Thomas is an editor of one of the principal anticonservation journals of the West. He enlisted in the Spanish War, and afterwards entered the Forest Service. In all he has been in constant touch with the West and its problems for about 20 years.

Furthermore, of the 147 men in actual charge of the national forests, all had had extensive western experience before they were given their present responsible work, and about 80 per cent were western men before they entered the service at all. Of the 1,393 forest rangers on the rolls June 30, 1912, a little over 99 per cent were actual residents of the West when they were appointed. The practical work of forest administration in the West is now in the hands of western men.

Mr. Thomas repeats in substance the statement made in the annual report of the Forester that the national forests do not yield each year as much as they cost. He mentions an excess of expenditures over receipts of $3,582,615.19 for the year 1911, and adds, "What would be thought of a private business that would show such a balance sheet?"

BUSINESS METHODS GOOD.

The sum of $3,582,615.19 includes, although Mr. Thomas does not mention it, an extraordinary expense of $1,086,590.89 for meeting the exceptional outburst of forest fires which followed the driest season ever known in the West.

That, however, is by the way. The real answer is that a private business, conducted under the limitations imposed by law upon the Forest Service and with the same conditions to meet, would present a balance sheet of precisely the same kind. The object for which the service must be conducted is not to make money for the Government, but to make the forests useful to the largest possible number of people. In doing that work the business methods of the service need fear nothing in comparison with the best managed of the great private corporations, as was determined by the report of Gunn, Richards & Co., a distinguished firm of business organizers, made June 30, 1908.

The money spent on the national forests is an insurance against the damage or destruction by fire of some two billion dollars' worth of public property, and against monopoly and extortion when the private lands which now supply the bulk of our yearly consumption of timber are nearly exhausted. The timber of the national forests is increasing in value at the rate of at least $50,000,000 a year. It would be poor economy not to be willing to spend two or three millions annually to insure that immense return.

Ultimately the national forests will be self-supporting. But in the meantime there is little more reason in complaining that they cost more than they bring in than there would be in complaining that the premiums paid for fire insurance, or the cost of a city fire department, failed to bring in an annual cash return.

SMALL CUT EXPLAINED.

Mr. Thomas says the annual cut from the national forests is "but 8½ per cent of the annual crop."

The whole annual crop or growth is not, and can not be, harvested at present on the national forests, and the reason is not far to seek. When the national forests were created the best and most accessible of the timber had already been appropriated. The Government took what was left. Three-fourths of the national-forest timber is even yet inaccessible by reason of the lack of transportation. Where it is accessible and salable the annual crop is being harvested. Much of the more remote timber could not yet be cut even if it were given away.

The suggestion is constantly made that the national-forest timber should be sold below its value, to which suggestion the conclusive answer is contained in the report of a legislative investigation filed with the governor of the State of Washington, April 1, 1910, which report contains and comments on more than a hundred cases of sales of State timberland for less than it was worth. There is no safe and practicable way to dispose of Government timber except for what it will bring in the open market.

Speaking of the Mount Olympus National Monument, which lies within the Olympic National Forest, Mr. Thomas says: "On this reserve no one can cut a stick of firewood, prospect a ledge of mineral, catch a fish, or shoot a bird. Instead of restricting its boundaries to the base of Mount Olympus, the monument covers 608,640 acres of the heart of a known mineral region."

THOMAS MISINFORMED.

Mr. Thomas has evidently been misinformed. If he will go and camp in the Olympic National Monument he will find by practical experience that he can cut all the sticks of firewood he needs, that the only limit on the fish he can catch will be his personal skill and sense of sportsmanship, and that he can hunt buck deer from September 1 to November 1 and shoot grouse from October 1 to January 1, and shore birds and water fowl from October 1 to February 1. There are no restrictions whatever on fishing and hunting within this monument except those imposed by the game laws of the State of Washington.

The Olympic National Monument was created with its present area at the request of a Congressman from the State of Washington, who presumably represented the wishes and best interests of his State.

If there is mineral within this national monument it will, of course, be opened to development. At the time the monument was created it was not known to include a mineral region, and there are said to be strong doubts whether it does so now, although a vigorous attempt is being made on that ground to have the land restored to the public domain.

Whether there is mineral or not this area does contain valuable timber. In that connection it may be well to recall what happened when over 700,000 acres of heavily timbered land in the Olympic National Forest was restored to the public domain and opened to entry in 1891, on the plea that it was chiefly valuable for agriculture. Within 10 years 524,000 acres of it had passed into the hands of men who held it exclusively for its timber. One man had acquired 81,530 acres, and five had 178,000. And of this whole vast timbered area after 10 years less than one acre in a thousand was actually under cultivation.

Mr. Thomas also says: "Water-power sites on the public domain were withdrawn without provision for their future utilization. The city of Bellingham, in the State of Washington, is served with power right now generated in British Columbia, because progress on water-power development in the Mount Baker region has been halted by the Government.

"The pretext for these withdrawals is that they are intended to prevent monopoly, and this in a region where monopoly is impossible in the very nature of things."

WATER-POWER INTERESTS BUSY.

The water-power sites were withdrawn to give Congress an opportunity to regulate their use. They are still withdrawn, solely because of the persistent refusal of the water-power interests to allow the passage of a law, such as the Lever bill, now before Congress, that would insure the use of the public power sites without monopoly. These power interests often work anonymously, but the list of their spokesmen includes such names as Frank Short, of California; Francis Lynde Stetson, of New York; William P. Lay, of Alabama; and T. R.

McKee, of the General Electric Co. If there has been failure to develop, the responsibility lies directly upon the men who have blocked the unremitting attempts of the conservationists to get a reasonable law that would open these sites to development, and hardly less upon newspaper men, like Mr. Thomas, who make it easy for Congressmen to defeat the true interests of their constituents by misrepresenting the facts and throwing the blame on the wrong people.

In this they are not always successful. For example, MILES POINDEXTER, of Mr. Thomas's own State of Washington, was elected to the United States Senate mainly on the conservative issue, standing against Mr. Thomas and with me, and on that issue carried Mr. Thomas's own city of Seattle.

POWER SITES NOW OPEN.

To return to our argument, in the national forests the power sites are now and have for years been open to development under the act of February 15, 1901, under which 274 permits have been issued by the Forest Service and 139 water-power plants built, in addition to 28 which are now in process of construction. I do not know why Bellingham gets its power from British Columbia, but I do know that the Mount Baker region is in a national forest and that it is open to power development under the same conditions which permitted the construction of power plants in other forests.

Is water-power monopoly in the State of Washington impossible, as Mr. Thomas declares? A report of the Commissioner of Corporations published in March, 1912, shows that the General Electric group of power companies controls 40 per cent of the commercial water power developed and under construction in the United States, while the officers and directors of the General Electric Co. and its three subsidiaries control 24 corporations, which operate hydroelectric plants, over 50 public-service corporations, and a number of railroads and factories, and over 50 banks and financial houses. This same powerful group controls 72 per cent of the water power in Colorado, 58 per cent in Oregon, and 55 per cent in Mr. Thomas's State of Washington, in which two corporations have already succeeded in securing nearly three-quarters (70 per cent) of all the water power yet developed. Comment is unnecessary.

Mr. Thomas: "Several years ago a large coal-land withdrawal was made in Whatcom County, Wash., and, through department ignorance of geographical conditions, Bellingham, a city of 30,000, was included in the withdrawal."

BELLINGHAM NOT AFFECTED.

This withdrawal, like all withdrawals for similar purposes, affected only certain kinds of land. It had no more effect on land within the city limits of Bellingham than it had on land within the city limits of New York. It respected all existing claims and property rights of every kind, and had to do only with coal, oil, gas, and phosphate rock. All other minerals may be freely located and developed within the area withdrawn, and land may be taken up under the homestead laws, with a reservation of the underlying coal to the United States. So little does the withdrawal restrict the development of the region that, although Mr. Thomas evidently does not know it, it is still (February 25, 1913) in effect. Such a withdrawal might be made to include the land beneath Mr. Thomas's office in Seattle, without in the least interfering with his rights or his business.

Referring to coal claims in Mount Baker, Mr. Thomas complains of delay in granting patents when the coal is needed, as it is, and adds: "This is one case of department stupidity and neglect, but it is not an isolated case. It is typical of the manner in which all matters pertaining to the public domain have been handled."

Sixteen coal entries were made in this field. Half have already been patented, five of them within six months after entry. Several of the claims are now under investigation. This seems to be one more case of holding the Government responsible, when in reality there is no valid basis for complaint of delay.

ANCIENT HISTORY.

"Bureau ignorance of forest conditions in the Far West," says Mr. Thomas, "is dense beyond belief," and cites in support the case of a forest ranger who, in 1899, was instructed to blaze out the lines of his reserves, which covered an area about half as large as the State of Connecticut, and patrol its boundaries every day.

This anecdote of 14 years ago dates from a time long before the present national-forest policy was in existence and six years before the care of the national forests was transferred from the General Land Office to the Forest Service, upon whose efficiency it can therefore have no bearing. This was the period, unless I am mistaken, when not a single man in the division which had charge of the national forests at Washington had ever seen or set foot in one of them. I could myself give Mr. Thomas other cases from that almost forgotten time which are even more striking. Take, for example, that of two men, also in the State of Washington, who were instructed to buy rakes and rake up and burn the down timber on more than a thousand square miles of heavy forest. Neither of these stories, however, has anything to do with the present subject of discussion.

ERRONEOUS FIGURES.

Mr. Thomas: "Sales on the 11,684,360 acres of forest reserve in the State of Washington have aggregated 95,204,000 board feet in 14 years, or less than 7,000,000 annually. Decay is destroying nearly a billion feet of timber annually, so that cutting has not reached 7 per cent of the decay loss."

The facts are that in the eight years—1905 to 1912, inclusive—during which the Forest Service has had charge of the national forests 415,512,900 feet of timber has been sold from the national forests of the State of Washington. The average cut during that period was not 7,000,000 but 17,500,000 feet annually. For the last three years the cut has averaged a little over 30,000,000 feet, and during the last year it reached 37,000,000 feet.

The total stand of merchantable timber in the national forests of Washington is estimated at about 90,000,000,000 feet. This includes all classes of timber, the thrifty and growing as well as the overmature. There is undoubtedly some loss from decay. It is, however, but gradual, and Mr. Thomas's figure of 1,000,000,000 feet a year is preposterous. While it seems to be well within Mr. Thomas's average limit of error, it is an overstatement by more than four to one.

DO STATES LOSE?

Again, Mr. Thomas refers to an alleged loss to the States, "which have had taken from them areas to be held in perpetuity as undeveloped wilderness, on which there is no taxable or revenue-producing property."

Let us see. Apart from the fact that more than 600,000 persons every year engage in the use or development of national forests, the Western States now receive for their schools and roads, in lieu of taxes, 25 per cent of the gross revenue from the national forests. Up to January 30, 1912, they have thus received $2,606,400, of which $115,205 went to the State of Washington. The present Congress has set aside an additional 10 per cent for building roads, and over $200,000 has already been made available. In some places the proceeds from this 35 per cent of the gross revenue already exceeds what would be produced by taxation under private ownership. In others it still falls short. In the end it will surely exceed it everywhere.

In most of the Western States, in the areas locked up, are lands belonging to the Commonwealth. Washington, for instance, has nearly 600,000 acres of school lands worth from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 within the 11 reserves plastered over its area. Idaho and Montana fare similarly. Thus Mr. Thomas.

STATE CLAIMS RECOGNIZED.

This statement probably refers to a decision of the Secretary of the Interior that the creation of a national forest before public surveys have been made defeats the claims of certain States to school lands in the national forests, while giving them the right to make indemnity selections elsewhere. This decision of another department is controlling on the Forest Service, which nevertheless has steadily recognized the moral right of the States to these lands, has refrained from cutting timber on them, except in agreement with the States, and has vigorously insisted that the equities of the States must be allowed and satisfied by exchange. On February 15, 1912, a final exchange of this kind was made with South Dakota. On June 4 last, a similar exchange of certain lands was made with Idaho, and an exchange that will satisfy all of Idaho's claims is now nearly complete. As soon as legislative authority can be secured the same arrangement will be made with Montana and other States.

While I was Forester I made a similar proposition personally and repeatedly to the land commission of the State of Washington, but Mr. Ross evidently preferred a cause of quarrel to the satisfaction of the State's claims, and my suggestion was always rejected.

ANOTHER ERROR.

Mr. Thomas: "One-third of Washington's total area is reserved. On these reservations there is no industry, no settlement, no development, though 20 per cent of the lands within them are arable and capable of settlement, and another 20 per cent mineral on which the forest growth is inferior and practically valueless."

If it were true, this would be by far the most important paragraph in the whole article. There are agricultural and mineral lands within the national forests, about 2 (not 20) per cent of the former and an unknown and for the present an unknowable amount of the latter. Are they tied up?

Within a year after it took charge, the Forest Service itself proposed and on June 11, 1906, secured the passage of an act to open to settlement any lands in national forests which were more valuable for agriculture than for forest purposes. Under this law, 1,213,000 acres have already been opened to settlement for the benefit of over 12,000 settlers. The work is proceeding so rapidly that within three years, in spite of the huge area of the national forests, it will have been completed.

Most of the agricultural land still owned by the Government in the national forests is heavily timbered, and worth from 2 to 20 times as much for the timber as for the land. To give the timber with the land would merely invite speculation instead of promoting settlement. So the Forest Service first sells the timber, and then the land is opened to settlement, by which arrangement the imitation homesteader is eliminated. The effect of giving the timber with the land is well illustrated by the Olympic forest elimination cited above.

MINERAL LANDS OPEN.

How, then, as to the mineral lands? Are they open to development? Every season there are 45,000 miners and prospectors in the national forests. The prospector is welcome. He may and does search the forests at will. He cuts without charge the timber he needs for his claim. He is often aided by the roads, bridges, trails, and telephone lines built by the Forest Service. Of all the false charges made against the Forest Service there is none more perfectly false than the charge that the national forests are closed against mineral development. If the well-established policy of the Forest Service were not proof enough, there is the law of June 4, 1897, which specifically provides that the national forests shall be open to prospecting and mining.

IMPORTANT IF TRUE.

Mr. Thomas: "Mr. Graves maintains that it is profitable to continue forestry on lands adaptable to agriculture. But is it a wise national policy which seeks to perpetuate forest growth at 33⅓ cents per acre per year on land which properly cultivated will produce from $50 to $500 per acre per annum? If it is, then production has ceased to be a fundamental element of economics."

This statement would be important if it were true. The simple but conclusive answer is that Mr. Graves holds no such opinion, and that already a million and a quarter acres of agricultural land in the national forests have been opened to entry by 12,000 settlers under a policy initiated by the Forest Service in 1906 and in vigorous effect to this day.

2,660 PER CENT OFF.

Mr. Thomas says: "The entire 11,684,000 acres of national forests of the State of Washington, more than a fourth of the State's total area, contains exactly 34 miles of wagon road."

This statement is but 2,660 per cent out of the way. The fact is that the national forests of the State of Washington contain 938 miles of road and 1,491 miles of trails, of which the Forest Service itself has actually built more miles of road than Mr. Thomas allows altogether, and, in addition, more than a thousand miles of trails.

"As matters stand," says Mr. Thomas, "only the very wealthy can bid at such sales"—the sales of timber by the Forest Service.

WRONG AGAIN.

Again important if it were true. The fact is that 99 per cent of all the timber sales made during the last fiscal year were for amounts under $5,000 and 97 per cent for amounts under $1,000. Not only so, but over 3,000 small operators cut 63 per cent of the timber cut during the year, while more than 38,000 permits for free timber were issued to settlers and prospectors. With the growing monopoly of western timber, it will soon be the national forests alone that give the small lumberman a chance.

Mr. Thomas: "In the Philippine Islands, with 116,000 square miles, there are many fine forests, but up to last October no national forests had been created there."

FORTY MILLION ACRES FROM TRUTH.

This statement of Mr. Thomas's is within about 40,000,000 acres of being correct. Over 99 per cent of the forests of the Philippine Islands, or 59,500 square miles, are forest reserves controlled and managed by the United States Government through the bureau of forestry of the Philippines, precisely as the national forests in the United States (likewise called forest reserves until 1905) are controlled and managed by the United States Government through the Forest Service. The names used to be the same, the purposes are the same, the general lines of policy are the same; and of this I speak with some confidence because policy and purposes were embodied in a report made by me to Mr. Taft while he was governor of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Thomas: "Alaska to-day consists of a few towns and mining camps governed by United States marshals and surrounded by alien territory on which Alaskans can venture as trespassers only. It is rich in every natural resource, but these resources are as worthless as the minerals in the moon. They can not be touched by the people who require them."

ALASKA LARGELY OPEN.

This statement is fully as accurate as that just quoted about the Philippine Islands. First, any Alaskan can go freely upon any public land or national forest in Alaska without committing trespass of any sort. Every foot of it is open to the freest access. Second, the resources of Alaska "can not be touched by the people who require them" to the following extent:

In 1912 there were sold from the national forests of Alaska, 45,000,000 feet of timber in 355 sales.

Every kind of mineral except coal is freely open to development. During the past year the mineral resources of Alaska which "can not be touched by the people who require them" produced copper to the value of $4,904,715 and gold and silver to the value of $16,031,705, while the furs which "can not be touched," yet were touched to the value of $728,554.

Although it is doubtful whether Mr. Thomas had fish in mind as one of the natural resources he was describing, it is worth while noting that the untouchable salmon resources of Alaska yielded during the past year $16,459,036.

"The law," says Mr. Thomas, "as the department interprets it, is that no man can acquire a coal claim unless he acquires it 'for his own individual use and benefit.' And 'own individual use and benefit' is capable of no elasticity. Nowhere in our statutes is there another phrase so rigid."

STATEMENT NOT TRUE.

There is little fault to be found with this statement except that it is not so. Such provisions are common in our public-land laws. For example, the Homestead Act (R. S. 2290) says: "The entry shall be made in good faith for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation and not for the benefit of any other person, persons, or corporations."

The timber and stone act (act of June 3, 1878, sec. 2) says: "The applicant to purchase must state under oath that he does not apply to purchase land for speculation but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use and benefit, and that he has not directly or indirectly made any agreement or contract in any way or manner with any person or persons whatsoever by which the title which he may acquire from the Government may inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself."

Mr. Thomas assumes to take issue with the conservation policy yet says: "A coal land leasing law in 1907 would have accomplished all that could have been done under private ownership."

GUGGENHEIMS ACTIVE.

Mr. Thomas is evidently not aware that immediately upon the withdrawal of the coal lands in 1906 the Roosevelt administration made every effort to secure the passage of a coal land leasing bill for opening them to development without waste and without monopoly. Every year since an effort has been made by the friends of conservation to pass similar legislation. That we have not succeeded was directly and solely due to the attitude of the men (Guggenheim and others) who preferred to see no legislation enacted rather than legislation which would prevent speculation and monopoly in coal and who were supported by Mr. Thomas's paper, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, in their successful effort to prevent the passage of a coal land leasing law.

It does not become the men who opposed this legislation at the time to express regret now that it did not pass, without at least acknowledging their share in defeating it. If they had allowed it to pass, the just complaint that Alaska is not allowed to use her own fuel could not now be made. It is a curious fact that the men who were directly responsible for locking up the coal of Alaska—first, by their unsuccessful attempt to have it monopolized, and, second, by their successful effort to prevent its development under conditions that would effectually prevent monopoly—are now the loudest in lamenting a condition which but for them would never have taken place.

ALMOST CORRECT.

Mr. Thomas: "The remedy for our conservation bungle is simple. * * * Classify the public lands. These four words contain the cure."

For once Mr. Thomas is almost right. The classification of the public lands is not the whole cure, but it is a part of it, and the United States Forest Service has done its full share toward that end. Both before and since I left it it has given its best attention to segregating agricultural lands from lands more valuable for forestry. It has opened a million and a quarter acres of the true agricultural lands to entry and is protecting the lands more valuable for timber against the land-grabbers. It has eliminated from the forest boundaries more than 10,000,000 acres of land more suitable for other uses. It ascertains the mineral character of lands claimed under the mineral-land laws and in many ways gives practical effect to the fundamental principle of any wise public land classification policy, the principle that each parcel of land must be put to that use in which it will contribute most to the Commonwealth.

It is one of the commonest charges against the Forest Service, because it is so easy to make, that it "nullifies the acts of Congress, indulges in bureaucratic government," to quote again Mr. Thomas's language, and generally does as it pleases without regard to the law or to certain kinds of prophets.

SERVICE LAW-ABIDING.

The Forest Service does disregard prophets of Mr. Thomas's kind for reasons which I hope have already appeared to the reader; but if it had disregarded the law, that fact would long ago have been judicially established. The truth is that the Forest Service is law-abiding with such completeness that in no single case has any court of last resort declared any action by the Forest Service to have exceeded its legal powers, and this includes two decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Forest Service has frequently applied the law in ways that were distasteful to certain special interests, but when the final test of judicial decision has been made, it has been proved without exception that the service has respected the law and acted within its legal powers.

Like so many others who attack it, Mr. Thomas does not understand what conservation means. "Conservation," he says, "has been intrusted to a bureau of the Agricultural Department." It is doubtless the Forest Service which Mr. Thomas had in mind.

A portion of the work in conservation is indeed intrusted to the Forest Service, but the statement might be accepted as more accurate if Mr. Thomas had not omitted to mention that other portions are intrusted to five other bureaus in the Department of Agriculture, such as the Bureau of Soils and the Bureau of Plant Industry; to five bureaus in the Department of the Interior, such as the General Land Office and the Bureau of Mines; one in the Department of Justice, charged with the enforcement of the public-land laws; and three in the War Department, which deal with the control and development of navigable streams, including water power, and with the conservation of the natural resources of military reservations and the Philippine Islands. In other respects the statement that conservation is intrusted to a single bureau appears to be beyond criticism.

RICHES EMBARRASSING.

Mr. Thomas's article presents an embarrassment of riches to the man who will look up the facts. Richer digging is seldom found, but the foregoing samples will suffice. I should have been glad to touch, among other things, on the question of the Chugach National Forest, which was not "created under a false pretense" and which does not "exclude the only timber worth while in southern and southeastern Alaska," and upon the whole question of coal and other monopolies attempted or achieved by the Guggenheim syndicate. But perhaps enough has been said to raise a reasonable doubt whether, after all, the grabbers have had all the right on their side.

SOURCES OF OPPOSITION.

There are three principal sources of opposition to conservation in the West. First, the men who came out as pioneers, and who can not realize that the time when everything was free could not last and has gone by. Second, the men who have been checked by conservation in their efforts to grab more than their share of the public wealth. Third, men interested in development, and rightly so, who have been deceived by the stream of lies on the subject of conservation put in circulation by its enemies.

These men are opponents only until they learn the facts, but until they do their discontent with conservation is no better based than the hostility of the Romans of Nero's time to the Christians, which rested on the current fable that the Christians were enemies of humanity, habitually murdered little children, and worshiped an ass's head.

WORK NECESSARY.

I do not say that the Forest Service is free from the common human faults, but I do assert that its work is peculiarly necessary, unusually hard to do, and remarkably well done.

The pity of it is that reckless perversion should turn against it some men who are naturally its friends, and so should make still more difficult the enormous task of wisely opening to public use the natural resources of an area as large as all the States from Maine to Virginia, and doing it with the least practicable restraint to the individual, with the largest benefits to the people generally, and without monopoly or unnecessary waste.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MANAHAN].

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I must confess astonishment at the observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] that the permanence of this bill will depend probably upon the solidarity of the Democratic Party. He argues that the law will endure because his party is united; that party discipline will keep this bill on the books; that Democrats are good soldiers and as such will sink individual opinions for the good of their party; therefore he concludes his party will have a long enjoyment of power.

I can not concur in this view. This bill, if it lives, must live upon its own merits. If it is dependent upon the Democratic Party and the power of that party's organization to control perpetually the Democrats in this House, and to control the House itself, and not upon its merits as a law, then we will keep going unwisely, as we have unfortunately too much in the past, and continue making tariff laws partisan matters and not matters of patriotism. [Applause.]

It seems to me that in the making of a great fiscal law affecting all of the industries and the general welfare of the country that every step should be taken with the idea of doing justice to all of the people and not serving the partisan purpose of any political organization. Partisanship and patriotism will never pull well together. [Applause.] The close cooperation of men enlisted together in a common cause may be a good thing. A self-perpetuating political machine working its will in legislation is always a bad thing. The old Republican machine was a bad thing. This new and modern Democratic machine will prove likewise. For years before insurgency scored upon this floor the Republican Party acted as a unit. It had a masterful control—such a control as your leader now exercises over this body. In fact, the Republican Party's dominion was so absolute not only over this House but in every other department of our Government as to invite that abuse of power and selfishness that always comes to concentrated sovereignty.

The servility of this Democratic majority, surrendering, as they have, their judgment and discretion to Mr. UNDERWOOD, are doing the same thing and inviting the same disaster that came under the rule of Cannon. No man is good enough to be king. No man, not even the statesman from Alabama, can wisely be intrusted with the tax-levying power of this Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Day after day since the opening of this Congress we have seen the mighty majority of this House herded "like dumb, driven cattle" into the Democratic corral caucus for training and subjugation. In due time they were permitted to come upon this floor to act as if they were legislators, but their consciences were in the keeping of the Ways and Means Committee. Some of this committee have visibly suffered from the realization of their own importance during the course of this debate. Day after day they have assumed a "holier-than-thou" expression and have taken on not only the responsibility of speaking for their subjugated colleagues, but also the responsibility of this whole Nation, not only presently but for the long future. Do not take yourselves too seriously, gentlemen. From the murmurings coming up from the people right now I fancy that the burden of this Government presently is about all the undeveloped shoulders of Democracy can bear. [Applause on the Republican side.]

However, in all fairness we must concede that the responsibility of this Government is heavy and the course of true statesmanship not easy to follow. I am sure that Democracy is trying hard to move forward, and I would be the last to find fault or appear unreasonably captious about mistakes in judgment on the part of men who are honestly striving to serve the common good, as I know many men are with zeal and sincerity on both sides of this Chamber. It is the assumption of superior statecraft while displaying such a limited understanding of the facts that invites the criticism I offer of this all-powerful Ways and Means Committee. The gentleman from Alabama asserts that the whole responsibility now rests on him and the committee. Let this be conceded and it does not follow that it was wise or necessary for him to assume infallibility in statesmanship by pledging his followers in advance to refuse every amendment or change that would be suggested as the result of debate and thorough consideration on this floor. It is already apparent that it is the clear purpose of this Underwood omnibus train to carry this legislation through as per schedule regardless of the condition of its freight or the comfort of its passengers. Let trespassers who venture to pass the Democratic highway beware, for this is the first through train run by this clever and cocksure, if not cautious, crew. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, the making of this law in secret by the Democrats of this committee, the passing and pledging of every paragraph behind closed doors of the caucus, the mockery of this moot-court trial in which we are now strenuously engaged is wrong—wrong as a method of legislation and, I believe, must prove wrong when measured by results. But, of course, that is the real test. Is the bill itself bad or good? That is the real question.

With many of the provisions of this bill I find myself in sympathy. In a general way this measure obeys the mandate of the people for a general reduction of tariff taxes. It is a revision downward, decidedly and substantially downward, and as such it has my hearty support. The customs duties it applies to many articles very accurately measure the difference in cost of production in this country and abroad and are such as will stimulate real and reasonable competition. If we were permitted to act on every paragraph separately, I would gladly vote for many of them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the schedule making provision for an income tax is correct in principle, and I heartily favor it. In a resourceful country like this, where, unfortunately, there is such a spread between wealth and poverty, such a big difference in the size of large and average incomes, justice demands a fairer distribution of the burdens of Government than is possible by any tax that can be levied on consumption. The simplest and fairest way of equalizing the burden of taxation where wealth is so unequally distributed is by such a scheme as this—by a direct and graduated tax on incomes. It will never work real hardship to compel a $4,000-a-year income to pay a substantial sum in support of the Government for the protection of that income and its enjoyment. I would, however, amend this law so as to increase the rate on the excessive incomes of the overrich. Such an increase, if maintained, would in time bring about a fairer distribution of wealth. This is important. It is time that Congress realized the menace that lies in the great concentration of wealth in a few hands. Our one great national peril is concentration of wealth. If wise legislation fails to guard against this peril and by degrees remove it, there will come a time when socialism will assimilate both the peril and the poverty and do some pie cutting of its own, either by due process of law or otherwise. It is high time for such regulating devices as a scientific and graduated income tax, and the Democratic Party deserves credit for this schedule, as well as for the reductions made in many of the necessities of life. [Applause.]

There is one feature, however, Mr. Chairman, of this income-tax schedule which is clearly unjust. I refer to the tax on the net income of a strictly mutual insurance company. Such a tax falls directly on the policy holder, who in countless instances is a poor man or woman already overtaxed on consumption, with an income far less than the $4,000 limit in the bill. The dividends which a policy holder in a mutual company receives back from the company from time to time is in no true sense of the word a business profit. It is a return of a part of his own capital which the mutual company has been conserving and holding for him. What the holder of a mutual certificate of insurance pays in to the company from year to year is in no sense of the word a part of the income of that company. It is an investment of capital. What he gets back from time to time is not a dividend in the real meaning, but a return of his own capital. If this amendment is not made to the income-tax schedule the law will discriminate directly against many millions of small policy holders in mutual insurance companies whose incomes are less than $4,000 a year. Other defects in this schedule may develop under full discussion, but its fundamental idea is sustained by sound public policy.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I can not vote for this bill as a whole, forced upon us as it is, as an omnibus measure. True, it has many commendable features, but with them and underlying them all it has one fatal and fundamental fault that damns it with an unforgivable original sin. It is an unfair law; a sectional cotton-bred law; a selfish, sectional, cotton-country law. It is frankly rankly unfair to the Nation as a whole and cruelly oppressive to the great State for which I speak. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Northern agriculture is hard hit. It is thrown off guard by duty on wheat and cattle and then struck below the belt with free flour and free meat. Our farmers are stripped of protection, so far as the selling price of what they produce is concerned, while at the same time they are compelled to pay a duty on the raw furs which they need in our inclement winters and which were heretofore free. The free admission of farm machinery will help the Harvester Trust, but not the farmer, for the trust operates and controls prices on both sides of the water. Free raw wool will hurt the wool producer without helping the wool consumer, and there is still a protective tax on woolen goods in this bill which will enable the Wool Trust to maintain its prices Free raw cotton will not help the cotton consumer for the same reason. Free sugar in time will help, and free lumber will make building less burdensome, but foreign competition in the production of flour and meat will depress the farmer's market more than he can stand under excessive transportation rates and high cost of living conditions. This bill is artfully drawn to throw the whole burden of the reduction of cost of living of the Nation upon the producing farmers of the North and West, sparing the agriculturists of the South, with friends at court, and the toilers in the eastern cities, whose suffrage is sought to maintain the present administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MANAHAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his opening argument on this bill, said that it was built upon the principle of competition. That sounds good in theory, but I submit there can be no intelligent competition unless the rates are based upon the principle of making good the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. If the rates are so high as to be prohibitive there can be no competition. It is equally true that if the rates are so low as to destroy home production there will be no competition. Fair competition can never be secured and maintained without legislation enacted with intelligent regard for the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Alabama is simply indulging in sophistry. He recognizes the lameness of the tariff-for-revenue theory if applied without regard to its effect upon industries. He therefore approaches the Republican doctrine of protection based upon the actual difference between the cost of production, and he flirts with this theory, calling it the competitive theory, as though it could be competitive and not protective. A nonpartisan tariff commission to ascertain and report to Congress all the facts regarding production at home and abroad is the only way competition and protection can be secured and maintained.

But on what strange new theory has the committee hit when it puts a duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat and admits flour free; when it taxes cattle and admits meat free? This alarming and extraordinary principle of taxing the raw material of the manufacturer and admitting free of duty the finished article of his foreign competitor is competition with a vengeance. It is bum business, sham statesmanship. What chance has a miller of Minnesota to pay a full price to the Minnesota farmer for cash wheat at the terminal markets? Under this law what chance has the miller to compete with flour from England and South America if he pays the northwestern farmer the price apparently secured to him by the 10-cent tariff on wheat?

The gentleman from Alabama speaks of sane competition; then he puts hobble skirts around the legs of the millers and blinders on the farmers while entering them in the food-supplying contest of the world. This is not fair. All the smiles and suavity of the artful leader of the majority can never make it fair. It is not fair to the millers and it is not fair to the farmers, who never can get more for their wheat than the millers can afford to pay and compete with foreign flour. We have in this country over 10,000 flour mills, and they represent a capitalization of approximately $350,000,000; it is a stupendous industry. It gives employment to many thousands of high-class men, who can not afford to have their wages lowered to meet the competition of England nor to be thrown out of employment, because the market for their output will be restricted. It is thought that when the Senate gets this bill that protection will be given the milling industry by placing wheat on the free list and thus enable the mills to obtain enormous quantities of wheat from Canada at a low price. This would put the millers on equal terms with foreign millers but it would be at the expense of the farmers of this country. Free wheat would hit Minnesota and Dakota especially hard, because of the vast fields that lie to the north, which raise wheat in greater abundance and at less cost. Does anyone think that hitting the farmer will help the men in town or make the lot of the laborer any easier? Is anyone so dull as to fail to see that the general welfare of the laboring man as well as of the business man in the cities must always and constantly depend upon the prosperity and productiveness of the farms? There can be no conflict of interest between the farmers and the toilers in town. Their interests are identical. If you make farm life hard and unattractive, the young men and women of the country will congest the cities and make more fierce the competition of the city toilers. Furthermore, it will make the farms less productive; therefore farm supplies less plentiful; therefore higher prices will be charged for food to eat. You never can make the food of the earth cheap to city dwellers except by making farms pleasant and productive, so that bounteous crops will be raised. The cities of the Northwest are especially dependent on the prosperity of the farms of the Northwest. A fiscal law like this, designed to supply the great cities on the seashore with cheap meat from South America and cheap bread from the mills and bakeries of England, that can easily be delivered on the docks of New York on cheap ocean rates, may make the cost of living less in that great city, but it will drain much money from America as well as narrow the market of the Northwest producer and knock off his prices. What effect will this have upon our cities? What keeps our cities going but our mills, our commerce, our transportation; generally speaking, the business of supplying the farmers with their needs and carrying the farmers' crops to the markets of the world? Destroy the farmers' crops and you cut commerce coming and going. Cut commerce in two and you destroy one-half of the city's business and make the other half still and stagnant. You injure labor also. When traffic falls off, the railroads and factories let out their surplus men. When farms are unproductive, surplus help, and discontented farmers' boys also, congregate in the cities, swelling the ranks of the unemployed. Men out of work stop buying from merchants. Merchants with diminishing sales dismiss their clerks. Clerks and factory hands and railroad men and discontented farmers glut the labor market, lowering wages, compelling strikes and disorder, and breeding widespread discontent. All caused by a selfish law. Our agriculture is stricken down and, going down, carries with it the country's commerce and the city's life. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Alabama also says that his party is legislating in the interest of the consumer. Does he not know that in this country consumers and producers are identical? In every well-ordered community the consumer is also a producer. No man has a right to do nothing if he consumes. The idle overrich and the tramp consume without producing, but, generally speaking, you can not legislate adversely to the producer without injury to the consumer, for they are identical.

Mr. Chairman, the majority claim they are redeeming their promise to reduce the cost of living, and in so far as they are helping consumers without at the same time inflicting injury upon the same consumers in their capacity as producers their efforts are commendable. It is well to make necessities cheaper, but what good are cheap things if you have nothing to buy them with? It is good to lower the cost of living if at the same time and to a greater degree you do not lower the means of livelihood. This bill is not wisely drawn, for in too many paragraphs our saving as consumers will not equal our loss as producers, leaving the balance of trade against us as a Nation and making us constantly poorer as a people. Sending millions of our money annually to South America for meat and flour will never make us as a Nation more able to buy food and clothing generally.

The cost of living should be reduced, of course, but do not begin at the wrong end and cripple the producer; tariff rates are too high and should be lowered, but not to the extent of draining our country of its cash and putting our producers out of business. Hit the trusts as hard as you like, for the trusts are largely responsible for the high cost of living. The rake-off by middle men, inluding the freight rates and unnecessary machinery of distribution caused by the overcongestion of the cities; the watered stock of corporations, big and little; and the waste and destruction of capital in needless pursuits is responsible quite as much as the direct tariff for the excessive prices paid by consumers in this country, and the gentlemen on the other side are dreaming vainly if they think that this bill will solve the problem.

Mr. Chairman, if this revision were fairly and wisely made it would aim to help and not hamper the farmers of our country. The cities are too big now and contain to many nonproductive men, like lawyers and doctors and bankers and brokers, jobbers and journalists; too many clerks in too many offices, all occasioned by the artificial, abnormal, extravagant, unhealthy, and unwholesome life of the great congested cities. It would be infinitely better for the race if the pure and invigorating life of the farms was made so attractive, prosperous, and easy that men and women would live there by choice. Congestion is disease either in national or physical life; it induces pain and decay in the nation as it does in the body; it always means ultimate destruction if not checked and controlled. This bill encouraging cheap low living on foreign products in our seaboard cities is unscientific and utterly lacking in comprehensive statesmanship. So far as its agriculture schedules are concerned it is tax from any angle and it is hostile to the farmer. True it gives him free lumber, but with free meat, free flour, and free potatoes putting him in competition with the plains of South America and other foreign fields he will have no occasion to enlarge his barns and granaries and have no money with which to build new houses.

But, says the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], we have lowered the rate on cheap rugs and mats from China and Japan and we have put cash registers, lifeboats, and stones and sand on the free list. The farmers of the Northwest care little for Japanese art at any price. Their cash requires no registers in counting; they have all the stones and sand they need in their business. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of our cold country are entitled to have woolen blankets and woolen clothing at a more reasonable price than they have been compelled to pay, but it is not a square deal to put raw wool on the free list while still giving a protection to woolen manufacturers of 25 per cent on blankets, 35 per cent on dress goods, and 50 per cent on carpets. The Woolen Trust, with its lawyers and lobbyists, and not the farmer with his flocks of sheep, has always been responsible for the excessive cost of woolen goods. This bill continues to protect the Wool Trust. It will wipe out the sheep raisers of this country, and our money will go away for mutton as well as wool and help the farmers in foreign lands. The theory of this bill seems to rest on the principle of giving everything to the foreigner and getting nothing in return. It would be better to encourage the production of mutton and wool in this country. You discourage it in the face of the record since 1867, which shows that whenever the duties were below 11 cents per pound our flocks have decreased, while on the other hand they have always increased during periods when the rate was 11 cents per pound or higher. During the last four years of the time the 12½ cents per pound rates of 1867 were in force flocks increased about 25 per cent. During the six years of the time when the 1883 law of 10 cents per pound was in force they decreased 16 per cent. During something less than four years of the 11-cent rate of 1890 flocks showed an increase of 10 per cent. Under the law of 1894 for a like period, while wool was free, there was a decrease of 21 per cent in the flocks. Under the law of 1897 of 11 cents per pound there has been an increase of 46 per cent.

In the face of this record we may be able to eat cheap mutton while we idly sit and watch the passing of this Nation's diminishing herds of sheep, but if our herds are destroyed and the Packing Trust controls the carcasses that come from Argentina and Australia, will our mutton be either cheap or wholesome? Furthermore, it is absurd to argue that free raw wool will substantially affect the price of woolen clothing. Under the present rate the amount of the tariff tax actually paid on all of the raw wool that is used in the making of an ordinary suit of clothes is about 75 cents. It is the excessive rate on woolen clothing under the present law, and not the rate on raw wool, and the domination of the woolen trade by the trust that compels the consumer to pay from $5 to $15 per suit more than he should pay.

Mr. Chairman, permit me time in conclusion to say that this Underwood bill should not be recommended for passage in its present form. It is wrong and inconsistent to tax woolen clothing while admitting raw wool free; to tax wheat while admitting flour free; to tax cattle while admitting beef free. It is wrong to legislate our sheep raisers out of business; to make the hazardous business of raising potatoes on a large scale more hazardous by the free admission of that important product. It is wrong to put white men and women in Minnesota working at fair wages making clean and wholesome mats and rugs out of wire grass in competition with the cheap, low toilers of China and Japan, making similar rugs out of like material. It is wrong to cut the rate of hay in two, subjecting our farms to the vast prairies of Canada and preventing our farmers from properly conserving their land by rotating their crops unless they do so at a loss. It is wrong, selfish, and discriminating to tax the cheap furs needed in the North while admitting free the things required by the cotton growers of the South. It is wrong and unwise to legislate against agriculture as this bill does. It injures the farmer and laborer as well, for in our civilization they must stand or fall together. This measure is wise in many respects, but it is fundamentally unfair to the North, and especially the Northwest. It is a partial, partisan law. This bill will help the cotton belt and the congested seaboard cities; it will help consumers with fixed incomes here and there temporarily, but in the long result it can not serve this Nation well, because it will drain too much money to foreign lands, lower the standards of our toiling millions in their futile effort to compete with lower types, and set back and retard the growth of agriculture, which is and must always be the heart of this Nation's national life, the support of this Nation's strength, and the source of all our real and enduring greatness. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE].

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the House unnecessarily in a long discussion of the merits of the tariff bill, for the reason that I feel and know that every item in this bill has received most cautious and painstaking consideration not only at the hands of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee but also by every Member of the Democratic Party on this side of the House. We have studied it, worked on it, and talked on it for days and weeks, even months, and the embodiment of our efforts is now contained in this bill before us. It is, of course, true that certain items of the bill like—for myself—farm products, for one instance, would be treated differently if we were each writing the bill for ourselves. I was opposed to the Canadian reciprocity bill because the duties on what the farmer consumed were not sufficiently lowered and, as I looked at it, he was discriminated against. But taking this tariff bill as a whole it will accomplish, in my humble opinion, what it is desired it should do, and that which we promised the American people we would do—that is, reduce the high cost of living and restore competition in the business world which for so long a time has been stifled by monopoly fostered by a prohibitive tariff.

I desire for a moment to express my full satisfaction and accord with the income-tax feature of this bill, and especially do I want to express my complete approval of its provisions. Other countries for many years have enjoyed the benefits of an income tax and have raised the major portion of their revenue from this tax on incomes. Through the good efforts and successes of a sufficient number of the States having ratified the amendment for an income tax we are now enabled to pass a bill which includes this income tax, and from its application and workings the Government will derive millions of dollars annually from the rich, which has heretofore been levied on the poor in the guise and nature of revenue duties on the necessities of everyday livelihood.

The income tax will oblige the man or corporation with a net annual income in excess of $4,000, as our bill now stands, to pay a percentage on the excess over that amount to the Government. This is fair and equitable from every standpoint, and can not justly be complained of by the persons and corporations who will be obliged to pay this tax. The men or company of affairs and large income, with their property, require the attention and protection of the officers and agents of our Government in the protection of themselves and their vast property rights. The more their property the more of that kind of protection they require, and it is nothing more than plain fairness that they should pay more toward the support of this Government than those who are less fortunate in their financial income and who therefore require less of the kind of protection mentioned. As a whole the tariff bill, with its income-tax features, will reduce, as is its aim, the abnormal high cost of living, and will speedily restore to the people of our country a more nearly equal footing between the men of wealth and the everyday men, like you and me.

I am not yet content, however, gentlemen, that we should stop here in our earnest efforts to provide a permanent relief to the people of this country, and before the expiration of this session of Congress I shall introduce in this House, for your consideration and ultimate approval, a measure that I have had under consideration for many months past. As it is in direct accord with our ideas to help the great mass of the people at large, it is not out of the way for me to mention it at this time. While we are complaining about the excessive tariffs on some of the items of daily consumption which go to make up the high cost of living, we should remember that in this vast country of ours, and especially in the Middle Western States and in that great and noble State of Kansas, a portion of which I have the honor to represent in this House, great numbers of people and, as a matter of fact, the great majority of the people are borrowers of money, and must borrow in order to carry on their business, whether they be merchants or farmers. The interest rates which they are required to pay are, in my opinion, exorbitant, and this great and powerful Government and the Democratic Party should be the first to give the people this relief and aid in the matter of lower interest rates also. At this time the statistics show the average rate of interest for the year 1912 paid by the borrowers of this country was 7.75 per cent. In the North Atlantic States the rate was 5.96; the South Atlantic States, 7.36; Northern Central States east of the Mississippi, 6.38; the Northern Central States west of the Mississippi, 8.5; the Eastern Central States, 9.51; and the far Western States, 8.55. This rate of interest makes a decided advance in the already high cost of living, and, as I have said before, it is time that our Government should come to the aid and assistance of these overburdened borrowers and provide for them a system whereby the Government will furnish to them money on approved security at 3.5 or 4 per cent. The bill I shall introduce in this Congress will provide for the establishment of a farm-loan department in the Government, under which plan a man with land for security—and the reason that I say land is because it is the basis of all wealth and has a fixed value and can not be destroyed—may apply to this Government for a loan for an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the actual value of his land, and the Government, through its duly appointed agencies provided for in the bill for the purpose, will furnish the money on long time, and allow its repayment in reasonable options by the borrower. With the enactment into law of this bill in addition to our tariff bill we shall then not only have filled our full obligation to the American people, but we shall have brought unto them a benefaction that will bless them, and make it possible for even greater improvement in our rural districts, the establishment and maintenance of better homes, and a more genuine contentment among our people. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, within the past 50 years the United States has increased in population three times and in general wealth eight times. This period is coincident with the development and application of the theory of protection. The only times of general public distress in that period have been those when the protective policy has been set aside or seriously threatened adversely. Our material development has grown to great dimensions during this period when American opportunities were kept for the American farmer, the American laborer, the American manufacturer, and the American man of business generally. It is now proposed forcibly by law to open these opportunities to the world for the benefit of foreign peoples under such conditions as to give the Americans the worst of the situation, and this is to be done at once without providing opportunity for a gradual readjustment, which grace it seems to me should have been allowed to soften the blow at least. Our material prosperity is a great construction. It is marvelous that any party calling itself an American party should think so little of this as to propose and support a measure whose purpose, effect, and intent is to forcibly alter the course of our development and to open to foreign manufacturers, laborers, and producers, in the name of compulsory competition, on terms unfair to Americans, the greatest market in the world freely and without securing to us any advantage in return. Our industries, our standards of living, our productions have reached their present high state of development under the protective system. Even if it might be conceded that the protective system was economically wrong, yet our American people, having made their greatest development under it, have a right to expect that if it is to be replaced by another and untried system that it be done in the least harmful way.

The raising of a revenue sufficient for the growing needs of a nation as great as ours is a serious problem. As the little girl said, whose mother found her soaking wet in the bathtub and asking what she was doing, "Mamma, I am trying to walk on the water, and I tell you its no fool's job, either." Yet the raising of a sufficient revenue is not necessarily a process antagonistic to production, labor, or industry. Under Republican administrations it has been made to foster every proper business and labor and production, and the Republican program of making the tariff equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad is an American plan to foster American industry.

Under the pending bill the raising of revenue appears to be the matter of first importance; even the title of the bill discards any claim of intention or purpose to foster or promote American industry. What answer will it be to the American producer when he asks for a place to sell his products, made by high-priced, intelligent labor, to say "See how our markets are filled with the products of the underpaid foreign laborer; or to the American laborer, when he asks for employment to secure the necessaries of life, to say "You might buy some things cheaper now if you had the money to do so." Some 20 years ago this was tried with the most disastrous results. And the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, that the policy now proposed has not produced injury rather than benefits. Is it wise to hazard our prosperity again?

The production of wool is of importance to not only those who make it their principal business to run sheep on land that can not profitably be used for other purposes, but also to the great majority of the farmers of the United States. The great flocks of sheep furnish a ready and steady market for crops of hay and other farm products that would have difficulty in finding a profitable market otherwise. They furnish a market close at hand, avoiding the losses incident to high cost of transportation elsewhere, even if a distant market could be found. The farmers use sheep as a profitable means of keeping their lands clean and of enriching them, and the returns from them, under the protective policy, furnish the farmer with a steady source of income. There is no justification for placing raw wool on the free list. There is no reason to believe that free wool will cause a reduction in the price of any yard of cloth used by the American consumer. Even if by putting wool on the free list any reduction in the price per yard were possible, it would not result to the benefit of the consumer, but would be absorbed by the manufacturer and the seller. And even if we should concede that the price of cloth per yard would be slightly reduced if raw wool were admitted free, it would not justify the great economic loss to the country as a whole in crippling and probably destroying one of our most important industries. With the present condition of production of meat foods, it is unwise to injure the production of mutton, one of the most wholesome and nutritious of all meat foods, the use of which will be sure of a large increase under conditions favorable to the growing of sheep. I recall very vividly that sheep were regarded as unprofitable animals in the early nineties, which both before and since have been a source of a steady income and profit to the growers. Most Oregon growers of sheep suffered severe losses in the period named, and they view the present policy of free wool with lively and well-founded distrust, and are wondering why an industry that befriends everybody should be again subject to conditions that have formerly wrought great injury.

Oregon ranks sixth among the sheep-producing States, which in the order of their importance are as follows: Montana, Wyoming, Ohio, New Mexico, Idaho, Oregon. And in wool production Oregon ranks sixth also.

From the 1913 report of the Oregon Board of Sheep Commissioners I quote as follows:

Assuming that in eastern Oregon there are 2,225,000 sheep and one man is employed for each 400 sheep, this would increase the number of citizens of our State intimately connected with the sheep industry to 45,562; and estimating that one in each six of these laborers is married and has a family of four, then we have 49,278 people in Oregon having a "bread and butter" interest in our sheep industry. This is a large per cent of the rural population of our State and should indicate to people that the sheep industry of Oregon is one of the greatest assets to our prosperous Commonwealth. The collection of data for the Tariff Board and our report shows that the Oregon flockmaster pays on an average of $1 per head to labor for all sheep he owns. We must bear in mind that the laborer on the sheep ranch is the best paid agricultural laborer in the State. These herders and camp tenders receive from $40 to $60 a month and their board. If we have 2,225,000 sheep in eastern Oregon, then the sheep industry of this State pays to eastern Oregon labor $1 for each sheep in this district, or $2,225,000. Western Oregon possibly runs sheep at an even greater expense in so far as labor is concerned, as it is generally conceded that large enterprises are in a position to get larger returns from its labor. We might conservatively estimate that western Oregon pays to labor for the care of her 300,000 sheep something like $400,000. This amount added to the money paid to eastern Oregon labor swells the total to the sum of $2,625,000. This amount relates solely to the labor caring for sheep and does not in any way include the clerk in the store, the banker, the employee of the railroad, and a score of other employees more or less dependent on the sheep industry. It is difficult to determine the exact amount of money that the sheep industry brings to the State, as the amounts vary from year to year. It might be reasonably estimated as great as $8,000,000 during the banner years. This is a large sum of money, but its importance is more appreciated when we remember that it is profit or income that is returned from the waste places of the State. It represents an amount of money that has been gleaned from the uninhabitable desert and the thickets of our mountains and, if not made use of by sheep grazing, would probably gradually undergo decay or form tinder for our forest fires. The valuation of the sheep and the equipment necessary to run the same in the State of Oregon may be conservatively placed at $32,000,000.

The protest I have made in behalf of the sheep grower can justly be made in behalf of the grower of grain, fruit, and other agricultural products, and in behalf of the producer of lumber and other products from trees in whose cost of production the labor cost is by far the largest item. All the industries in Oregon are legitimate, and criticisms upon their conduct are rare; and there are few which, it seems to me, will not be adversely affected by this bill if it becomes a law in its present form.

Placing meats upon the free list will tighten the grip of the Beef Trust upon the throat of the American raiser of cattle, sheep, and hogs and upon the purse of the American consumer. I submit the following quotation from the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of April 26, 1913. The flood of meat products to come in will not, I fear, prove of any material or permanent benefit to our people under the manipulations of the trust, but will work great injury to all engaged in growing meats in the United States. The trusts have not complained of the proposed schedules of this bill:

AUSTRALIAN BEEF FOR UNITED STATES.

[London Financial Times, Apr. 11, 1913.]

Australian Government commissioners at San Francisco confirm the statement that Australian beef, mutton, pork, and butter will in a few weeks flood the markets of San Francisco and other American cities.

LARGE TRADE PLANNED—BUTTER SUPPLY.

Expecting at least a lowering of the present tariff on meats admitted into America, the Swift and Armour interests are now preparing for the construction of a huge slaughterhouse and freezing plant at Brisbane, Queensland, from which they will ship to the States thousands of frozen sheep, hogs, and cattle weekly. The American companies will also handle Australian butter, which at the present has been debarred from the American market through the presence of boric acid as a preservative. Apparently the acid will be omitted in future, and freezing alone depended on for preserving.

According to Mr. D. E. Quinn, now New South Wales commissioner for the United States, hundreds of cattle breeders of Texas and other Southern and Western States have signified their intention of going to northern Australia and going into the cattle business upon a bigger scale than ever before attempted. Already concessions have been arranged for the taking over of vast portions of more than 1,000,000 square miles of virgin territory, which is adapted to the raising of millions of sheep and cattle annually.

LARGE PACKING PLANT.

The largest killing, freezing, and packing plant in the world will soon be in course of construction at one of the seaports of northern Australia, in which sheep, hogs, and cattle will be handled for the markets of the world.

The tariff as a revenue-collecting measure is economic and financial legislation. It involves the accurate and scientific study of world-wide production, distribution, and consumption. It includes costs of various kinds, such as the cost of raw materials, labor, plant and equipment, overhead charges, transportation, finding markets, and others. These several items vary both as to time and place. To collect all the facts, to interpret the information truly and fairly, and to express this interpretation properly in the form of legislation will require long, patient, and scientific study. For this reason I am in favor of a tariff board or commission which shall take up the tariff schedules one by one, investigate and report upon them to Congress and to the country that the people may be fully informed, and that thereupon Congress, with such impartial and scientific information to guide it, should pass tariff laws, schedule by schedule, on a basis that will equalize the cost of production at home and abroad and that will provide an adequate proportion of the revenue.

I favor and have favored a scientific reduction in many of the duties in the existing law. I believe the duties should be so distributed as to bear fairly upon all, according to their ability to pay where payment may be required, and in such a manner as to give no man or body of men an advantage over their fellow men; that is, so that none may be advantaged at the expense of others. I believe this is not true of the pending bill. Great combinations, with foreign connections, or plants now in existence or in process of construction or planned to be constructed, are its immediate beneficiaries.

There are a few features in the bill that are commendable. It is to be regretted that for the good of our people there are not many more. Its demerits are many. I approve a properly distributed and administered income tax, but find in the plan of collecting such a tax under the proposed measure many things to disapprove and which should be changed before the bill becomes a law. In its present form it will prove a burden and an annoyance, especially to the honest farmer and business man, and will discourage industrial investments and enterprises employing labor.

It is evident that, bound by the decisions of a secret caucus on this bill, our friends across the aisle, the Democratic Party, will pass this bill through the House without amendment, excepting such minor ones as the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means may offer. No vital amendment will be allowed; no plea that we may make, no evidence we may submit, and no argument we may advance, however sound, will receive consideration. Under such conditions consideration under the five-minute rule is a pretense, and no amendment offered from the floor of the House, no matter how sound or necessary for the country's good it may be, will be allowed to pass. Here, upon the floor of the House, where all can participate, and not in secret caucus, is the place to consider a great revenue measure that vitally affects all our people, and amendments offered from the floor ought to be voted up or voted down upon their intrinsic merits, and not by reason of action taken beforehand in secret caucus, binding a majority to vote against amendments no matter how important or valuable they may be.

There is a very general prosperity throughout the country, or was until the threat of free trade caused a slowing up. The farmer, the laborer, the manufacturer, the business man generally, and the professional man were doing well. It has been characteristic of Republican administrations that under them honest and legitimate industry has been fairly rewarded. The protective policy has justified itself. It is now proposed to disregard all this and to enter upon a policy little tried in recent years in this country, and when tried has caused distress and left painful memories.

The National Farmer and Stock Grower, St. Louis, Mo., says editorially in its issue for April, 1913, in part:

FARMERS AND THE TARIFF—WHAT CONGRESS IS LIKELY TO DO AND WHAT CONGRESS WILL BE RESPONSIBLE FOR IF THE PROTECTIVE SYSTEM IS LEGISLATED OUT OF BUSINESS.

The National Farmer and Stock Grower is not a political paper.

We venture the assertion that if the people of the United States were permitted to vote on the tariff question alone, and not have it mixed up with all other subjects that divide people into parties, the vote on the tariff would be overwhelmingly in favor of the protection to American industries of all kinds through the imposition of customs duties that would shut nothing out entirely, but would collect some money for the support of the Government on all raw materials and manufactured goods admitted from foreign countries.

* * * * * * *

People in the United States are not going to prosper on the money that goes to Australia for wool, or on the money that goes to Canada for wheat, or on the money that goes to Argentine for beef. We prosper on the money that is paid to our own people. It goes out and it comes back again. It gets into circulation. But the money that is sent abroad remains there, and our exports are not any larger from that source of revenue.

The farm productions of this country are ample for all purposes. One-half of the time our grain productions sell at prices that barely return the cost of production. There has never yet been a time when there was a bonanza in grain growing. Through years of low prices and sacrifice, cattle have for once reached what may be called high prices, but only because of the changes that on the one hand have destroyed cattle ranges, but the cattle ranges cut up into farms have not yet produced the maximum of beef. Year in and year out farm productions bring moderate prices, and the burdens of the consumer are not caused by the wholesale cost of anything the farmer raises.

We have no hesitancy in saying as our editorial opinion that the admission of farm products free of duty from other countries will gradually undermine the productive industries of this country. The change will not take place in a day, but we will soon be in the position of a family when the head of it gambles his earnings away instead of taking the money home to his wife. Industrial enterprises will be in difficulties, for the reason that trade will be dull and wages high. Less people will be employed and many industries will be at a standstill. The farmer will be able to feed himself, but he will find himself short of money; he will practice economy and produce crops that cost the least for seed and the least cost for labor.

In another column will be found an article entitled "Our industrial policy."

The article referred to is as follows:

OUR INDUSTRIAL POLICY—WE ARE IN FAVOR OF ALL FOREIGN FARM PRODUCTIONS PAYING A DUTY FOR THE SUPPORT OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT, AND TO PAY IT AT THE FRONT DOOR.

The National Farmer and Stockgrower is in favor of the United States customhouse collecting a reasonable range of duties upon all foreign farm products and all manufactured goods admitted into the United States from foreign countries, said duties to be applied to the support of the National Government.

By the tariff policy that we advocate fully one-half the money required for the support of the National Government should be collected at the customhouses, besides furnishing the farmer and manufacturer the very moderate amount of protection to which they are entitled. We are opposed to the admission of foreign farm products free of duty, because admission of such products duty free always leads to the advantage of the foreign merchant and speculator and causing increased burdens to be imposed on our own people.

The admission of foreign goods free of duty results in higher prices to the American consumer and higher taxation also upon our own products to make up the necessary revenues.

Every farmer in the United States is taxed by his county and by the State; he also pays a share of the taxes collected in various ways for the support of the Federal Government. We believe that in return for his support in tax money and in time of necessity for his personal services the American citizen is entitled to preference in his home market for his own productions from the laws of the Government he supports. We believe that the advantages of our own markets belong to the citizens of the United States, and that all foreign farm productions should pay a duty at the front door as the goods are admitted. In times of scarcity, caused by drought or other unavoidable influences, the foreign farm productions can come in under light duties on a fair basis, and in times of abundance the country thrives better without them.

We believe the farmer as a producer outranks all other people; the manufacturer is next; but without the farmer's products the manufacturer would have to shut his doors.

Legislation against the farming interest is the height of folly, and special discrimination against the farmer is a political crime. Legislation against the farmer will cause more poverty in the cities than most people imagine. The nonproducing so-called consumers in cities will be the first to find it out and be the greatest sufferers.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative from the great manufacturing State of Pennsylvania, I would be remiss in my duty to my fellow citizens if I did not enter a protest against the tariff bill now under consideration.

The Democratic Party told us during the campaign that it was not their intention to disturb or injure any legitimate business, but what has been the result of this proposed legislation? The measure no sooner emerges from the Democratic caucus, where it has been considered in secret and behind closed doors, than the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, and the manufacturer alike are alarmed over the situation.

It is admitted as an economic principle that the prime essential of business prosperity is public confidence in the good sense of the Government and its ability to deal intelligently with the various problems of legislation that confront it. That confidence the Democratic Party has not had for many years, and now just in the beginning of its career its party pledges are being broken, and its tariff measure is admitted as inadequate and not in harmony with the conditions in our country.

The Republican doctrine of sound tariff requires that the duties shall be fixed neither too high nor too low.

In the Sixty-first Congress a Tariff Board was created, which considered carefully Schedules K and I, the woolen and cotton schedules, but the Democratic Party has ignored the labors of that board, and has not given the kind of tariff the country needs but proceeds in the old way of tariff tinkering. All Republicans and many Democrats deplore the measure.

The Republican Party to-day stands unequivocally for a tariff board and has introduced into the Sixty-third Congress a bill creating a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission.

The manufacturer tells us if the Underwood bill becomes a law he will have to reduce wages or close down his works.

The farmer, penetrating the delusion of free agricultural implements, when there is nothing made abroad that competes with the American products, sees nothing in the bill to induce his boy to remain on the farm.

The mechanic and laborer know full well that if we are to compete with the markets of the world their products which come from the sweat of the brow must share their burden of tariff reduction.

Some of our citizens still remember the last time the Democratic Party revised the tariff and the awful consequences that followed. Business was stagnated, industry paralyzed, and the Nation's credit impaired. The country's capital had disappeared and its labor was unemployed and distressed.

The Republican Party promised to restore prosperity by means of a protective tariff. The people by a great majority commissioned the Republican Party to enact such laws and almost instantly all branches of industry revived. The mills and shops became busy. Unemployed labor was put to work.

The farmer had a market for his crops and the merchant for his wares. Every section of the country rejoiced and was glad.

Under wise laws enacted by the Republican Party and the honest administration of them prosperity continued almost continually for 16 years and all classes prospered as never before, and each individual by his own thrift and industry, energy and capacity profited to the fullest extent.

It now rests upon the Democratic Party, entering upon its new career, whether we shall march on to nobler triumphs and achievements or whether we shall compel the masses to compete with the low wages of Europe; whether the Nation shall take a step forward or backward; whether, when Democratic theories and beliefs are enacted into laws, prosperity will be continued; whether the price of that which labor produces can be lowered without interference with that labor itself.

If our country prospers under the conditions created by the Underwood bill, then the Democratic Party will probably continue in power, but if the consequences of this tariff legislation shall be of such character as to bring disaster to our country, then we may confidently expect that the Republican Party will write the next tariff bill.

The protective policy has set up a different social, educational, and ethical standard for the wage earner than that of Europe.

In the twenty-fifth congressional district of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor to represent, the wage earner is a home owner and a happy, contented, and prosperous individual. His children have the advantage of a high-school education. His wife and family dress becomingly, and, taken as a class, they are among our best citizens, and I apprehend there is practically no difference between my district and a large majority of the congressional districts of the United States.

Our highest duty to our country is not to seek world-wide commercial supremacy but rather to maintain our high standard of citizenship, not "the whetting of American wits by contest with the rest of the world," but rather we should strive to promote the highest class of citizenship by giving equal opportunity to all to attain the higher enjoyments of life.

This should be America's highest purpose, inspiring, unifying, and fundamental. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to yield some time now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STRINGER].

Mr. STRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this allotment of time in the midst of this discussion, not that I am presumptuous enough to believe that I can impart to the membership of this House any information of which it is not already possessed, but primarily to place in the RECORD my emphatic protest against what to my mind has been a profanation of the fair name and reputation of one of the most distinguished Americans who ever graced the presidential chair.

From my boyhood days, Mr. Chairman, I have ever been a worshiper at the shrine of the Sage of Monticello. In my humble way I have sat at his feet in historic memory and sought to govern my own thoughts on national affairs by those eternal precepts which he enunciated at the day dawn of our history and which have ever since been the guiding tenets of our national faith.

I have always been taught and believed that Jefferson ever stood the enemy of monopoly, the foe to oppression, the friend of labor, and the inspiration of youth.

I have ever been taught and believed that Jefferson stood at all times for purity in public life, economy in the public service, the abolition of special privileges to the few, for taxes no greater than government needs, and for a trade unfettered and free.

Yet despite all this, you and I have been seriously invited, in this present session of this Congress, now convened, by a gentleman on the other side of the aisle, to consider the great Jefferson, the Nation's first commoner, in the light of an apostle and high priest of prohibitive protection and his shades monstrously invoked to bolster up an iniquitous system of unrighteous taxation, now crumbling to its fall, which in its operations has harbored unhallowed combinations of greed, stifled competition, controlled the ebb and flow of trade, fixed the price of daily life, debauched the franchise, and built its fortifications upon the bones of the poor.

In the blaze and light of our boasted latter-day civilization, in the capital of the most enlightened people on the face of the earth, in a Chamber set apart for the deliberations of the greatest legislative body in the world, we are presented with the monstrous doctrine that the Sage of Monticello, friend of the people that he was, was an advocate of that competition-destroying policy in governmental affairs which robs the many for the benefit of the privileged few.

Substantially, that statement has as yet gone unchallenged in the record, but I propose to and do challenge it now and here.

JEFFERSON'S VIEWS.

The gentleman from Ohio has stated that Thomas Jefferson favored a protective tariff and cites as authority statements made by Jefferson in his Foreign Commerce Report of 1793, where he advocates discriminative duties as against nations discriminating against us.

Jefferson favored discriminating duties, it is true. But why and when? I submit, as a matter of history, proved by the records as they now exist, that the discriminating tariffs which Jefferson favored early in his career, but which he greatly modified in his latter years, were advocated by him not as a fixed and settled policy for this Government to pursue, not as a principle to be followed at all times, but as a makeshift policy of temporary design, to be used as a measure of retaliation, and reprisal as well, in situations imminent and extreme, in order that nations which discriminated against us might thereby be compelled to remove those barriers to mutual trade and that free commerce might again prevail.

Had the gentleman from Ohio been more candid he would have read further from that same Foreign Commerce Report the conclusion Jefferson reached in the whole matter when he added these words:

> Could each country be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness, the numbers of mankind would be increased and their condition bettered. (Foreign Commerce Report, Ford's edition, VI, 479, Dec., 1793.)

And what sort of a duty was it to which Jefferson referred in his Foreign Commerce Report? The highest duty known to the schedules at that time amounted to about 10 per cent and its general average was about 5. To cite Thomas Jefferson, who always favored free exchange as a permanent policy to be pursued, but advocated a tariff of 5 per cent as a temporary measure to retaliate against those who discriminated against us—to cite the great Jefferson as an apostle of a high protection which reaches the altitude of the present law—is a proposition too monstrous and too unthinkable to go unchallenged.

JEFFERSON NOT A PROTECTIONIST.

Jefferson a protectionist? Let us see. To Elbridge Gerry, in 1799 (Ford's edition, VII, 328), he wrote:

> I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple, applying all possible savings of the public revenue to the discharge of the national debt. I am for free commerce with all nations and political connection with none.

To William Short, United States chargé d'affaires, he wrote, on July 28, 1791 (Ford's edition, V, 364):

> An exchange of surpluses and wants between neighbor nations is both a right and a duty under the moral law, and measures against right should be mollified in their exercise, if it be wished to lengthen them to the greatest term possible.

To John Adams, in July of 1785 (Ford's edition, IV, 81), he wrote:

> I think all the world would gain by setting commerce at perfect liberty. I take it for granted that the commercial system wished for by Congress was such a one as should leave commerce on the freest footing possible.

And again, in his Notes on Virginia, written in 1782 (Ford's edition, III, 279), he says:

> Our interest will be to throw open the doors of commerce and to knock off all its shackles, giving perfect freedom to all persons for the vent of whatever they may choose to bring into our ports and asking the same in theirs.

In 1823, when the question was agitated of raising the duties to an average of about 20 per cent, to Thomas Cooper, who had written and forwarded to Jefferson a pamphlet protesting against the proposed raise, Jefferson, in acknowledging the receipt of the same and noting its publication in Ritchie's Enquirer, said:

> I was only sorry he did not postpone it to the meeting of Congress, when it would have gotten into the hands of all the Members and could not fail to have a great effect, perhaps a decisive one. It is really an extraordinary proposition that the agricultural, mercantile, and navigating classes should be taxed to maintain that of manufactures. (Ford's edition, X, 285).

Referring to the same subject, on May 3, 1825, he wrote to Samuel Smith:

> Taxes on consumption, like those on capital or income, to be just, must be uniform. I do not mean to say that it may not be for the general interest to foster for a while certain infant manufactures until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals; but when evident that they will never be so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them. When it was found that France could not make sugar under 6 h. a pound, was it not tyranny to restrain here citizens from importing at 1 h.? Or would it not have been so to have laid a duty of 5 h. on the imported? The permitting an exchange of industries with other nations is a direct encouragement of your own, which without that would bring you nothing for your comfort and would, of course, cease to be produced. (Ford's edition, X, 252).

And when, despite his advice to the contrary, Congress passed the act raising the tariff to the said 20 per cent, Jefferson wrote his friend, Richard Rush:

> Congress has just risen, having done nothing remarkable, except the passing of a tariff bill by squeezing majorities, very revolting to a great portion of the people of the States, among whom it is believed it would not have received a vote but of the manufacturers themselves. It is considered as a levy on the labor and efforts of the other classes of industry to support that of manufacture, and I wish it may not draw on our surplus and produce retaliating imposition from other nations. (Ford's edition, X, 304).

Mr. Chairman, I deny that Thomas Jefferson was a protectionist in the modern acceptation of that term. I deny that the moderate duties favored by him are even comparable, in principle or intent, to the duties now levied under existing laws. On the contrary, I affirm that he always stood for the freest of trade interchange between all nations of the earth, and his acts, declarations, and writings unquestionably prove it.

THE PEOPLE VOTED FOR TARIFF REVISION.

Mr. Chairman, the pending tariff measure, known as the Underwood bill, in my humble judgment, is not only a Jeffersonian reform but is in strict accordance with the instructions of the people as registered by them at the polls.

The tariff question is hoary with age, and has occupied the attention, more or less, of the American Congress since the days of the Nation's birth. But the present revival of public interest in this question dates back to the campaign of four years ago.

In that campaign the tariff was the leading, important, and paramount issue. It was then substantially conceded on all sides that the Dingley bill, by reason of its excessive rates, had lessened production, stifled competition, harbored monopoly, and needed immediate revision.

So strong was the public sentiment in that regard that the Republican platform of that year, upon which Mr. Taft was elected, pledged itself in unequivocal terms to a special session of Congress, to be called immediately after the inauguration, to revise the tariff.

During the ensuing campaign, as we all remember, Mr. Taft, on the rear of railroad trains and in great auditoriums throughout the land, repeatedly and specifically declared that that pledge of the Republican platform meant "a substantial revision downward."

To a great Milwaukee audience he said:

> It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard.

Without these declarations Mr. Taft could never have been elected. The people took him at his word, believed his pledges, trusted in his promises, and made him their Executive to carry out the same.

PLEDGES UNFULFILLED.

How did he fulfill them? His first message to Congress, 40 pages in extent, dealt with conditions in the District of Columbia, pleaded for a ship-subsidy law, but was as silent on the all-absorbing question of tariff revision as the deep-mouthed grave.

The final answer which the people received for their demands for tariff revision was the passage of the Payne-Aldrich law, which in its general effect really increased the burdens of tariff taxation and left the people more at the mercy of the trusts than they had ever been before—a law which the late Republican Senator, Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa, described by saying "that the two greatest fakes perpetrated upon the American people" in that year "were Dr. Cook's discovery of the North Pole and the Payne-Aldrich revision of the tariff."

That bill was passed by a Republican Congress, signed and approved by President Taft, and in his subsequent well-known Winona speech he declared it to be the best tariff bill ever enacted by Congress.

THE REBUKE OF 1910.

I need not at this time go into the details of the campaign of 1910 which followed. It resulted in a political revolution. The people rose in their might and relegated to the rear over 100 Congressmen who perpetrated this act, and changed a Republican Congress of 47 majority, with Joseph Cannon as Speaker, into a Democratic Congress of 66 majority, with CHAMP CLARK as Speaker. And to-day in this Congress we behold that Democratic majority increased to 157, with Joseph Cannon succeeded in this body by a Democrat and CHAMP CLARK, by the grace of God and the American people, still the Speaker of the House.

I do not claim that these victories were Democratic partisan victories. They were nonpartisan victories for the people against the special interests. They were triumphs of justice against conscienceless greed. It was an uprising of progressives of all parties alike to place the seal of condemnation on those who had trifled with the liberties of the people. It was a rebuke to President Taft and the party in power for their failure to keep their pledges.

THE REBUKE UNAVAILING.

Yet this rebuke, positive though it was, somehow or other, failed to impress the mind of President Taft or the minds of the Republicans Members of Congress.

For years the Wool Trust had been growing powerful and strong. It had secured protection under the Payne-Aldrich law that was approximately prohibitive. It had increased the price of woolen goods to such an extent that they were beyond the reach of most of our citizens. It was paying enormous dividends to holders of stock. At the same time, as shown in the strike investigation of the Lawrence mills, it was paying starvation wages to its employees, even charging the children who worked in these mills for the very water they drank during their hours of arduous toil. Even President Taft admitted that the wool schedule was indefensible.

Yet despite that admission, despite the rebuke administered to him in the campaign of 1910 by the people at the polls, when the new Democratic Congress, true to its pledges to the people, passed a bill reducing the wool schedule, when enough progressive Republican votes were secured to pass the bill through the Senate, this measure of relief to the American people was struck down by President Taft by the interposition of his veto.

When a Democratic Congress, true to its pledges, passed the farmers' free list bill, when that bill, with progressive Republican assistance, also passed the Senate, President Taft again interposed his veto and again destroyed a wholesome measure of relief.

That bill gave free farming implements to the tillers of the soil. It gave free sewing machines to seamstresses who burn out their eyes making a livelihood. It gave free boots and shoes to those who will go unshod through the wintry snows. It gave free lumber to those who would build schoolhouses and churches and homes for their families. But this measure was also vetoed by the occupant of the White House.

THE ISSUE IN 1912.

Upon this issue President Taft and the Republicans in Congress went before the people in the campaign of 1912 and this issue raised by them was again the leading, dominant, and paramount issue of the campaign.

The Republican Party in its platform indorsed the position of President Taft, renominated him for the Presidency, declared again for a high-protective tariff, and condemned "the Democratic tariff bills passed by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress as sectional, as injurious to the public credit, and as destructive of business enterprise," just as the same party by its Representatives in this Congress are condemning the pending bill to-day.

In the election which followed over 15,000,000 voters registered their views at the polls. Of that number barely three and a half millions indorsed the tariff policy of President Taft and the Republican Members of the Sixty-second Congress. In other words, that policy was repudiated by a majority of over 11,000,000.

THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY.

I have listened in this Hall during the present session of this Congress to slighting references from both sides of the aisle to the fact that the Progressive Party has small representation in this body. But I call your attention to the fact that, small as that representation may be, the few Progressive Members here represent over 4,000,000 voters in this land, and from the tabulated returns have the right to claim that their party is the second great party in this Nation.

While Woodrow Wilson received 435 electoral votes, Theodore Roosevelt received 88 to William H. Taft's quota of 8. While Woodrow Wilson carried 40 States in this Union, Theodore Roosevelt carried 6 as against Mr. Taft's 2.

PLEDGED TO IMMEDIATE REVISION.

But do you tell me that the Progressive Party is a protection party? If you mean by that that the Progressive Party is pledged to the tariff policy outlined by Mr. Taft and the Republican Members of Congress in the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congress, I emphatically deny it.

I go further and say, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], the Progressive leader upon the floor of this House, to the statement that if he and the Progressive Members of this body whom he leads desire to carry out the declarations of their own platform—and I believe they do—they will be compelled by the logic of those declarations to join with us in the passage of the pending measure.

In their platform adopted in Chicago they declare—

We demand tariff revision because the present tariff is unjust to the people of the United States. Fair dealing toward the people requires an immediate downward revision of those schedules wherein duties are shown to be unjust or excessive.

Do you tell me that the Progressive Party favors a nonpartisan tariff commission? That is true, but in the plank in the Progressive platform declaring for such commission their party concludes by saying:

The work of the commission should not prevent the immediate adoption of acts reducing those schedules generally recognized as excessive.

The Progressive Party, therefore, stands pledged to immediate downward revision of the tariff, irrespective of the question of a nonpartisan tariff commission. It so specifically declares in its platform. It denounces the Payne-Aldrich law as "unjust to the people." It declares for an income tax. And I say to the gentleman from Kansas, as his conferees have already said to us, that if they fail to keep faith with the people and fail to carry out the pledges which they have made they will likewise meet the condemnation which they will deserve.

PROPHETS OF ILL.

But we are told that the passage of the pending measure will bring untold disaster upon the Nation at large. Gentlemen upon this floor predict all sorts of terrible evils that will follow. They predict fireless furnaces, smokeless chimneys, unemployed labor, and ruined industries. They even intimate that innocent children will cry, fair women lament, and strong men despair.

The very same men who a few decades ago denominated the Populists of Kansas as being composed of "calamity howlers" and discontents are to-day outhowling the most vociferous Populist who predicted general ruin in those historic days.

So voluble and clamorous are they in prophesying evil things that a suspicion lurks about their utterances that "the wish is father to the thought," that they will be disappointed if this disaster does not come, and are perfectly willing that the country should be plunged into the misery they describe if by reason thereof their political prospects will be improved and the cohorts of special privileges again returned to power.

It is freely conceded that panics are largely the result of conditions of the public mind. The strongest financial institution may be wrecked in a day by a distrustful condition brought about by the malevolence or thoughtlessness of a few who circulate rumors calculated to disturb. If disaster follows the passage of this bill, this now brood of "calamity howlers" can give themselves credit for having done their part to precipitate the same.

This is the established method used by all oppressors of the people in the history of the world. These prophecies of dire disaster were freely used in the last campaign. But for once they failed to deceive. The only hope now is to bring on these disasters by the various methods so well known, in order that these prophets of ill may point back to their preelection predictions and claim that they have been fulfilled.

FAIR TRIAL REQUIRED.

Every new law requires the requisite time for the proper working out of its provisions. Immediate beneficial results can not be expected in the very nature of things. Time is necessary for the readjustment of business conditions to any new state of affairs.

The people won a signal victory over special privilege last fall. The pending bill crystallizes that victory into law. The friends of special privilege, who oppose this law, regard the public as fickle and hope to discredit the law before it is given a fair trial and an opportunity to prove its real worth. If the public reverses its verdict before that fair trial is had, the hands on the dial of reform will be turned back. All that the people have gained will be lost and the next victory in their behalf will be more difficult to secure and will be very long delayed.

EFFECTS OF HIGH-TARIFF POLICY.

Under the operations of a high-protective schedule competition has been destroyed, individual opportunity lost, society stratified into classes, and financial power aggregated in a few hands. The prosperity we have apparently enjoyed has been a prosperity limited to the privileged few, but has not been generally diffused among the whole people.

Reports of strikes, lockouts, and labor troubles in the great industries of the land meet the eye on every page of the daily press. The terrible conditions in the sweatshops and tenement districts of our large cities alternate with stories of child labor and starvation wages paid employees in the mills, as the investigation of the strike in the woolen mills of Lawrence, Mass., so conclusively shows.

In a recent article published in the current number of the American Federationist the great labor leader, John Mitchell, says:

From public and private institutions of charity comes the ominous warning that the means at hand are insufficient to relieve the cry of distress; the bread line proclaims that something is radically wrong. Trades-unions have given out millions of dollars to buy bread for those of their number who can find no work to do. And all this time, during which able-bodied men, anxious and willing to work, are tramping the streets and highways in idleness, hundreds of thousands of immigrants are pouring in upon us.

I quote this statement to call attention to the fact that under a high-protective tariff such conditions exist. I quote it for another reason and that is to base a prophecy thereupon. Upon and for some time after the passage of this bill, these conditions, in a measure, are likely to continue to exist, for it will require time to remove them. But from the moment of the passage of this bill these very conditions, now existing under the present tariff law, will be charged by protection advocates as conditions arising as a result of the passage of the Underwood bill. Every strike, every labor trouble, every industrial depression that shall occur after this bill becomes a law, even though a direct result of the years of tariff legislation which have preceded them, will produce a new chorus of protection howls, with a view to prejudice and confound the people.

THE "CLEVELAND PANIC" FALSEHOOD.

Is this prophecy unwarranted and unsound? I appeal to history. I first assert that there has not been a protective-tariff speech made in this country since the year 1893 that has not been tuned upon what has been called the "Cleveland panic" of that year. I assert next that the so-called "Cleveland panic of 1893" was not a "Cleveland panic" at all, but was the Harrison high-protective tariff panic of 1891 and 1892, which was projected into the Cleveland administration, beginning in 1893.

Yet, despite this fact, the charges have been rung on this Cleveland panic falsehood for nearly 20 years. It has been thundered from the public rostrum, printed in the daily and weekly press, and promulgated in every section of the Nation. It has been echoed by political spellbinders, great and small, in every campaign, and there is not a hamlet in the width and breadth of the land where the street-corner protection advocate, driven to cover by his adversary in every argument presented, has not sneeringly rejoined that "you want to return to the Cleveland hard times of 1893."

Grover Cleveland was first inaugurated President in 1885, Benjamin Harrison was inaugurated President in 1889, and Grover Cleveland was inaugurated the second time in 1893. Benjamin Harrison's administration was thus sandwiched in between Cleveland's first and second terms.

It will be conceded that during Cleveland's first administration the country enjoyed prosperity to a noteworthy degree. Business conditions were good, trade was active, labor was employed, industrial troubles were substantially unknown, the public debt was reduced by nearly half a million, and when Cleveland retired, in 1889, there was turned over to Mr Harrison, his successor, a Treasury surplus aggregating three hundred millions This surplus furnished the political issue for the campaign of 1888, and on every stump the question of the day was, "What shall we do with the surplus now in the Treasury?" And this was the situation of things when Benjamin Harrison was inducted into office as Grover Cleveland's successor, in 1889.

EFFECT OF THE M'KINLEY LAW.

But, from the year 1889, when Mr. Harrison assumed the reins of power, business conditions took on a more somber hue. In 1890, during Harrison's second year, the McKinley tariff bill was passed, raising tariff rates all along the line. It was passed by a high-tariff Congress, signed by the President in due course of time, and enacted into a law.

On October 9, 1890, the McKinley tariff law went into effect. One month and two days after, the New York Clearing House Association voted its certificates to its allied banks, admitted to be in dire distress, and six days later the Boston Clearing House did the same. On the same day the banking house of Barker Bros., of Philadelphia, failed for five millions. Two days later there was a run on the Citizens' Saving Bank of the same city, and a receiver appointed for the North River Bank. Five days later, the Union Rolling Stock Co., of Chicago, assigned for seven millions. Six days later, Jamison & Co., of Philadelphia, failed for two millions; and on December 6, the Oliver Iron & Steel Mills, of Pittsburgh, closed down, throwing 2,000 workmen out of employment; and Myer & Co., of New Orleans, failed with liabilities of two millions. This was the record of the first year of the McKinley high-tariff law and the second year of Mr. Harrison's administration.

The year 1891 opened up with continuing business disasters. On January 3, the Scottsdale Rolling Mills and the Charlotte Furnace Co., of Philadelphia, went to the wall, throwing out 10,000 workmen. On January 18, the American National Bank, of Kansas City, shut its doors, with liabilities of nearly three millions. On May 8, the Spring Garden National Bank and the Pennsylvania Trust Co. closed their doors. Business failures, which had increased to 10,000 in 1890, the first year of the McKinley law, increased to over 12,000 in 1891, and in the fall of 1892, just before Cleveland was reelected for his second term, there occurred the bloody Homestead strike at Carnegie's Mills, which wrote the most awful chapter in our Nation's industrial history.

I pause here to advert that all this occurred under the operations of the high-tariff McKinley law and close upon the heels of its enactment, and I pause further to muse for a moment as to what a mighty volume of clamorous sound would arise from the cohorts of protection if the Underwood bill should face conditions at any time after its passage one-hundredth part as disastrous as those which faced the McKinley bill within 12 months after its enactment. It is safe to say that the sunset chorus of the wild jackasses on mid-Pacific isles would be like the murmur of gentle breezes in comparison to it.

In 1892, following the general run on the banks of the country, already described, gold began to disappear and go to Europe and the National Treasury was soon drained of its supply of gold. It was then charged and has never been successfully denied that this disappearance of gold was part and parcel of a general conspiracy, framed and carried into effect by sinister interests in the land, to force the hands of Congress to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law.

CLEVELAND'S SECOND TERM.

Such were the conditions existing when Cleveland became President a second time in 1893, and such were the conditions which really caused his election in 1892. When he retired from power in 1889 he left prosperity general and diffused; when he returned to power in 1893, after four years of Harrison's rule, he found distress and disaster. He left the times good and found them bad; he left business flourishing and found it prostrated; he left conditions satisfactory and found breaking banks, closed factories, labor out of employment, and gold disappearing as if under a magician's wand. He left a surplus of three hundred millions in the Treasury vaults, but returned to find that surplus dissipated and gone and a deficit of fifty millions, which had to be met and met without delay.

To replenish the Treasury and meet the deficit which had been willed to him by a high-tariff administration preceding, he was forced to issue bonds. And these bonds issued by him were printed on plates that had been manufactured and engraved by order of Harrison's Secretary of the Treasury before Harrison went out of office, to be used by the Harrison administration itself had it been returned to power.

And yet despite these facts, proven by reference to history, either known or accessible to all, this falsehood of a "Cleveland panic of 1893," hoary with age, is brought out in every campaign to mislead the unwary, frighten the ignorant, and perpetuate a system of high taxation which aggrandizes the very rich at the expense of the very poor.

WHY NOT BE FAIR?

Why not be fair? Has not the time for cheap demagoguery passed by? The less informed may be pardoned for their omissions to state the facts, for they but echo the utterances of those higher in the party's councils. But those higher up know that the so-called "Cleveland free-trade hard times" were not Cleveland times at all.

The "Cleveland panic of 1893" did not exist; it was the Harrison panic of 1892. It occurred under high-tariff rule, with a high-tariff President and Congress in full control in every branch of Government and with the McKinley high-tariff law upon the statute books of the Nation. The hard times of Cleveland's first year in 1893 was a legacy bequeathed to him by a high-tariff administration just relinquishing power. It was a cancer which former modes of living had produced upon the body politic of the Nation, and which required the surgeon's knife to bring about a cure. It was a foundling left upon the doorstep of the new administration, its natural parents having refused to father their own child.

Equally absurd is the claim that the Wilson tariff bill brought about these ills. The panic began in 1890 and 1891, reached its height in 1892 and 1893, and the Wilson tariff bill did not go into effect until the fall of 1894.

It is difficult to explain—

Said Senator Dolliver, Republican Senator from Iowa, in discussing the tariff in the Senate of the United States—how a panic which came in 1893 could have been caused by a tariff law which was not enacted until the latter part of 1894.

Neither can it be well said that the fear of lower tariff duties caused these hard times, for the panic was at its height before Mr. Cleveland was elected, and his election was due to the fact that times were so hard that the people desired and welcomed a change, and they voted the Democratic ticket to bring about the change of policies on the tariff question which Mr. Cleveland had advocated at all times.

SOME PANIC HISTORY.

Going one step further in this argument, the history of tariff legislation conclusively proves that the panics of the country have not occurred in low-tariff times but, on the contrary, every panic through which the country has passed occurred under high-tariff administrations and under the full operation of high-tariff laws.

The great panic of 1869, which gave "Black Friday" to our history, occurred under the administration of President Grant, both Houses Republican and the war-tariff taxes in operation to their full extent.

The panic of 1873, marked by the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., likewise occurred under the administration of President Grant, a Republican Congress, and high-tariff laws.

The panic of 1893 occurred with Benjamin Harrison as President, a Republican Congress, and the McKinley bill in full force and effect.

The money panic of 1907 occurred with Theodore Roosevelt in the saddle, a Republican Senate and House, and the Dingley bill doing business every day at the same old stand.

That a panic existed in 1907, I offer in evidence the declarations published in magazines and newspapers, at advertising rates, in the campaign just past, placarded throughout the Nation on billboards and walls in letters so broad and long that all could read, and which declarations were duly signed by the chairman and secretary of the national Republican committee in their official capacity. I note a few of these choice extracts:

Only four years ago (1907), just before President Taft was elected, there was panic and misery. Capital was tied up in safe-deposit boxes; mills and factories were closed, because manufacturers could not sell the goods they made; empty freight cars filled the railroad sidings; farms were mortgaged; labor was hungry and desperate.

And again:

When President Taft took over the Government the country was prostrate; industry was paralyzed; business was chaotic, uncertain, suspicious; millions were out of employment; investors, wherever possible, had withdrawn their capital; enterprise was dead. All this was the result of the panic of 1907. The rich man's panic, it was called, but do you remember any poor man who was not hurt?

Mr. Chairman, I have listened in this debate to the terrible prophecies of dire disaster that are to befall the Nation in the event the pending bill becomes a law. I desire to say in passing that if all these calamitous prophesies should come true the conditions would not be one-half as bad as those officially declared by the Republican national committee to have been in existence in 1907, when a Republican President was in the White House, a Republican Congress in the Capitol, and the Dingley high-tariff bill in full force and effect.

WHO WILL BRING ON THE PANIC?

I do not know, neither do you, what is in store for the American people in the years yet to come. Times may be good or bad, as the conditions may occur. But this I know and know full well, that if times be bad the new tariff law passed here will be charged with every ill that befalls the country, no matter what the cause of those ills may be.

But I undertake to say that no low-tariff law has ever yet brought industrial disaster. And if disaster comes, following the passage of this law, it will be the result not of the provisions in this bill contained, but the failure of crops, the disarrangement of the normal conditions in supply and demand by the thousand occurrences which may bring it about, or, what is more likely, the machinations of those who manipulate, juggle, and control the credit which is the lifeblood of the Nation.

The Pujo Money Trust investigation committee, in its report, describes a startling condition which exists in this Nation of ours. They tell us that two great banks in the metropolis of New York hold interlocking directorships in substantially all of the great financial, industrial, transportational, and commercial institutions of the land. They substantially tell us in that report that less than 100 men control the volume of production, the highways of trade, and the commercial and industrial life of the Nation. Such being the case, this less than a hundred men can precipitate a panic at any time, bringing disaster and devastation on ninety-five millions of people.

If disaster comes after the passage of this bill, who will bring it about? The farmer, the laborer, the business, or professional man will certainly not do it. If this less than a hundred men produce it, what will their object be? Will it not be to serve notice on the American people that the rule of special privilege must not be disturbed? Will it not be to serve notice that a disturbance of that rule is to invite this disaster? Will it not be a threat, a coercion, and an enslavement?

If that is the condition that confronts us as a people and we abjectly surrender to this intimidation, is not our boasted liberty really destroyed, and do not the people become slaves and chattels to a moneyed oligarchy, despotic and exacting?

THE WALKER TARIFF.

Standing boldly out in contradistinction to the array of panics which mark the Nation's history in high-tariff times is the prosperity which fell like a benediction on all during the low-tariff period following the enactment of the Walker law in 1846. Especially appropriate is this comparison now, for the reason that the Underwood bill in its general provisions and average rates is in a measure a reenactment of the Walker tariff law.

The average rates in the Walker law was about 24 per cent; the average rates in the pending bill are substantially the same. The Walker law was not framed with a view to protection, neither was the bill being considered now. The Walker law was a revenue act with protection incidental, and so is the Underwood law. The Walker law placed all schedules on a competitive basis, and the pending measure does the same.

What, then, was the effect on the country of the Walker tariff law, enacted in 1846 and, except for a further reduction in 1857, remaining on the statute books until 1860 substantially unchanged? As testimony I ask leave to cite the statements of James G. Blaine, an authority whom no Republican and no protectionist will likely question or dispute. In his Twenty Years in Congress, volume 1, page 196, he says:

The tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his administration—was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849. Large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for a time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased not only among the people, but among protective economists, and even among manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented presidential candidates.

On March 24, 1870, when a Member of the House, Senator Allison, Republican, of Iowa, said:

The tariff of 1846, although confessedly and professedly a tariff for revenue, was, so far as regards all the great interests of the country, as perfect as any we have ever had.

The pending measure nearer approximates the Walker tariff law of 1846 than any tariff act that has been framed since the Civil War. It was the Walker law which Senator Allison described as being "as perfect as any we have ever had." It was the Walker law which James G. Blaine said was so generally acquiesced in that 10 years after its passage no party even suggested a change. It was the Walker law which was in force from 1850 to 1860, which period, James A. Garfield said, was "one of peace and general prosperity." Give the Underwood bill a decade of fair trial, such as the Walker law received, and the principles governing the same will be so generally recognized as equitable, fair, and just that they will become established as permanent principles in revenue legislation for all time to come.

THE QUESTION OF RATES.

Mr. Chairman, I do not contend that the pending tariff bill is a perfect measure in every respect. No perfect tariff bill has ever yet been framed by man and, in the very nature of things, perfection in tariff legislation can never be attained.

I am free to confess that were the proposition left solely to me I would change the tariff rates in many of the schedules in this bill. I would lower some and increase others. I would put upon the free list many articles on which a duty has here been placed and I would place on the dutiable list many articles that are here free.

But I would be signally fortunate indeed if, at the end of my labors, my efforts would not reflect very greatly the personal interest which I have in the industries of my own State, and, more fortunate still, if my completed bill, viewed from the standpoint of the Nation as a whole, was not a network of inequalities.

With more than 4,000 articles in the various schedules in this bill no two citizens, however well informed, could agree upon the same rates in any given schedule. And no living being exists to-day whose information is so extensive and great that he absolutely understands the trade conditions in all of the 4,000 articles in the schedules contained.

If every Member of this House had prepared and offered his own tariff measure and had sought its crystallization into law, what a medley of divergent ideas would we have viewed? There would never have been an end to the debate and the discussions would have been interminable. The business interests of the country would have been thrown into ferment, industrial depression would have ensued, not as a result of what was being done with the tariff, but from the terrible uncertainty arising from the fact that nothing was being done at all. The next election would have found us still wrangling over the rates of the schedules.

If by chance, from all this chaos and confusion, a bill had finally been evolved, how would such an evolution have been brought about? It is evident that the result would have been a compromise measure pure and simple. It would have been the product of trades between representatives of sections and varied interests. It would not have been framed for the benefit of the whole people, and its inconsistencies would have been so glaring and monstrous that it would have been doomed to failure from its very birth.

THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE.

This has all been obviated by the tireless efforts of the present Ways and Means Committee of this House, who have sounded the depths and breadths of every proposition involved in the multifarious schedules. For more than two years, night and day, they worked incessantly and arduously upon the provisions of this bill. They employed experts, who have been gathering evidence and compiling statistics during this entire period of two years. For an entire month the committee listened to the representations of manufacturers and those interested, and gave all ample opportunity to be heard. They granted informal hearings to hundreds of others in various branches of industry. After having gathered information from all available sources they occupied nearly three months in drafting the bill. When it was drafted they published it to the world in ample time for investigation before the special session was called. It was presented to the Democratic caucus, where every paragraph was read and considered, the freest opportunity was given to criticize or amend, and a divisional vote taken whenever demanded. And the pending bill is the result of that painstaking care and consideration.

BETTER THAN A TARIFF COMMISSION.

No tariff commission, by whomsoever appointed, could have done more. What better tariff commission could any reasonable individual desire? If President Taft two years ago had appointed a commission to revise the tariff, he could not have found in the length and breadth of this land men better equipped or better informed upon all the details of the question at hand than the men who comprised this Committee on Ways and Means.

They are, in the main, men who have made tariff duties a study for the last 10 or 20 years. They have helped frame former bills and know the effect of the same on the country at large. They are better experts than those usually so known, for their opinions and deductions are the result of study and observation along lines of practical effect rather than those of academic theory. What does any expert know which they could not find out, for they had the authority and they called in experts in every line? Listening to these experts, they applied to their deductions the rule of fair dealing between man and man and framed a bill not for special privilege but in the interests of the great consuming masses of the Nation.

PRINCIPLES, NOT PERCENTAGES.

After all has been said, the dutiable rate fixed on this article or that is not the real question that is involved in this legislation. It is not in the rates or percentages or ad valorems that the people are so much concerned, but they are concerned as to the great underlying principle which governs and controls the proposed legislation, and insist on their demands, registered at the polls, that import duties, excessively high, should be downwardly revised.

Both the Baltimore and Chicago progressive platforms declared for immediate revision downward. Both platforms denounced the Payne-Aldrich law as unjust. Both platforms declared for an income tax. Out of the 15,000,000 votes cast at the election the presidential candidate on the former platform polled over 6,000,000 votes, the candidate on the latter platform over 4,000,000 votes, an aggregate of over 10,000,000, and a majority of 5,000,000 and more over all other votes cast.

In supporting this bill I am supporting the underlying principles which it contains. It is a tariff revision "unhesitatingly downward." It is a revision with an eye to public needs, regardless of private benefits and schemes. It regards the interests of the many rather than the few, and considers the consumer as well as the producer. It introduces in every line of industry a competitive tariff basis fair to one and fair to all. It eliminates the bonus where no equivalent is rendered in return. It provides for honest competition and encourages the development of industries along the best and most economical lines. It destroys monopoly and places industry on so firm a basis that in controlling its own home markets it is practically developing itself so it can control the markets of the world.

NOT FREE TRADE.

In the matter of the levying of customs duties I am not nor never was a subscriber to the doctrine of free trade. I believe, with Thomas Jefferson, that in certain exigencies tariff duties may be properly laid. I believe, with Jefferson, that it may be well to foster industries in their genesis where necessary to impart to them temporary strength to withstand rivals in a foreign land.

But I also believe, with Jefferson, that when those industries have attained their growth, when they are able, as substantially all of our great industries are to-day, to compete with foreign rivals and undersell them at their own factory doors, that such industries should no longer be allowed to burden the people with taxation to make more profitable a trade which is able to stand alone.

I believe it is fundamentally wrong to compel the American consumer to pay higher prices for American-made goods in order that the American manufacturer of these goods may sell his products to the consumer in foreign lands cheaper than he sells the same products to the consumer at home.

I believe further, with Jefferson, that where it is evident that certain industries, by reason of natural or climatic limitations, can never reach a point where they can thrive and flourish without protective aid—in other words, where it is evident that such industries will require protection, persistent and perpetual, in order that they may exist—I believe, to use Jefferson's own words, quoted above, that "it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them."

I would willingly support a tariff which is honestly laid for the purpose of maintaining a high standard in American wage, but I want to be convinced that the profits created by that tariff actually finds its way into the pockets of the laborer and is not used to increase dividends upon watered stock. Coupled with such a tariff I would require a law which would compel industries thus protected to give to the men employed their just modicum of the profits thus obtained.

But when I see industries wax lusty and strong under the workings of a tariff system whose burdens are borne by all; when I see their promoters grow powerful and rich beyond the dreams of avarice; when I find them forming gigantic combinations of greed which destroy competition, blast opportunity, and interlock the commercial and industrial diversities of the Nation; when I see, on the other hand, these same industries pay to labor only what they are compelled to give, I have reached the conclusion that either they must divide with labor that which they have secured under the pretense that it is obtained for that purpose alone, or else that this sort of so-called protection shall cease and the people be relieved of burdens which they unrighteously bear. Being convinced that the former is not likely soon to come to pass, I am ready to act upon the latter alternative.

The cry of free trade has always been raised to prevent reductions in tariff taxation. It has been the slogan of protective privilege in every campaign. It is used to cast opprobrium on worthy measures offered in the people's behalf. It is intended to befog and deceive.

A measure such as this, which levies average duties of 24 per cent, is a long way from free trade. It places articles on the free list, as has every other tariff bill, high or low, that has been offered or enacted in the Nation's history. The McKinley bill had its free list and practically provided for sugar free, but no one would have the hardihood to claim that the McKinley bill, by reason thereof, provided for free trade.

The issue raised by this bill is not one of protection and free trade. The real issue is between the Payne law and the Underwood measure, between excessive protection and competitive rates, between the perpetuation of the present competition-destroying policy of exaggerated duties on the one hand, and on the other a fair and just revision of the tariff schedules in the interest of the consumer and public at large. The real issue is, Shall the people or the special interests prevail?

THE FARMER AND THE TARIFF.

But they tell us that their system of protection has protected and prospered the farmer and showered him with the blessings he now enjoys. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who hails from the environs of classic Boston, where the truck raiser on a little patch of impoverished soil is the only farmer they know, has said, "The countryman is said to have accepted many a gold brick in his time." If that be so, the greatest gold brick they ever accepted and received is the gold-brick proposition that they have been protected in the operation of tariff laws.

Listening to the remarks of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, one would be led to believe that the protective tariff had fructified the soil, showered the rain, let down the sunshine, and produced the bounteous crops that grow upon America's 6,000,000 farms.

For one I do not believe that the protective tariff is responsible for the bounteous crops or the market price of the same. I was taught from infancy to believe that a benign Providence sent the sunshine and the rain, created and fertilized the soil, and covered the fields with harvests of golden grain. And I am not yet ready to admit that the Lord has turned over this job to the protective-tariff smiths of the land.

I am mighty glad such a transfer has not been made, for if it had they in turn would have turned it over to the syndicates and trusts for their control, who would have long since run a corner on nature's beneficent gifts and made the farmers pay for every ray of the golden sunshine they receive and for every drop of the precious rain.

PROTECTION TO THE FARMER A SHAM.

The farmers of the United States sell abroad and feed the world. Their exports girdle the globe. They market their crops in the free-trade markets abroad and purchase all they buy in protected markets at home. Their surplus grain goes to Liverpool and is placed in bins to compete, side by side, with the grain raised by Russian serfs, Indian fellahs, and the cheapest farm labor of the world. There the price of their commodity is fixed by the world-wide free-trade law of supply and demand. The ticker at Liverpool records the price they are to receive, the tickers at New York, Chicago, and St. Louis record the same, with added cost of transportation, and the price he receives for his surplus abroad fixes the price of his commodity at home.

Every pretense of protection to him by tariff duties laid is a delusion and a sham. It is the building of a dam to keep the water from running uphill. It is a pretended favor given to lull the farmer to sleep, in order that in his dreams he may be deceived into a belief that some benefit of protection is coming his way, and thus render him unmindful of the fact that he is fleeced on everything which he has to buy. It is an effort to captivate him by the cry of a home market, as if protected monopolists eat more than other men.

In return for a protection that does not protect the farmer has been paying tariff-enhanced prices for all that he needs. On all his medicines, paints and oils, and the entire chemical schedule; on all the dishes, glassware, earthenware, ironware, furniture, and kitchen utensils in his home; on all his tools, agricultural implements, and hardware on his farm; on the lumber, stone, plaster, brick, and nails that go into his house and barns; on the barbed wire in his fences; on all the hats, clothes, shoes, and gloves he and his family wear; on the casks, barrels, boxes, and cabinets on the place; on the sugar and molasses he consumes; on the binder twine that binds his grain; on the books he reads; on the harness on his horses and the carts and wagons the horses draw; on the bed in which he sleeps; on the coffin that enshrouds his remains at the final call and the tombstone which marks his last resting place—on all these and thousands of articles more the farmer pays the tariff toll and receives naught but empty deception in return.

Neither does the cry of Canadian wheat furnish a justification for this deception. Canadian wheat, like our own, must find its markets abroad, and its price is likewise governed in foreign ports by the same world-wide law of supply and demand. If local prices at certain Canadian points be at times lower than our own, the variance is but sporadic and for a time, and is caused by greater transportation rates, which are deducted from the world price in the end.

Likewise the farmer receives no benefit from a tariff on meats, for the packer absorbs it all. Meats are controlled by a trust, which regulates its price day by day and the farmer is helpless in its hands. It arbitrarily fixes this price at its own sweet will, and sells its beef cheaper in Europe than it does at home. It is reaching out to control the meat industry of the world, and tariffs on meats are ineffective to regulate or control.

A greater fallacy was never framed than the claim that the present high prices of the products of the farm are due to the tariff. A greater untruth was never circulated than the one that the low prices of farm products in Cleveland's second administration was a result of the tariff bill in operation at that time. The prices of agricultural products and the rates of tariff duties on the same are no more related than are the peaks of the Rocky Mountains to the ebb and flow of the ocean tide.

High agricultural prices exist to-day, not by reason of the protective tariff levied on the same at our ports of entry, but they exist in spite of and in the very teeth of this alleged protection. Present high agricultural prices exist by reason of decreased production and increased population—decrease in the supply and increase in the demand. Statistics show that in the last 10 years corn has decreased in production over 20 per cent, wheat 15 per cent, and the production of other cereals, as well as cattle and hogs, have suffered a corresponding reduction. The law of supply and demand is king in the realm of agriculture, and all other aspirants to the throne are pretenders and charlatans.

RELIEF TO THE FARMERS.

The pending measure is the first tariff bill to give substantial relief to the farmer since the days of the Civil War. He is accorded special relief in the provisions of this bill. He gets the benefit of a radical reduction in every schedule in the law. He is given a reduction of the tariff rates on everything he has to buy. Among hundreds of other articles he gets the benefit of the placing absolutely on the free list of the following commodities, which he uses every day: Lumber, plows, harrows, harvesters, reapers, mowers, cultivators, thrashing machines, agricultural implements, harness, saddles, trace chains, binding twine, nails, barbed wire, needles, fertilizers, sewing machines, salt, boots and shoes, coffee, coal, and sugar after three years.

He gets freer drugs and chemicals, paints, cutlery, tinware, dishes, furniture, hats, clothes, shirts, collars, hose, underwear, gloves, bedspreads, blankets, cotton and woolen goods of every kind, glass and glassware, hardware, books and stationery, and so on through the various schedules. This is a protection that protects, for it relieves him of tariff taxes that he has been paying for many years.

THE LABORER AND THE TARIFF.

Unfounded as is the claim that the tariff has been protecting the farmer, equally erroneous is the claim that the laborer is the chief beneficiary of the present tariff laws. This fallacy is based upon the theory that the protective tariff enables the employer to make larger profits and in turn enables him to pay higher wages to the laborers in his employ.

In theory this might seem plausible, but in practice it fails to work out. In practice the employer takes full advantage of the tariff, makes all the profits possible, and then goes out into the labor markets of the world and secures his labor as cheaply as he can. There is no protective tariff on labor, for it comes into our ports of entry absolutely free.

Adam Smith long ago laid down the rule that where there were two laborers to draw from and only one job labor would be cheap, but where there were two jobs and only a single laborer labor would be dear. The tariff has no more to do with labor than it has with the phases of the moon. It is governed absolutely by the law of supply and demand.

The very class of people who show such anxiety to protect American labor by keeping down competition in the articles they manufacture and sell are often the ones who not only buy labor as cheaply as they can but fiercely oppose any combination of workmen to keep up a standard wage.

If the American wage is now at a standard above that of employees across the sea, it is not due to a protective tariff, which assists the employer in the profits he makes in the industry he controls, but it is due to the fact that labor has organized itself into unions of strength and power and by the force of their combined might has compelled the employer to pay a living wage.

The protective tariff has not upheld the standard of wage. The labor union has upheld it, and the tariff has taken from the laborer a large portion of what he receives in wage by compelling him to pay enhanced prices for everything he has to buy.

If an effort had been made 16 years ago to reduce the wages of every laboring man 50 per cent, it would have worked nothing short of a revolution. But admitting that the standard of wage was not so reduced, still the fact remains that, by the increase of prices of the articles that the laborer has to buy by at least twofold in the last 16 years, his wages in effect have been cut in two.

It is a notorious fact that wages in protected industries are generally lower than in those unprotected and that while the unprotected laborer outnumbers the protected by a ratio of 4 to 1, there has occurred in those protected industries more strikes, more lockouts, and more labor troubles than in all the other industries of the land.

The pending tariff bill protects the laborer in every industry of whatever kind, because it protects the wage which he receives by preventing tariff-enhanced prices on what he has to buy. It gives him relief from the high cost of the necessaries of life and protects him in the possession of all that he has rightfully earned.

THE INCOME TAX.

But perhaps the most satisfactory provision of this entire bill is the levying of a direct tax, to support the Government, upon the incomes of those who receive the greater protection of its laws by reason of their greater possessions.

The revenue received from our tariffs is a revenue derived from consumption. It is ofttimes really a tax upon poverty and privation. It is the heaviest on those whose consumption is the largest in proportion to their means. It passes over property, over accumulated wealth, over what a man has gathered and put behind him, but throws its greatest burdens upon those who are battling against hunger, cold, and disease for the necessities and decencies of life. The tax upon incomes is levied according to ability to pay and upon a man's wealth and his accumulations.

The tax is now in force and effect in 52 foreign nations and States, and has never yet been repealed when given a fair trial. It is the outgrowth of centuries of experiments in taxation throughout the world, and has been proven to be most equitable, the most elastic, and the most satisfactory.

It has been demanded by the people, its enactment was declared for in the platforms of two great political parties of the Nation, and the sentiment for it was so strong that the people overturned a decision of the Supreme Court by writing into the Constitution a provision making it possible—the first constitutional amendment the country had adopted in a period of 40 years.

CONCLUSION.

In pressing the passage of this bill the Democratic Party is again carrying out its pledges to the people. No member of this House who stood upon the Democratic platform last fall can fail to support it without being recreant to his trust and false to the obligations which his nomination and election devolved upon him.

Gentlemen on the other side tell us that in supporting this measure we are digging our own political graves. I do not know what others may think about it, but as for me, I propose to stand by the pledges I made to the people and I propose to obey their instructions as registered at the polls.

If the people are as fickle as gentlemen on the other side seem to believe them to be, if they will refuse vindication of those who have faithfully fulfilled their stewardship, then well and good. But I would rather a thousand times face defeat at the polls, conscious that I have kept faith with the people and performed my duty, than be returned to this Congress a score of times knowing that such return was the price of betrayal.

The Democratic Party has already achieved many and mighty reforms for the people. It has given them the right to vote direct for those who represent their States in the United States Senate. It has changed the Constitution of the land so that it is now possible to compel wealth to bear its proportion of national expense by the levying of a tax on incomes. It has given the old soldier, who fought for the flag, the most liberal pension law in our history. It has enacted a score or more of laws in the interests of labor. Now it proposes to free the people from the burdens of an iniquitous system of war taxation and to unloose the bonds which have fettered competition and give the individual an opportunity in the great commercial and industrial contests of the Nation.

The Democratic Party stands in this fight where it has always stood, championing the rights of the people. It stands for duty as against the dollar, for manhood as against money, for human liberty as against inhuman greed, for that individual opportunity which has built up our institutions, dignified them with achievements, ennobled them with triumphs, and consecrated them in the fires of heroic devotion.

It stands for a prosperity that will come to the many and not the few—a prosperity that will come to the laborer, the artisan, and the wage earner—a prosperity that will come to those dust-covered thousands whose sun-browned hands have never touched a polluted dollar and who labor in the field from early at morn to late at eve—a prosperity that will cause the proudest boast of American citizenship to come not from the pampered sons of wealth but from those hardy freeman who, returning with the evening sun from places of honored toil, find in the climbing vine and blossoming rose the fragrance of happy homes.

It stands where Jefferson stood at the day dawn of the Nation, where Jackson stood in his fight against corporate might, where the good and true have ever stood in every crisis of our Nation's history, and there by the grace of God it will ever stand until the foes of liberty have been everlastingly driven from the field, the grasp of greed has been removed from the flag, and the principles which it has taught for over a hundred years shall become the principles which shall guide and govern the Nation as long as it shall endure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to present for printing in the RECORD a memorial address delivered by the owner of Monticello, the Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY, of New York, on the 13th day of the present month, in memory of Thomas Jefferson, that being the one hundred and seventy-first anniversary of his birth.

Following are the remarks of Mr. LEVY referred to:

"To my friends, ladies and gentlemen: The inspiration of this day is patriotism. It is not to mourn dead clay, but to crown the enduring memory and the advent of a mighty man that the people of a grateful country pause and in person and in spirit present their floral tributes to this historic spot on "mountain top between the forest trees," the home in life, the resting place in death, of the beloved nation builder, Thomas Jefferson.

"To you, my friends and fellow citizens, I express upon this occasion the cordial welcome which at all times has been extended to the American people desirous of visiting the home of the author of the Declaration of Independence, and I assure you of my appreciation of this privilege which you have accorded me to unite with you in these ceremonial observances of this natal day.

"It is in keeping with the scope of his private and public life that there should be entwined the offerings of the great and small. Here side by side now rest the votive garlands from the Chief Executive and from the humble citizens. Now partisanship plays no halting part, but all unite with common mind to pay their tribute to the memory of this great American.

"That your pilgrimage and your purpose bring you to the open door of Monticello is most fitting. In other places Jefferson was the statesman and the diplomat, in other walks he was the President, the ambassador, and preserver of the Nation, but here on this spot which he loved so well and whose very name rang rhythm to his ear he was also the plain American citizen.

"The atmosphere which here surrounded him was that of home; such were its pleasures, such its relaxation when he sought relief from the exactions of his public life. Here he dispensed his generous hospitality. The maintenance of that same atmosphere of home has been, in a sense, the life work for four score years of the succeeding generations of my family, so that now, interwoven with my interest in Monticello, are the events of these weighted years during which we have with zealous care united again these acres and gathered from two continents the scattered and priceless relics of his bygone days and preserved them for your devotion as you see them to-day.

"It is not the mere possession which gives pleasure, but a possession mingled with long personal association from which flows the opportunity for expression of a deep and abiding reverence for the life work of Thomas Jefferson which makes my stewardship of this property so dear to me and which has caused me and mine to lavish means and time upon his home. Our eyes did not droop in sleepy forgetfulness nor our steps grow laggard on the way during all these years when those who have now exhibited their newly awakened interest in Monticello long slumbered in indifference or inattention.

"Generations of my family have consecrated time and money to its restoration and preservation. Will not now the great American people see and understand that this stewardship has become a part of the heart and life of the present owner?

"Will a man fix a price upon wife or child? To repeat my utterance of a former day, "I can not commercialize the sentiment of years by putting a price upon this noble property."

"My friends and fellow citizens, I appeal to you, has there been recreancy to the trust which this ownership imposes? Is there an untrimmed blade of grass or straying briar which has escaped the eye and which your scrutiny suggests should lead to greater vigilance?

"It speaks to-day of home and hospitality. Would not Jefferson himself have had it so? In every nook and cranny, in every leaf and flower, in spring and running brook it tells of Thomas Jefferson the living.

"Here has been maintained the open door; here have come in recent years Cleveland, Blaine, Reed, Hoar, Bryan, and Hill, with uncounted others, and caught the spirit. It has been preserved not as the house, the farm, but as the home of Thomas Jefferson.

"What man listening to the echo of his own footsteps, as he tramps upon the bared floor of Mount Vernon or Arlington, is not conscious of the lack? It is with some hesitancy that even upon this occasion I intrude upon the great-hearted but busy American people an admission of the pain which I have been caused by much misinformation, covertly framed innuendoes and untrue statements, which by letter from the platform and in the public print have been circulated concerning my ownership and care of Monticello.

"I can not enter the arena of public disputation nor involve myself in a ceaseless controversy by even justifiable denials, for these statements made against me are as unsubstantial as the mist, as variable as the flight of butterflies, as changeable as the shadows, and as recurrent and persistent as the tides.

"Lest there be a misunderstanding, however, let me in general terms express myself. During my ownership of nearly 30 years Monticello has never been and is not now for sale. I have never directly or indirectly placed a value or fixed a price upon it nor entered into negotiations of any kind looking to that end. Until the time shall come when men will no longer follow in the footsteps of Thomas Jefferson, when the right of men to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness shall be ruthlessly swept away, when women and children shall be torn apart and man despoiled of his most cherished possession, I shall continue my stewardship of Monticello, preserving it with all the care and lavishment of former years, appealing to the people of the United States to weigh my ownership and stewardship and compare Monticello of to-day with Mount Vernon, the home of Washington.

"It has been intimated that I have connived at offers made to purchase or acquire this property; that even a telegram sent me by the great governor of this State was with my prior knowledge, if not of my procurement. To this and all similar statements I enter an unqualified denial, and assure you that my unbending purpose is to give during the remainder of my life, with utmost faithfulness, my best endeavors to the care of Monticello.

"View these broad fields, the house upon the mountain top filled with the treasures connected with his name; behold the shrine itself, the grave of Jefferson, and tell the American people that these have been preserved and kept not for selfish or sordid purposes but by an unceasing flow of the fountain a heart filled with love for Thomas Jefferson."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS AND THE TARIFF.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, it might seem presumptuous for a Member at the beginning of his term of service to enter into a discussion of the general principles of a question which has been the study of the best minds of men in and out of Congress since the beginning of our Nation and on which the political economy of our country has from the earliest days been based. I therefore will not occupy the time which has been accorded me to consider the bill in its broad features, either upon the underlying principles separating protection, revenue only, or free trade, or the merits or demerits of the bill now before us, known as the Underwood bill, or what will, perhaps, be better known in the future as the bill proposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD against some of his own best beliefs under the dictation of President Wilson.

I feel, however, sufficiently conversant with the varied industries of the section of Massachusetts I have the honor to represent to call to the attention of this House certain salient facts regarding the effect the adoption of the so-called Underwood bill will, in my opinion, have upon western Massachusetts. It is not for me to single out in a selfish manner the welfare of that section as against the country as a whole, but I do maintain that, as typical of conditions there, results will come alike to us and to other sections.

TARIFF BELIEFS AND PROGRESSIVE COMPARISONS.

During the campaign of last year I made every effort to acquaint the people of my district with my views on the subject of the tariff, and am prepared to repeat in brief what I then said: First, I believe in a nonpartisan tariff board or commission, authorized to scientifically study the great problem of tariff making, and, under the authority of Congress, to advise and assist this body in the perfection of rates fair alike to producer and consumer. If no other reason were to be given against the Underwood bill, I should be recorded in opposition to the measure from the fact that this bill absolutely ignores that just principle and method of tariff making. It was with pleasure that on Thursday I listened to the able address of one of our former political colleagues, the Progressive Member from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], wherein he voiced this same view, and I would say now that unless he intended to confer upon the tariff commission the power of making rates without congressional enactment I could qualify as a Progressive under his tariff definition; or, better, I should hope that he and his colleagues might soon be willing to again qualify under our title of Republican. The two minorities to which he referred are practically in accord on the most vital question before our people, namely, the tariff.

May I be allowed to add that various other great problems, which he probably had in mind when he referred to "social and industrial questions affecting the vital interests of the people," and which I should define as healthful conditions for working men and women—factory inspection, child labor, and other matters of public welfare which our Progressive friends are assuming to be their own cause—are to-day under suitable laws in the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, absolutely through the wise judgment of Republican legislators? An analysis of the Progressive Party platform adopted at Chicago shows 56 propositions, of which 19 are purely State questions, 19 purely national questions, and 18 questions susceptible of either State or National legislation, or both. Of the 37 within the scope of State legislative activity, 21 have already been satisfactorily enacted in Massachusetts. Eleven of the remaining 16 are already in process of accomplishment there or likely to be accomplished speedily. [Applause.]

A second statement which I freely made in the first congressional district of Massachusetts was a belief in reductions in certain schedules of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Both of these beliefs have been corroborated by my Republican colleagues in unanimous agreement to offer an amendment to the pending bill calling for a tariff commission and a further vote by a very large majority favorable to the submission of an amendment, based on the findings of the Tariff Board, which would reduce many items in Schedule K.

A DISTRICT OF DIVERSIFIED INTERESTS.

Possibly no Member of this body represents a district more diversified in its interests than the first district of Massachusetts. Blessed by nature with beautiful hills, adorned by wooded slopes, a fertile soil capable of a high degree of cultivation, mountain streams delighting the hearts of the followers of Walton, flowing rivers ready to be harnessed for man's use, there has grown up within its limits a community alike dependent upon the cultivation of the soil and upon employment in the great textile and other manufacturing establishments. There is an almost even division between the simple hamlets of the country and the population of busy, bustling cities. The district is therefore interested in schedules affecting the producer or farmer, the manufacturer, and the laborer. We have broad acres in farms; we have great mills manufacturing the highest grades of paper, cotton mills, woolen mills, silk mills, shoe factories, foundries, and machine shops—and it is to these lines in particular I wish to call the attention of the committee.

Let me further say that these varied industries are in no way described by the brilliant leader of the majority when in his opening speech he refers to some industries as being maintained with "worn-out, ineffective, and decadent machinery." The industries of Massachusetts are, to use an expression of the day, "up to the minute," and we ask no sympathy or assistance for their support, in that they are in any way behind the times in equipment or decadent in machinery.

THE COTTON INDUSTRY OF WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS.

The cotton industry of western Massachusetts embraces up to this time the highest products of that art, being favored by climate, pure water from the mountain streams, nearness to markets, and the skill of the pioneer manufacturers and their successors of the present day. It includes not only the making and weaving of the finer grades of cotton cloth for wearing apparel, but a great number of processes of printing and dyeing and other forms of finishing to give distinctive character to the fabrics after they have left the looms. In addition, there have grown up certain specialized lines of manufacture, such as quilts and spreads of fancy figured patterns.

To maintain the higher standard of American living, the cotton industry has had to pay a considerably increased wage over wages in the countries which would naturally be its competitors abroad. I am reliably informed that the English rate of wages is practically 60 per cent of those in Massachusetts; France and Germany, 50 per cent; and Italy, 33 per cent of our State. When we come to the skilled trades in the print works the disproportion is even greater and immensely to the advantage of the men in those trades on this side of the water.

The opinion of observers, whose views are not colored by political bias or anything but understanding and experience of the facts, is to the effect that the rates reported in this bill are not protective of the lower grades of cotton goods. As far as they apply to the finer lines of cotton goods the proposed rates are even less so. In the coarse grades the labor cost, compared to the total value of the finished product, is a small part, perhaps 10 per cent of the whole, the value of the cotton being greater, but in the fine goods the part represented by labor is 50 per cent and more, even to 70 per cent of the manufactured product. With insufficient duties our markets will certainly be flooded with goods of higher grade. In that event our manufacturers, if they are to keep their mills running, will be compelled to resort to the coarser fabrics, where they can compete and on which the prices paid labor are naturally less than on those fine weaves in which greater skill is required of the operatives. The Underwood bill, instead of promoting the development of the finer arts in this country, thrusts our industries back to a lower level, and will cause our mills to turn from the higher to the lower grades of manufacture, in which the rates of wages are less and with a resulting loss alike to the owner, the operative, and the community.

The people engaged in the cotton business in western Massachusetts are in no sense any part of trusts, combinations, or political organizations. They are interested in the continuance of their business for their own sake, for a proper return on the money invested, and for the sake of the thousands of employees and their families dependent on them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am informed, and I think correctly, that in no line of business is the element of efficiency so largely developed as in the cotton-manufacturing industry, for the reason that the business is highly competitive; for instance, the largest combination in cotton manufacturing is said to cover not more than 1⅓ per cent of the total value invested in the industry.

AN INJUSTICE TO HOME PRODUCTION.

The Democratic leader said in his opening address that the Underwood bill is for revenue only, with emphasis on "only." He also said that the committee had played no favorites. I wish to call attention to one item wherein both of these statements are refuted at one time. In the Panama Canal act of last year a clause was inserted whereby free entry is provided for shipbuilding material and equipment. On page 207, paragraph J, subsection 5, of House bill 3321, we find affirmation of this same clause in the words:

That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction of vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership, or for the purpose of being employed in the foreign or domestic trade, and all such materials necessary for the building of their machinery, and all articles necessary for their outfits and equipment may be imported in bond * * * and no duties shall be paid thereon.

I therefore affirm that this bill does play as favorites the foreign manufacturer desiring to equip any vessel in the United States, whether for foreign or domestic purposes, and that there is absolutely no revenue derived therefrom. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I know of a specific illustration of the working out of this principle in the case of some constituents of mine with reference to a contract which they attempted to secure for the equipment of the Hudson River steamers with quilts of their manufacture. They were advised that their bid was low and it seemed that they would secure the contract for this large order of quilts, when their agents were notified that the contract would be placed for foreign-made quilts, as it was found that such quilts would be admitted to the country free of duty under the Panama Canal act. While this injustice to our manufacturers first appeared under the Panama act, the framers of this tariff bill seem to have especially delighted in inserting the clause, using the word "domestic," so that any boat, wherever it is to be used, whether on lake or inland rivers, physically unable to reach salt water, can be equipped throughout with foreign-made goods, paying no revenue to our Treasury or protection to our industries. I submit for one that if I was boasting about not playing favorites, I would at least deal justly with home productions.

THE WOOLEN INDUSTRY IN WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS.

In the other branches of textiles, woolen, and silk, also largely represented in the industrial life of western Massachusetts, the bill is equally severe on the home product. The woolen industry is on a competitive basis, there being in our part of the country a series of individual mills under independent ownership. Here again the American workingman has the advantage of his brother abroad in the matter of wages, the excess of earnings in the United States over Great Britain ranging, according to the reports of the Tariff Board, from 70 to 180 per cent more in the various operations of the mill. The other costs in this country are proportionally greater, so that the total cost of conversion from yarn to the finished cloth in nearly every instance investigated by the Tariff Board (p. 691, Tariff Board's report on Schedule K) is at least twice as great as in England, our chief foreign competitor. The 35 per cent rate on the finished woolen and worsted cloths proposed by the Underwood bill is accordingly far from putting our manufacturers on a basis of equality with their competitors, which we have been given to understand was the intent of the framers of this bill. It puts them in fact at a tremendous disadvantage.

One of the letters I have received on this subject says:

The President, whose education has been along theoretical lines and who has probably never earned a dollar in his life through competitive methods, says the bill will sharpen the wits of American manufacturers so that they may compete with the foreigners. Let me say in reply to this that, given the same labor costs, we ask no favors of any country on earth; but with our high plane of wages in this country it becomes needful for us to do one of three things in order to compete with foreigners who pay less. We must either raise the wages of the operatives in foreign mills, which I think will be conceded an impossibility, or we must reduce the wages of our own labor by one-half, equally impossible if we wish to see them maintain the American standard of living, or we must place an artificial governmental barrier to protect the wages of our working people. I should be glad if the President would suggest which of these methods he would recommend in order to place ourselves upon a competitive basis.

THE SILK INDUSTRY IN WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS.

In the silk industry our supremacy has been due so far, I understand, to the superior style and attractiveness of the silk goods which we make in this country; but we must realize that with the awakening in the Far East we will be approaching a condition shortly of strenuous competition with the intelligence of the Chinese and Japanese. All the raw silk comes from those countries, and with their raw material at hand the process of converting it into the finished product for the rest of the civilized world is taking on surprising life and vigor. They are using power looms and machinery equal to our own, although their highest average wages are 15 cents a day to a worker and the Massachusetts average is more than ten times that. They may not be as effective now as the silk-mill operatives in this country, but it appears to be only a question of time when they will equal us. The 50 per cent rate is conceded to be a fair rate to American manufacturers against competition with the European centers of silk production, but their greatest future competition, especially with the removal of specific duties and the retaining only of an uncertain ad valorem with the liability of undervaluations, will come from Japan.

PAPER MANUFACTURING.

The rates in the bill for fine writing papers are not protective, as the wages in this country are more than twice those which prevail abroad. There is also the objectionable feature of ad valorem duties being substituted for the former specific duties, which are open to the defect of admitting foreign papers by clever and unscrupulous undervaluations, there being no practicable way to standardize paper. Men of judgment in the business state that it is impossible for any man, however expert, to tell from examination of a piece of paper the value of the paper without knowing what peculiar processes it has had to go through, and that if the same sample were to be submitted to three different paper manufacturers they would probably estimate the value from 10 to 50 per cent apart. The one good point which the committee retained from the previous law was the classification of the different kinds of paper, which has some tendency, I understand, to conserve the interests of the industry.

THE SHOE INDUSTRY.

Although of less extent than in other parts of New England, the shoe-manufacturing industry in western Massachusetts has similar interests to the industry in other shoe-manufacturing centers, and this bill by removing all protection from shoes strikes a direct blow. I am glad that my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], for whose opinion I have such a high regard, considers that this tariff bill will be beneficial to the shoe industry, but I noticed that he was very particular not to make direct answer to the question whether he considered the removal of the duty on shoes would benefit the industry in Massachusetts.

MISCELLANEOUS INDUSTRIES.

Some of the other leading lines of production which might be mentioned in western Massachusetts are those of machine tools, in which it gives me pleasure to say we appear to have the lead at present on the rest of the world, as there is some export trade in them on account of their being so much better in principle and doing so much better work that they are sold at higher prices in Europe than the same kind of tools made in the countries abroad. In some other lines of machinery, however, such as the paper-making machinery for paper mills, there is keen competition with German, English, and French manufacturers on foreign business and in Canada, as the foreign prices are far below those which are received for the machines made in this country, and where it is only a question of price I am informed that our manufacturers lose every time. The sales which they make are based on the quality of their machines. With the lowering of the duty from 45 to 25 per cent, there will certainly be strong competition from abroad.

Two factories in my district manufacture Fourdrinier wires, which are extensively used in paper mills. Only yesterday I was waited upon by several representatives of this industry objecting to the basket clause in Schedule C of the Underwood bill, whereby their line of manufacture is reduced from 45 to 25 per cent. Let me remind our friends on the other side of the aisle that these men were not the representatives of the great profit-making employer we have heard them describe, but of actual workmen at the looms. In a square foot of wire, costing 25 cents to produce, the material is 8 cents, the labor 17 cents—more than 2 to 1. The wages paid here are three times the wages paid in Germany and two and a half times the amount paid in England for similar work. Are these men not justified in asking their Representative to enter a protest in their behalf, and should not their protest be heeded rather than have a deaf ear turned to it?

We have a line of industry also that gives us a strong bond of sympathy for our good Democratic friends who are contesting the Wilson-Underwood item of free sugar. A large concern in my district manufactures machinery, especially pumps, used in the manufacture of sugar. These constituents strongly protest against the injury that will be done to the sugar industry, thereby removing a large market for their production, and likewise they protest against the very marked lowering in tariff duty on their own product from 45 to 25 per cent under the new bill.

One of the most interesting features to one who surveys the industrial make-up of such a Commonwealth as Massachusetts is the interlocking of various related industries. Among some of those which are thus interdependent are the separate preparation of cotton warps for the cotton mills, the making of cotton cloths, which later go to the print works or converters, and the special manufacture in one mill of a very heavy wrapping paper, which goes to the other mills and is used to pack their product for the market. One large company does not make a pound of the actual paper, but has built up a large separate industry in boxing and preparing fine stationery from other mills for distribution to the retail trade. Instances might be multiplied, but it is enough to say that the whole structure is so bound together that if you attack it in any of its parts the whole must suffer.

When the Democratic tariff makers boast of reductions in nearly every schedule, they are making just such an attack on the whole structure, and we need not in detail illustrate by specific examples.

FARMING.

Included in this mutual relationship of varied industry is the farmer of western Massachusetts, who, as I may have shown, has a market at his doors for the products of the farm. Canada is not so far off, however, as to be out of the field of competition, and since this bill was reported, with the reduced duties on dairy products and milk on the free list, I have been in receipt of prompt and vigorous protest, of which the following telegram from a prominent and well-informed dairyman is a fair example:

Dairy interests in New England are on the decline and need all protection possible. Fight any reduction of tariff on milk, cream, or butter to last ditch.

ADVICE FROM A DEMOCRAT.

It would have been a source of much satisfaction to me to have witnessed early in April, 1910, the great ovation given by the Democratic Members of this House to a newly elected Congressman from Massachusetts, Mr. Foss. The event was heralded from the shores of Massachusetts Bay to the Berkshire Hills as marking a great epoch in the history of our State. The opinions of the gentleman in question were received as the advice of a sage, and for three years since he has been the successful Democratic standard bearer for governor of Massachusetts.

My friends in Massachusetts would hardly be disposed to accuse me of having frequently agreed with the political views of the governor. Perhaps for one other act I may have complimented him, namely, the very high standard he has set for himself in the selection of judges in Massachusetts. But I do wish to compliment him to-day and commend to the careful consideration of his Democratic colleagues, who are now condemning his opinions, a few utterances he has recently made in a special message to the Massachusetts Legislature. I ask your indulgence while I read:

The two platforms which indorsed the principle of protection received in the votes of the candidates who stood upon them a greater indorsement by the American people at the last election than the platform which repudiated the principle of a protective tariff.

The policy demanded by the American people during the past three years was a reduction of the tariff for the benefit of all the people. No considerable part of the voters were willing to support the doctrine of free trade advocated in the Democratic platform or the policy of deliberative and postponed reduction promised by the two wings of the Republican Party. But the great body of the people, without reference to political allegiance, desired the immediate adoption of a policy of tariff reduction which should benefit American industry and American trade, advance American production of every kind, and relieve the people from unjust tariff burdens.

In all tariff legislation three purposes must be kept in mind—the raising of revenue for the Government, the encouragement of domestic production, and the maintenance of the conditions necessary for private profit to domestic producers. No one of these purposes should be favored to the exclusion of the others. The combined consideration of the three purposes tends to the advancement of each.

The Democratic policy announced by one of the leaders March 10, 1912, "clearly excludes the idea of protecting manufacturers' profits." This policy is more pernicious than that of the Republican Party. It excludes not only the idea of guaranteeing profits but all consideration of the conditions under which manufacturers may earn them. It not only defeats the purposes of encouraging domestic production and assuring private profit to domestic producers, but also, through the curtailment of importations of the materials of manufacture, defeats the very purpose itself of raising revenue.

The Democratic Congress is undoubtedly resolved upon a tariff policy that will punish the monopolies for their exactions from the people. But such a policy will surely result in two years or four years of depression under ill-considered tariff legislation, to be followed by a popular rebuke to the Democrats for giving their attention to a rebuke to the monopolies instead of to the interests of the people, and the tariff will be made a political football for years to come.

But you also know that precisely the reverse of this plan is to be put into effect by the Democratic Congress—a nonprotective, tariff for revenue only, unreciprocal, destructive upward, and equally destructive downward revision. It is your right, it is your privilege, it is your duty to memorialize Congress in behalf of this Commonwealth against such a peril to the interests of Massachusetts.

MASSACHUSETTS COMMISSION ON THE COST OF LIVING.

It so happens that at the time the governor was receiving this cordial welcome at your hands and your predecessor's three years ago I was assisting in my humble way to pass the act, to which my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] has referred, establishing the Massachusetts commission on the cost of living. The act carried my signature as president of the senate, and I should like to quote a part of it:

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of said commission to inquire into the causes of the increased prices of the necessaries of life, as compared with wages and income, and to inquire into the direct and indirect effect of our present tariff laws upon wages, income, and cost of living.

SEC. 3. The members of the said commission shall be chosen with a view to their special knowledge of law, trade, labor, and political economy, and shall consist of five persons, to be appointed by the governor with the consent of the council.

Part of the conclusions arrived at by the commission may be stated in the following excerpts from its report:

The increasing urban concentration of population has been an influential factor in the increase of prices of the commodities of common consumption. The significance of the cityward drift of the population on the side of supply in reducing the volume of agricultural production has been pointed out elsewhere in this report. Not less potent is its influence in increasing the demand. City growth has unquestionably played a part in the advance of the cost of living.

The general advance of the standard of living throughout all the ranks of the population, from the highest to the lowest, is manifestly one of the most potent causes of the increase of the demand for commodities, and consequently of the advance of prices. On every side the wants of the people have been multiplied and diversified. They demand more and better things. Their requirements are larger, more varied, and more exacting.

In all ages of the world social standards have been set from above, and so long as those whose wealth or social prominence forces the newspapers to make them objects of public notice continue to wallow in their wealth salaried persons, from the highest to the lowest, down to wage earners, follow the bad example. Extravagance is, after all, comparative. The business man with an income of $10,000 a year can safely set a standard of living that would be ruinous to a shopkeeper at $2,000 a year, and imitation of the tradesman with $2,000 a year by the shoemaker at $15 a week would be equally ruinous. If increased brains, energy, and enterprise did not result in enabling persons to indulge in reasonable luxuries, there would be no incentive to progress. The danger comes when the general tendency is toward spending beyond one's income, which is apparent to-day.

The fundamental reason for the world-wide increase of prices is, in our belief, the increased production of gold. We share this belief with nearly all the economists.

With regard to the tariffs, the trusts, and the unions, which have been declared to be either primary or contributory causes of the high cost of living, the commission finds that none of these factors can be regarded as a direct and active cause of the recent increase of prices. With regard to the tariff the facts that prices have fallen and risen during long periods without relation to changes in duties, that prices have been rising in Great Britain under free trade, and that large increases have taken place in the prices of commodities not appreciably affected by the tariff show conclusively that the tariff is not a factor in the recent upward movement of prices in this country.

In connection with the inquiry into the cost of living an unofficial board of impartial experts selected by the fruit and produce exchange and the grocers' associations, with one Republican and one Democratic member of the Massachusetts commission, visited Canada to determine the truth of the charge that food costs less there than here by reason of the tariff. Comparisons were made on articles of the same quality at the same time in Windsor and Detroit, Montreal and Boston, St. John and Bangor. Meats and provisions were 1.8 per cent higher in Detroit than in Windsor, groceries 7.5 per cent higher in Windsor, meats and provisions 10 per cent higher in Boston than Montreal, groceries 4 per cent higher in Montreal, meats and provisions 13 per cent higher in Bangor than St. John, groceries 8 per cent higher in St. John, so that, viewing the whole matter by and large, the differences in the total food cost were inconsiderable. The price lists published in great detail by the Canadian department of labor since the publication of the Massachusetts commission's report shows a wider range of food prices in different parts of Canada than are the differences between the Canadian Provinces and New England. The investigation showed that the tariff apparently had nothing to do with food prices.

I beg further to quote from a message received by me yesterday from the efficient chairman of this commission, Robert Luce, the distinguished publicist of Massachusetts, as follows:

There is to-day in this country no important body of opinion hostile to the protective principle. Both the great political parties are committed to it. The only questions are those of detail. The purpose of a protective tariff is the maintenance of a system of manufacturing industries which shall keep us independent, shall diversify our occupations, and shall make adequate use of our natural resources, at the same time providing revenue for our national needs. Manufacturing plants are built slowly, must be kept in operation, and can not be readily shifted to other uses than those for which they were designed. It would be both improvident and cruel to destroy the value of our textile mills by the repeal of a statute. It has been the American practice to revise the tariff at intervals of several years. The result has been a periodical disturbance of business, with adjustment more or less affected by political considerations. The leading commercial organizations of the country are of the belief that a wiser course would be to make the adjustments a commercial rather than a political affair; to take the tariff out of politics, as is the practice in Germany. We share in this view. Our general conclusion as to the tariff is that it is not a cause of the recent increase in the cost of living.

GENERAL CONDITIONS IN WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried briefly to describe the conditions as I see them in my own section. It may be truthfully said I have referred more in detail to the producer, both employer and employee, than to the consumer of the products, natural and manufactured, of western Massachusetts. I take it, however, that he is really one and the same person in that in mutual relationship between man and man the producer in one instance is the consumer in the other, and the benefits accruing to the one or the opportunity for his livelihood makes him more truly the consumer of his brother's product. The interdependence, therefore, the one on the other, or both upon each other, makes their interests identical, and the contents of the pay envelope of the employee is the standard of his happiness as well as of the livelihood of his producing brother.

On this beautiful spring day I confess to a feeling of longing for a sight of the hills of Berkshire, Hampden, Hampshire, or Franklin Counties of Massachusetts.

I would enjoy a visit to the neighbors at home—and I call all western Massachusetts my home. My farmer friend would be found busy with his plow or planting in anticipation of the bountiful crop of the golden autumn; the artisan is working at a good wage, with two days' work offered for one he can accept; the mill hand hears the sweet refrain of the busy shuttle, and the employer, were it not for this tariff agitation, would appear contented with a full order book. Happiness and contentment pervade the air, for each one in his individual way realizes that the wife, mother, or sister can take to market a large-sized basket, and that he can provide her with the means of filling it to the brim. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, our section is prosperous, and times are good, as they have been throughout the land in recent years. Woe to the Democratic tariff makers who change this condition. At present our people are not so much troubled about the price of the contents of their market basket as they are at the prospect of having it emptied. They ask for the continuance of an opportunity to pay for its contents. Better a full basket at fair prices than an empty one at cut rates. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad indeed when I learned that the Democratic caucus had finished its consideration of the pending bill. I had been anxious and am yet anxious, inasmuch as it has been decreed that we must have an extraordinary session for the express purpose, at least the principal purpose, of tariff revision, that the consideration of the bill should commence at the earliest practicable time. I do regard it as unfortunate for the business interests of the country that frequent general tariff revisions should occur, but another general revision has been decreed, and the sooner it can be made the more acceptable it will be to those who think it will be a benefit and the less objectionable, the less disagreeable, to those who expect that the changes made will be injurious to the welfare of the country. I therefore congratulate the majority side on getting through with the ordeal of their caucus on so long a bill and on reaching an agreement which they were obliged to reach before they could adjourn, however diverse their respective interests and opinions might be; and I should not overlook to congratulate the very able and popular leader of the majority upon his excellent generalship in bringing the different elements in his party together with the prospects, I should say certainty, of securing their united support, at least enough of them to afford a large majority over the minority side on the pending measure. I heartily congratulate the gentleman from Alabama upon the proof of his diplomacy in this respect. But, sir, I had hoped that after the Tariff Board was provided by a previous Congress, that thereafter revisions by separate schedules whenever found necessary would do away almost entirely with the necessity for a general revision, with the advantage that the revision of a single schedule at intervals would not materially disturb business; at any rate, in a general way, also that such revisions would be made promptly when justified.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly very freely accord to the majority side collectively and severally that they have acted in good faith in the make-up of the bill and had in mind as an end the general welfare of our country. I do not pretend to deny what they claim to be the case, that the bill is the best, from the Democratic viewpoint, which they could frame and upon which they could all unite. I do not hesitate to agree with them on the proposition that it is impossible to so frame a general tariff-revision bill that it will meet with the unqualified approval of every Member who must give it his support in order that a majority therefor may be secured upon its final passage. Experience proves this is impractical and impossible in the nature of things. I grant that in order to be practical in legislation and to reach results at all mutual concessions must be made and the minority of a party yield more or less to the consensus of judgment of the majority of the same party, otherwise a result will not be reached. Any party must work in this way if results—I mean in an affirmative way—shall be attained.

Mr. Chairman, while yielding to the majority's laudable purposes with reference to the revision, from their viewpoint, as a protectionist I find very decided objections to its provisions. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not condemn it in toto. Covering 4,000 items, it would be very singular if some of them, or many of them, did not possess merit. I could point out many items out of the great number to which I should find no objection, and which if standing alone would receive my hearty support, my voice, and vote. For instance, take logs and lumber of all kinds; why, four years ago—more than four years ago, for it was during the session previous to the Republican tariff revision—I introduced a bill placing lumber on the free list, and it was unqualified in this respect, but as at the time I introduced the bill the promise of our party had already been made for a general tariff revision at the commencement of the new administration, the Taft administration, I could not secure consideration of my bill; but when lumber was reached in the Payne revision bill I voted for an amendment offered that lumber be placed upon the free list, without any restrictions as to any country or in any respect.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I should think it was about five years ago when I introduced in the House a bill providing for the placing of barbed wire, which is mostly used in fencing, upon the free list, and in the general revision bill, the Payne bill, I voted for placing barbed wire upon the free list.

Mr. Chairman, more important yet than either of these items I have just named is the income-tax provision in the pending bill. Let me mention, this provision would not have been tenable from the constitutional standpoint, or standpoint of constitutionality, except for the amendment recently made to the Constitution expressly authorizing such legislation. We do not forget that our Supreme Court years ago declared just such a provision as this income-tax clause to be unconstitutional, and while this conclusion was reached by the court as a result of a rehearing, and even then by a majority of only one, the decision and judgment was yet as binding as though it had been the unanimous judgment of the membership of the court. But this constitutional amendment is of Republican origin; the joint resolution for the amendment was introduced by Republicans in the two Houses, and was passed in each body under Republican majorities, and was approved by a Republican President.

To be specific, the joint resolution was introduced in the Senate by Senator Brown, of Nebraska, and it was introduced in the House by myself. As a result of the faithful efforts of Senator Brown a favorable report was secured from the Senate Judiciary Committee, and soon thereafter it was passed in the Senate and soon thereafter passed the House and immediately received the approval of Mr. Taft. For the last 20 years I have been an advocate of the policy of a graduated income-tax law, and I am in accord with the principle involved, in a general way, in the provision contained in this bill. Without pretending to sanction all its details, it would receive my vote if standing alone. I could mention other items in the pending bill that I should like to give my support, but objections of a very serious character which I find to many others greatly outweigh what I regard as meritorious in the bill, and it is without the least hesitation that I find myself impelled to earnestly oppose its enactment. But, sir, I concede that the die is cast, and that all the opposition can possibly do can not prevent its passage.

Mr. Chairman, time will tell who is right and who wrong of the supporters and opposers of this measure. The operation of the bill, the fruits it will bear, must determine that.

But, Mr. Chairman, I was about to overlook one feature, which is an omission in the provisions in the bill, as I regard it, which as a Republican I should consider myself derelict by failing to direct attention to it. It is the omission to perpetuate the Tariff Board or a tariff commission or to provide for either in any way whatever. This bill does not provide even for expert assistance in the preparation of a tariff-revision bill in any way whatever. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire wherein the danger of Congressmen becoming too well informed upon the subject of legislation which so vitally affects the business interests of our country? Why avoid information, why avoid being made intelligent in the premises and thus becoming qualified, highly qualified if possible, to discharge the duties of the important trust?

Mr. Chairman, are not the mistakes that have been made due to a lack of being fortified with the knowledge properly bearing upon the items contained and the rates adopted in the various schedules? The Tariff Board was of Republican origin, what we have had, but the Democratic Party, at the time in the minority, was glad to join with the Republican majority for its adoption. It was well enough this policy should be adopted and that intelligent, fair, and scientific tariff revision should be made under Republican rule. But the Democratic minority, now changed into a majority, repudiates a tariff board or tariff commission. But, Mr. Chairman, what is the use of scientific revision in the hands of a party antagonistic to the policy of protection? With free trade palpably in view as the ultimate of this revision, supplemented by one or two more revisions to finish it up, I must grant that scientific revision may not be logical under such circumstances. If there is to be no protection, and if free trade is to be adopted, certainly a tariff board would become a superfluity. Mr. Chairman, I am expecting Republicans will offer as an amendment a tariff board or tariff commission provision, and yet all who are opposed to the Democratic bill can do will be powerless to secure its adoption. But we shall have done our duty if we shall have done our utmost for the cause. For years I have earnestly advocated the policy of a tariff commission, nonpartisan in politics, composed of the best experts for the economic task or undertaking to be found among the best equipped of the Nation. The business interests of the country ought not to be tied up, involved with the political fortunes or misfortunes of any party. The business interests of the country ought not to be disturbed, injured, and imperiled by the result of constantly recurring congressional and presidential elections. This business question of the Nation, its revenues, which must sustain it, bear its expenses, make its great internal improvements, pay the salaries of public servants, defend it in wars with other countries, and pay the pensions of its patriotic defenders—this business question of our country, together with the business interests of every business man and of every citizen, should not be interrupted and made dependent upon the result of a congressional or presidential campaign.

I regard it as incontestable that anyone who is willing to have the question of tariff or revenue legislation impartially and fairly disposed of should agree to submit it to a purely nonpartisan tariff board or commission, made up, as I have just said, of the best-equipped experts for the undertaking. For a trial in courts of justice the desideratum is a fair jury, and the analogy ought to obtain here for the determination of our business and economic interests and concerns.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to add to the support of my proposition to take tariff out of politics by means of the use of a tariff commission, as I have suggested, that the result would be that our whole country, North and South as well as East and West, would unite in vouching for its beneficence. One unfortunate feature for many years has been that political party interests were involved with the issue. I grant that at the start and for years such was not the case; at any rate, if at all, only in a small degree. There was a period when the South, on account of its production of cotton, entertained the belief that as they did with but little manufacturing, and that their main industry was the production of cotton, that the policy of protection for which New England, where the manufacturing centers then were, earnestly contended was a disadvantage to the South. But I am sure there has been an increasing disposition growing up with the people in the Southern States in favor of a protective policy, and that if congressional and presidential elections were to be decided upon that issue, not hindered or hampered by questions which appeal more strongly to them, the strength of the protective policy in the Southern States would constantly increase. Certainly there can be no question at this time that a very close community of interest, industrially and commercially, exists between the North and South as well as the East and West, and these interests, I feel very confident, will be best promoted, expanded, and conserved by the protection of home industries and the conservation of the home market to the citizens and taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Chairman, with the highest deference for our very learned and highly accomplished Chief Executive, I respectfully take issue on some propositions contained in his tariff message orally delivered to the Congress in joint session April 8. I think, too, some of these expressions may help to interpret or determine the ultimate purpose of the framers of the pending bill, the form and contents, and, I may add, the variety of phases and conditions of which no one can successfully contend mark it with a distinctive character. What I mean is that its substance and legal effect when enacted into law will not enable anyone to place it, or base it, upon any economic principle. It is very plain to be seen that it is riding horses in opposite directions at the same time, and even when racing in the same direction it goes a much greater distance on one item, or with one item, than another, even when they are of the same kind or class. Distinctions made between rates on raw material and the products thereof are wholly incompatible in principle and illogical in results. The bill left standing alone would constitute a very unreliable guide to the tariff ideas of the party proposing it if that were the only criterion or information to go by. But, taking the tariff message, the bill, and party traditions with them, into consideration, one is strongly impelled to the conclusion that free trade is the Democratic goal. Take, for instance, the message of the President. He, after speaking of the tariff reform to be made, continued with the further statement:

> The sooner that is done the sooner we shall escape from suffering from the facts and the sooner our men of business will be free to thrive by the law of nature (the nature of free business) instead of by the law of legislation and artificial arrangement.

Again, further along, it was stated that "the object of the tariff duty henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world." And, again, "We must build up trade, especially foreign trade." Some difference of opinion may arise as to precisely what is meant by these expressions. I do not want to prejudice the message in any way whatever by taking excerpts from it, and it is perfectly plain I could not do so if I were to try.

The message is credibly brief, which renders it so much more the likely that it has been read by most every citizen of the United States. It is probable a copy may be found in every household; certainly, every daily and every weekly newspaper has published it one or more issues, and who is it who reads English that does not read the President's message, especially when so brief as not to cover three ordinary pages set in good large type?

Mr. Chairman, it is essential, in order that we compete for the sale of our products in the markets of the world, that we do so, or succeed in doing so, without any artificial help which legislation might render. Sir, we have no jurisdiction to carry the effect of our legislation beyond our national territorial boundary lines. Our congressional acts are supreme within the United States, and that is the limit. But when we are discussing tariff laws it is necessarily understood that duties imposed, tolls to be paid, are intended to refer to our home market or markets. No other meaning or understanding is permissible. I am unqualifiedly opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the policy of permitting other countries, regardless of labor conditions, regardless of the low standard of living and the low standard of wages, to ship their products of whatever kind or character into the United States to come in competition in our home markets with the products of our own country in "free competition" or free trade. I would except from this things our country does not produce and make other exceptions, but I would make this the rule. Sir, where is the reward for good citizenship, for the payment of taxes for the support of the Government, for loyalty to the flag when our country is imperiled if the producers in foreign countries are to enjoy the benefits of our home markets, the greatest and best markets in the world, especially for our own people, upon equal terms with those who have made and are yet making this country the greatest country on earth?

Sir, to add to the injury, duties have been lowered and removed even in cases where some of the foreign countries impose duties for the admission of the same products into their country. The bill disregards the rule or principle of reciprocity or reciprocal trade relations made by mutual agreement. It does not require mutuality; it prodigally throws away advantages secured to our own country in face of and in defiance of the fact that other countries, sure to take advantage of the unwisdom, have barred us, our country, of the same privilege by their tariff enactments. Mr. Chairman, I am unqualifiedly opposed to requiring laborers and producers of our country to be driven to such limits of competition as to render necessary the "whetting of wits with the laborers and producers of other countries" for our own home market. I also submit that there is no law of nature which entitles the people of foreign countries to trade without price or the payment of toll in our home market. On the contrary, the law of nature secures to the citizens of our own country the exclusive right to control their own market and it is only the comity of nations, only by comity, in their progress of civilization, that they permit the trading with each other. Very frequently nations exemplify this positive right by passing and enforcing embargo acts against trade with other countries. Sir, I contend that free trade is more nearly an affirmative artificial arrangement than the doctrine of protection, considering how countries and nations started, in their low estate, and have builded up to their present civilizations. We remember at the start they all regarded each other as enemies and thus laid no claim by natural law to sell or buy in their respective markets. The fixing of duties, in my judgment, is merely a regulation or license charged for the privilege granted of trading in the home market and is merely a condition imposed upon the privilege yielded or granted by the particular government. The predilection "for especially foreign trade," or the idea that we should seek more for foreign trade than the home trade, I regard as fallacious. But I very well remember that this is in accordance with the views of those who have espoused free trade.

Why, when he was a free trader, which he at first was, Daniel Webster himself opposed the inauguration of the policy of protection for our home industries, even if he did live in New England, on the ground that it would conflict with or impair the interests of transportation upon the high seas. But ere long the great statesman perceived his error, and becoming fully converted to the doctrine of the protection of home industries, became one of its ablest advocates. With the marvelous development, industrially and commercially, which has taken place in this country since Mr. Webster became a protectionist, it is plain to be seen that the policy of protection includes, with its other virtues, great benefits with respect to what has become one of the greatest problems of our age, that of transportation. Mr. Chairman, history proves that the adoption of the policy of protection by our forefathers, which I may add, having referred to the first impressions of Daniel Webster, received the support of both the sage of Monticello and Old Hickory, the most distinguished of Democrats, was the richest and happiest solution of the problem of transportation for the American people which at that time it was possible for the most enlightened to achieve. It did not merely lower rates of transportation; the result was to abolish distance; distance to where? To markets for American produce; and where, sir, were those markets? They were in Europe, principally in England, for nearly all the manufacturing was then done in England, nearly all of the manufactures which our people purchased. And lest we forget, the mother country prohibited by law any manufacturing by our colonies. It was decreed America should be a country of farmers to feed the labor of England, especially that employed in manufacturing, and in turn that we should be dependent upon English manufactories for manufactured goods. So long as this condition existed all of our surplus farm products were to be transported across the Atlantic and the merchandise and manufactures purchased to be shipped to America in return. Thus the cost of transportation was a millstone around the necks of the American people; but they might not have found this out for a much longer time than it did take had it not been for the provocation which culminated finally in the War of the Revolution and the political emancipation of our country.

Next in importance to our political independence was our industrial independence, and this we did achieve by the adoption of the policy of protection. This beneficent policy solved very largely, as I have said, the problem of transportation to the American people; it transferred our market, then principally in England, into our own country; it resulted in the removal of millions of people from the industrial centers of Europe to our own country. Our manufacturing industries, which were developed as a result of the policy, furnished labor for the thousands and the development of our agricultural resources were stimulated and our country took on a growth in general that it never would have known without the enactment of protective-tariff laws. Without going into details as to the ups and downs of the policy of protection, caused by legislative enactments for and against, I regard it as very reasonable to conclude that had our country never enjoyed its advantages our population and wealth would not be four-tenths of what it is to-day. I feel very confident that the greatness of our country, the achievements of our people in everything that is desirable, and our relative strength and standing with the world are due principally to the fruits of the policy of protection.

Mr. Chairman, as I view it, the pending bill in its operation would afford some benefits to agriculture if it were not for its tendency to put the industry out of commission in some particularly important respects. The serious question is whether it will leave agriculture capable of enjoying any benefits. If agriculture is rendered unprofitable, free lumber and barbed wire will not be in demand; neither will agricultural implements. If agriculture can not be permitted to remain profitable farmers must get along with the improvements and machinery they now have. I must say that the potato raisers, sugar-beet raisers, prairie-hay farmers, alfalfa-hay raisers, and live-stock breeders and raisers in the district I have the honor to represent feel they will be hit pretty hard. These products surely should not fall under the Democratic ban of not being "legitimate industries."

I have reference to the new propaganda of the majority party that industries are not legitimate which need to be protected or which will not be profitable without the aid of protection. Mr. Chairman, it ought to seem conclusive that agriculture in the United States is one of the indigenous industries, and that it can not be rendered "illegitimate" by any "artificial arrangement," such as legislation, while it may be greatly injured by legislation which is adverse. But the majority party, while advancing this new proposition of "legitimate industries" and illegitimate industries, have said nothing about the qualities of competition, the kind of competition. The party does insist upon free competition between our people and the people of other countries. But, sir, I desire to right here file a counterclaim to the proposition of "legitimate business," that the competition American laborers and American producers are to contend with must be legitimate competition. In other words, to be consistent, if industries must be classed as legitimate and illegitimate, then our country's competitors or the competitors of our people must likewise be classed as legitimate and illegitimate. And right here, Mr. Chairman, is the crux of the tariff question. All Republicans ask is that sufficient protection be afforded to Americans—to our home people—to equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, it being understood that the cost of production at home, on account of the higher prices of labor as compared with European and Asiatic countries, is higher or the highest of any. All protectionists ask is that duties be imposed such as will put the home producer upon an equal footing in the home market, the expenses of production considered, with the foreigner offering his goods in our home market. Such protection as this secured to home producers and home labor will preserve and maintain the higher prices paid labor and the higher standards of living in this country than in European and Asiatic countries, and, I may add, in the American countries south of us. Sir, I make no apology for my advocacy that these conditions and standards should be maintained.

Mr. Chairman, I very respectfully submit for the consideration of the membership of this House, having in mind the proposition of the majority side, that industries must be classed as legitimate and illegitimate, and my own counterclaim proposition, that it necessarily follows that competition likewise should be so classed—I submit the proposition whether the competition of the raisers of cattle in the Republic of Mexico, with cheap peon labor and low-priced land, whether the shipping of the fresh meat of the butchered animals into United States markets free of duty is legitimate competition. Just now we will not forget that the United States is obliged to keep a large part of our standing Army interspersed along the Mexican boundary line to prevent the contending armies of the Republic from shooting American citizens within our own territory or on our side of the line. Can it be that this constitutes an additional reason why Mexican meats should reach our markets free of toll paid when crossing the boundary line? While the pending bill does provide for a small duty to be paid for the admission of live cattle from other countries, it permits all of the products and by-products of cattle to be shipped into the United States free of duty. Of the cow, it permits the milk and butter to be shipped free into our market. It has already been pointed out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that the only portion remaining not to be shipped free into the United States is the bovine soul; all the material part, when cut into pieces, is to be admitted free. The bill would level cattle raising in the United States down to the Mexican basis, if the product from Mexico, with that from other countries added, were adequate in quantity to produce such a result, and it will be no fault of the bill if such a dire result shall not occur; rather that of existing providential conditions. Let me add we are placed in the same way at a disadvantage with Canada, but will be affected in a smaller degree, due to a smaller disparity in conditions with regard to labor and land.

Mr. Chairman, the bill is exciting much apprehension on the part of sugar-beet growers in the Nebraska sixth district. One new sugar factory, costing about $1,200,000, has been in operation two or three years with very small, if any, profit to the factory, but with very satisfactory results to the farmers in that locality. It has added very greatly to the prosperity of the farmers tributary to the factory. It has been a direct benefit to all of these and an indirect benefit to neighboring farmers not producing sugar beets, but producing other crops, especially alfalfa, the demand for which has been greatly increased on account of the production of sugar beets in the same vicinity. To explain, thousands of cattle and sheep are brought to the factory for fattening upon the pulp of the ground beet after the sugar has been extracted, and alfalfa hay is required as a good food balance with the pulp for the fattening of the stock. Land values where beets are raised have been very greatly increased by this acquisition to agriculture, and the general prosperity of the beet-sugar locality, of every branch of business, has been very much increased by the production of beet sugar. I will here read a letter written me by a sugar-beet raiser, Mr. Thomas Hall, of Scottsbluff, Nebr., or as it is rather lengthy, I shall read only a portion of it:

SCOTTSBLUFF, NEBR., March 3, 1913.

Hon. MOSES P. KINKAID,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write you in regard to the sugar tariff. I am a sugar-beet raiser; have raised beets for four years. The sugar-beet industry has been the making of this country, which is especially adapted for sugar beets. Up until the time we began to raise sugar beets it was hard to make a living here. But for the last four years we have all prospered, and we would be greatly disappointed if the tariff should be taken off of sugar to such an extent that we would have to quit rasing beets. * * * There are a great many people under the Government ditch in our locality that can not pay their water right at the present time. I myself have heard a good many homesteaders say, "If I can only get my farm seeded down to alfalfa for two or three years and then begin to raise sugar beets I can pay my water right and save my home." I sincerely believe if the tariff is taken off of sugar it will ruin this country, as this country is only adapted for some root crop such as beets, potatoes, and cabbage, which grows in a short time. Corn does not do well here, as the seasons are too short for it to mature. I will close, asking you to protect us along this line.

Respectfully,
THOMAS HALL.

Let me read a brief letter written me by Ehrman Bros., of Gering, Nebr., which is in the beet-raising locality:

GERING, NEBR., March 11, 1913.

M. P. KINKAID,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are a couple of young farmers. We started out to farm on our own hook seven years ago, with absolutely nothing, and now to-day we own a nice 160-acre farm—$100 an acre—and the sugar-beet industry is the cause for our owning a farm. Now, I don't see why the tariff should be taken off sugar, for it would kill this community. Why not take it off steel? Then, too, if the sugar is taken on the free list it will cripple us.

Thanking you for the favors for the future,
Yours, truly,
EHRMAN BROS.

Here I have a letter written by Mr. W. H. Stahraker, of Scottsbluff, Nebr., which is right to the point:

SCOTTSBLUFF, NEBR., March 1, 1913.

Hon. MOSES P. KINKAID,
House of Representatives, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As I live in the part of the United States where the sugar beet grows, and the sugar industry cuts quite an item in these parts, I am going to write you a few lines, to have you do all in your power, if you will, to prevent any reduction in the tariff on sugar.

If the beet industry is killed out here, I do not see how these people who have taken homesteads will ever be able to pay for them. As I am a grower myself, I think I know what it pays to raise. Cut out the raising of beets and you had as well take corn away from the corn-raising countries. It will have the same effect.

Thanking you for whatever you may do,

Respectfully, W. H. STAHBAKER.

You noted that the letter I first read states the homesteaders did not see how they could pay for their lands, meaning their homesteads, if the duty should be taken off of sugar. That was the writer's way of stating his view, but to many of the membership here an explanation is necessary. The writer is one among many homesteaders who made entries under the North Platte irrigation project; the land itself costs nothing; a compliance with the homestead law is all that is required to secure patent to the land itself, but the perpetual water right secured from the Government, in the patent it issues, has to be paid for in money under all these irrigation projects, and under this project the perpetual water right costs $55 for each acre of land watered. The writer of the letter means that the homesteaders can not pay for their water rights if sugar beets can not be grown profitably or if the business must be terminated. The Government has already invested in the development of these irrigation projects over seventy-five millions of dollars, and there is yet owed the Government approximately seventy-one millions of dollars. Under many of the projects it is contemplated that sugar beets will be raised, and that this will best enable entrymen of any crop to realize ready cash with which to make their annual water-right payments. Thus, the Government itself would be much better insured that water-right payments would be made when due if sugar-beet raising may be permitted to remain profitable to the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent to add that homestead entries were made under these irrigation projects with the mutual understanding by the officials of the Government and the entrymen that beet-sugar factories would be established to manufacture into sugar the sugar beets raised on the farms, and that this would furnish the surest means whereby entrymen could pay the water-right charges to the Government, varying from $20 to $25 to $100 or more per acre. We may fairly say the Government was party to the understanding with the entrymen that they would thus be enabled to make their water-right payments; but now the Government, under the management of a different political party, is proceeding to make this impossible, and the question arises, How is the money going to be raised to make the payments? Should not the present administration preserve faith with these entrymen and at the same time insure the repayment as early as practicable of over $70,000,000 into the reclamation fund? Is not this a business proposition for the Government?

Mr. Chairman, let me now read a brief letter written me by J. W. Gilbert, of Minatare, Nebr., upon the same subject:

MINATARE, NEBR., March 28, 1913.

Hon. M. P. KINKAID,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You are fully aware of our state of affairs—how we are laboring under a new system of irrigation.

Our taxes are high, and we are depending largely on our sugar-beet industry. We believe you will do what you can to protect our interests along this line.

I am a farmer, and anything you can do for us will be appreciated.

Respectfully, yours,

J. W. GILBERT.

I will read next excerpts from a letter written me by S. K. Warrick, of Scottsbluff, Nebr., a prominent banker at that place. Mr. Warrick says:

DEAR MR. KINKAID: I am anxious to know what the Ways and Means Committee has done on our sugar-tariff schedule. * * *

It is my judgment that this State has 500,000 to 800,000 acres of land that will grow sugar beets successfully. Colorado probably has 2,000,000 acres. The territory tributary to Billings has about 1,300,000 acres. We produced a million dollars' worth of sugar beets last year on 16,000 acres of land. We can not afford to destroy this industry. If we reduce the cost of living in the United States we must make 1 acre of land produce the amount that 2 acres are producing now. I believe that the sugar beet will bring about this result quicker than any crop known. This has been proven in Germany and many other European countries. Our brief statistics in this country confirm the European statistics.

I will now read extracts from a letter from A. N. Mathers, president of a national bank in Gering, Nebr., in Scotts Bluff County:

I am writing you in behalf of the sugar-beet industry. This industry is, if nothing is done to injure it, to become the great industry of the West. This North Platte Valley, from one end to another through Nebraska and for its entire width, is practically all good sugar-beet ground. Only the land close in is being put to sugar beets at present. In four years the acreage has grown from 3,000 to 22,000 for the ensuing year.

* * * * * * *

Long ago the farmer hesitated to contract for water at the cost of $12 per acre. Now, knowing the possibilities of beet growing, farmers will readily contract for water at $35 or $42.50, and are willing to sign up on the south side Government project at possibly $65 per acre. Under the present Government project the homesteader is attempting to meet his water payment and develop his home and farm by means of raising beets. I personally know of many that are hauling beets 7 miles. * * *

S. S. Stark, of Scottsbluff, Nebr., writes me substantially upon the same lines as do several others in this same county, so I shall not take the time to read their letters.

I was about to read the lengthy and very illuminating letter upon this subject of Mr. A. T. Officer, manager of the Scottsbluff sugar-beet factory, but I now recall that this gentleman filed an exhaustive brief with the Ways and Means Committee near the close of the last session, and this has been printed in the reports of the hearings had before the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I have here this short newspaper clipping headed "An appeal to the farmers of America," which was sent me by a sugar-beet farmer in the North Platte Valley, which states the case very fully from the viewpoint of sugar-beet farmers. It reads:

AN APPEAL TO THE FARMERS OF AMERICA.

The farmers who grow sugar beets and the manufacturers who make beet sugar publish the following facts about this industry in order to enlist the public's support in favor of retaining the present tariff on sugar. Read every word of this message. It is important to you and your children and to the millions of Americans who are interested in agriculture and its dependent industries. This is a fight between the trusts and the people. We are with the people and we want the people to be with us; we want your cooperation and support. Read the rest of this message now; then act promptly.

The Sugar Trust, in combination with a few other big importers, seeks to have the tariff on sugar removed with a view to crushing the beet-sugar industry of America, their only competition. The sugar importers send millions of American money abroad every year for sugar; the beet-sugar industry keeps the money at home, benefiting thousands of American farmers, coal miners, machinists, and workingmen in many different lines. Removing the tariff will only benefit the trust and the big importers; it will not permanently lower the price of sugar, no more than did the removal of the tariff on coffee reduce the price of coffee. It will cut the Government's revenue enormously and crush a great and rapidly growing American industry that gives employment and support to thousands of American farmers, workingmen, and business men.

Here are the facts, tersely told in eight short paragraphs. Read them carefully and thoughtfully, then fill out and mail the coupon below—to-day—now.

1. All agitation for a lower tariff on sugar originated with the importers of foreign sugar. There are only three large importing interests in the United States, of which the Sugar Trust dominates. They handle $300,000,000 worth of sugar annually and fear that the further development of the home beet-sugar industry will destroy their monopoly.

2. These importers wish to prevent further development of the home beet-sugar industry because home-produced beet sugar is their only competition and the only sugar which does not pass through their hands and from which they can not exact toll from the American consumer.

3. The present tariff on sugar is a large revenue producer for the Government, and therefore decreases direct taxes. Its net effect on the consumer amounts to only 14 cents a year per capita. To reduce this tariff means perpetuating the monopoly of the importing sugar refiners. To retain the present tariff means the further development of the home beet-sugar industry and, ultimately, cheaper sugar.

4. The tariff is no burden to the consumer, because the price of sugar is lower in the United States than in most other countries, and because 40 per cent of the sugar consumed is used in the manufacture of candy, confections, chewing gum, condensed milk, etc., the retail price of which would not be affected by any decline in the price of sugar. Reducing the tariff would reduce the Government revenue without any gain to the consumer.

5. Beet-sugar production can be developed to supply the entire demand of this country. It increased 1,500 per cent since the present tariff was enacted in 1897. There are now 72 beet-sugar factories in the United States, located in 16 States, extending from Ohio to California, and owned by 30 independent concerns. These factories represent an investment of $80,000,000 and produce over 1,200,000,000 pounds of sugar, or about one-sixth of the total consumption in the United States. The production of beet sugar benefits the farmers, the workingmen, the coal miners, the machine shops, and the railroads.

6. The price of sugar has steadily decreased since the advent of beet sugar. Further development will reduce the cost of manufacture and further reduce the price of sugar to the consumer and will retain in this country immense sums of money that are now sent abroad for the purchase of foreign sugar.

7. Beet sugar is the same substance as cane sugar. It has the same amount of sweetness as cane sugar and can be used for all purposes. Dr. Wiley, while chief of the United States Bureau of Chemistry, declared that there is no distinguishable difference of any kind between refined beet sugar and refined cane sugar.

Mr. Chairman, it can not be successfully gainsaid that the price of sugar to consumers in the United States has constantly declined since sugar-beet raising and the manufacture of sugar therefrom commenced. It is perfectly well settled that during the three months' time it takes to market the sugar manufactured from sugar beets in our own country that the whole of this time, these three months, the price of sugar is lower to consumers than during the other nine months of the year, so that it seems perfectly clear that if enough beet sugar were produced in the United States to entertain the home market for the other nine months that the price to consumers would be reduced the year around, and that the very benefit to consumers professed by the framers of this bill, which is lower-priced sugar, would eventually be realized by the competition resulting from the increased home production. But, Mr. Chairman, the effect of this bill will be to let in the competition of foreign countries—I should say the production of foreign countries, the result of cheap labor, very low-priced labor, and thereby destroy the beet-sugar industry in this country in its infancy. It is not enough, it would seem, that foreign sugar controls our home market nine months in the year; it must be made supreme all the year. The result must be that instead of permitting competition to fully develop by the growth of the sugar-beet industry here at home, that competition will be made impossible and foreign sugar will have a monopoly in our home market in proportion as our home sugar-beet industry is driven to the wall, with the result of an increased price to the consumers of sugar.

Mr. Chairman, I again call attention to my counterclaim that competition should be legitimate in order that it be eligible to the freedom of our home markets; of course, I mean the competition of foreigners for the advantages of our home markets. I need not cite statistics to show the prices of labor in sugar-producing countries outside the jurisdiction of the United States. Every Congressman and most of our constituents are well versed upon the subject. We know, and our constituents know, that wages paid labor in these sugar-producing countries outside of the United States are insignificant and trifling as compared with the prices paid in the United States, but I will just instance what is going on south of us, specifically, in British Guiana and Trinidad. This is going to be a wonderful sugar-producing locality in the hands of the British. Large English capital, with the backing given by the British Government, which it customarily gives in behalf of a monopoly in such a case as this, is now being directed to the development of extensive cane-sugar plantations in these British possessions, and the prospects of the enactment of this bill is giving this very British enterprise accelerated impetus. But, of course, it is not Englishmen who will perform the manual labor, the raising and gathering and manufacturing of the cane into sugar. The fact is, as I have just been informed from the most authentic source, they contract for coolie labor in job lots of a thousand or more in a single contract, the same to be transported from Ceylon and vicinity to the plantations and to remain for five years, usually; and they are to be paid, just the head of the family is to be paid, the liberal price of 24 cents per day.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask, is this "legitimate" competition? Is it fair, reasonable, I should say humane, or decent that American labor should be degraded from its present high standing to the low level of wages paid to the unfortunate coolies, whose condition is thus rendered equivalent to human slavery? Mr. Chairman, if American labor must be reduced to so low a level, Americans must cease to take pride in the belief that our country is to realize a great destiny, that it is to keep in the van of human progress.

Mr. Chairman, how about the effect of the bill as to the north of us—with Canada, I mean? Reciprocity with that country, while enacted by our Congress, became very unpopular with the people; certainly those engaged in agriculture were overwhelmingly opposed to it. The fact that Canada rejected it does not argue, when the facts are known, that it would have been a good bargain for the United States. But, sir, had reciprocity been consummated it would have possessed merit not contained in this bill. Just a little bit of compensation might have been realized, or imagined, for the large amount of sacrifice made by agriculture in the United States had the proposition been consummated. But there is no pretense of reciprocity, no demand for reciprocity, in this bill. The provision relative to wheat and flour is an anomaly. It is a joker for the American farmer; it makes a showing of affording him protection upon the wheat he grows; but we all expect that Canada will at once adapt itself to the situation by removing the duty imposed by the Dominion laws on flour shipped from the United States, and thereby entitle itself to ship its flour free of duty into the United States, which the bill will permit. Thus Canadian flour will come in in free competition in our American markets with our American flour and the American farmer will be left without any real protection, with nothing but a pretense of protection upon his wheat.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to inquire for an explanation of the grudge against American millers betrayed by this provision of the pending bill. Hitherto we have understood that the theory of free trade would in its application merely put American industries on a common level in every respect with those of foreign countries; therefore we did not expect that the administration side would present a bill which, in its effect, discriminates in favor of Canadian millers over the millers of the United States. But that is just what this bill does. As the bill is written, wheat shall pay 10 cents per bushel with flour and the other products of wheat free, provided that if the importing country imposes a duty upon the admission of flour to its markets that a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem shall be paid by that country for shipping into our markets. Therefore, say, that Canada imposes no duty upon the admission of our flour into its markets, for we may reasonably assume that the duty it does now impose will be removed for the benefit of Canadian millers, and I shall assume that it will be removed and predicate my further observations about it upon that assumption. Thus it will result from the status that Canadian wheat, as wheat in the natural state, will not be imported into the United States, and this is intended to cajole the American wheat raiser. But it is very plain that the product of the wheat ground, consisting of flour, bran, and so forth, can be as easily shipped into the United States as wheat, and that it will be shipped just as extensively into our home markets as would the wheat if no duty were imposed upon the admission of wheat. Consequently wheat will not be receiving any protection, the apparent protection being ineffectual. Besides this while Canadian flour and bran will be competing in our home market with the flour and bran of American wheat, our home millers will be precluded the advantage of grinding Canadian wheat because of the discrimination made between the importation of flour and wheat.

Mr. Chairman, I will read a brief excerpt from a statement in behalf of the American millers, which was filed with the chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate April 17 of this year:

> We beg further to submit that should the proposal carry to place a duty on wheat and admit its products free, the American miller will stand absolutely alone in being thus discriminated against. There is not another wheat and flour producing country on the face of the globe that does not give the miller at least an equality of opportunity; in many countries he is given an advantage.
>
> For instance, in Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, France, Germany, Italy, Norway, Roumania, Sweden, Canada, Egypt, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand there is a duty upon both wheat and flour.
>
> In Belgium, Russia, and British India there is a duty on flour while wheat is free.
>
> In the United Kingdom, Denmark, Netherlands, and China both wheat and flour are free.
>
> Surely the Congress will not willingly and knowingly place the American miller at a great disadvantage with his fellows in other countries and, thus handicapped, expect him to compete.
>
> We assume that the duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat was imposed as a measure of protection for the American wheat raiser. If so, we contend that a duty upon the raw material without an equalizing duty on the products of that raw material will be futile and unavailing. Otherwise the principle of tariff making used since the beginning of this Government by all parties is wrong and the practice of all the wheat and flour producing countries of the world is in error.
>
> We maintain that you can not possibly discriminate against the farmer's best, nearest, and most profitable customer, the miller, without at the same time discriminating against the farmer himself; in short, that the basis on which this tariff is proposed, that of placing a duty upon wheat and admitting its products free, is both unheard of and obviously unjust.
> The welfare of the farmer and the miller must go hand in hand; one can not be damaged without hurt to the other. In this connection is it frequently asserted that as long as there is an exportable surplus of wheat raised in the United States it must inevitably find its basic value in the world's wheat price.

Mr. Chairman, this is another example of unscientific tariff legislation. But as a tariff or revenue bill this very provision as to wheat and flour vindicates a tariff board or tariff commission for expert help in the framing of tariff or revenue bills, to the end that the legislation may be scientific. Had the framers of this bill availed themselves of the assistance of such expert help and relied upon it they would have escaped making this bull.

Mr. Chairman, the opponents of the policy of protection, specifically the Democratic Party, are constantly looking for cheap markets where to make purchases. They would seek to build up trade, "especially foreign trade," hence would buy in foreign markets, and they would buy the products of foreign cheap labor. Thus they would bring these foreign products, and consequently foreign cheap labor, in direct competition with the producers of the same goods and the labor that produced them in our home country. Certainly, this could not result otherwise than to level the standard of living and of wages in the United States down to the standard of foreign countries. It conclusively follows that if the products of labor are to be cheap, the price of labor, or its wages, must be correspondingly cheap.

Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in the beneficence of the policy of protection, but this does not signify that I favor high protection. I believe in sufficient protection, and that is all; rates that will equalize the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. I am very frank to say that if any mistakes are to be made in the fixing of rates I should prefer that the error be in favor of our home producer and of our home market. I claim it to be to the advantage of our whole country, a public advantage to all our people, that our own home producers enjoy a preference by at least a slight margin, if not by condition or circumstance, then by "artificial arrangement," such as the imposition of a duty by legislation, that such advantage be enjoyed over foreign labor and foreign products.

Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend that the policy, the advantages of protection to home labor and home industries, has not been abused, perverted in many instances from general public benefits to mere private and selfish ends. It is true that this has occurred, but this is no disparagement of the principle honestly and scientifically applied.

Mr. Chairman, the majority side and the administration advocate as a substitute for the Republican policy of protection competition; they would remove all "artificial" trade restrictions in the nature of protection for the panacea of competition. Sir, I regret the very palpable oversight of the administration side in that they have not perceived that competition is the ultimate result of protection. Competition is the purpose sought by protection afforded in the first instance. It ought to be perfectly plain to everyone giving any serious consideration to the question that foreign manufacturers would have met with but little, if any, competition in the United States, even by this time, had it not been for the policy of protection inaugurated in our country's infancy. Our country would have yet been at the mercy of the manufacturing monopolies of Europe had it not been for the competition produced as the direct result of the policy of protection by the development of manufactories in our own country. It is the fruits of the policy of protection that have made our Nation one of the strongest competitors in the markets of the world. At the same time it is perfectly plain that this same policy has resulted in a healthy and wholesome competition in the different industries in our own country—as to many things keen competition—so that our own citizens, surrounded by the same environments with the same standards of living and wages, standing thus on an equal footing and thus made "legitimate" competitors, are being obliged to "whet their wits" to the end that they may be able to cope with each other for our home markets besides for foreign markets. When protection was first inaugurated in our young Republic certain European countries tried to stifle it by the "dumping" of all their surplus manufactures, and even more than that, upon our markets, selling at prices lower than the cost of the manufacture in order to paralyze the infant industries of the United States. But, sir, protection brought development of these industries, with the result of competition both with foreign manufacturers and between our manufacturers at home.

The Democratic Party assails the policy of protection, relying partially upon mistakes and inaccuracies or inequalities in rates of duties which have occurred in some instances. But the pending bill, as has already been pointed out, ought to make them most charitably disposed as to such mistakes. In any event, mere inaccuracies constitute only a misapplication of the policy and do not therefore disparage the principle; in many instances they vindicate the principle or its virtues when properly applied. Mr. Chairman, admitting that such mistakes have been made by our side, we find great consolation in the fact that the unfair results thereby produced are small indeed as placed beside the disasters which have resulted from Democratic revision. We remember, too, that such mistakes as we have made have generally inured to citizens of our own country, while, on the other hand, the injurious effects of Democratic tariff tinkering have contributed directly to the prosperity of foreign countries at the sacrifice of our home people. I greatly prefer that, if errors must occur, the result shall be in favor of our home people rather than of foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party has charged up against the policy of protection the high cost of living and made solemn promises that this revision would lower the cost of living to a reasonable level; but, sir, I greatly fear that the only way in which the cost of living will be reduced by the operation of this bill is that by its blighting effect upon business it will necessitate a low standard of or poor living.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party is constantly charging up to the operation of the policy of protection the responsibility for the existence of trusts, but they overlook the fact that though no duty is imposed upon the admission of tea and coffee, the business in these two household necessities constitute two of the greatest trusts, and the prices are about the highest to consumers, in proportion to the actual cost, of any articles of food they buy.

Again, the business of Great Britain, the greatest free-trade country, is honeycombed with gigantic trusts.

Mr. Chairman, the bill contains many phases and varieties of economic incompatibilities. It rides two or more horses in as many different directions at the same time. It is based upon free trade, tariff for revenue, special privilege for foreign producers—instance manufacture of flour in Canada for our home market—and upon conflicting campaign promises. It will be hailed as a friend by our foreign competitors, while it is sure to be deplored as a legislative plague by producers and consumers in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to address myself at great length to the pending measure. The subject has been discussed by distinguished gentlemen with such clearness, force, and ability that further explanation or further debate seems useless. While most of us have long realized the importance and necessity of a downward revision of the tariff, yet if any doubt had existed in our minds it would have been removed after listening to the masterly arguments of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. Probably never before in the history of the country has a committee engaged in the preparation of tariff legislation labored so zealously to present to the American people an equitable readjustment of tariff duties as has the majority membership of the present Committee on Ways and Means. For days and for weeks, with strict fidelity to duty and following the mandate of the American people, they have been absorbed in the building of a law for the relief of the people of the United States. And to-day we have before us the magnificent fruits of their labors.

And just here let me say that I was somewhat amazed to hear from one source and another that the notion existed that the citrus-fruit States, Florida being one of them, were willing to traffic in the principles of the Democratic Party for the benefit of their particular industries. If such an idea is prevalent in this Congress, speaking for the rank and file of the Democrats of Florida, or at least of my district, I unhesitatingly say that our people will not sacrifice, and do not desire to sacrifice, a fundamental principle of democracy, however great the reward might be. In the making of a tariff bill there must be yielding here and yielding there that the finished product may be consistent and equitable, and the people that I represent are willing to stand by a measure, without selfish contention, which offers relief to millions of the American people.

The American people are an intelligent people. It is a happy situation for our country that those who serve the Nation in the making and in the execution of her laws are directly responsible to the people themselves. It is a happier situation that that responsibility is not due to one class of the people but to all the people, from the humblest citizen who may live in a hut to the greatest and richest who may dwell in a castle. So, in the course of time, the people, whose country this is, saw the deception of the Republican Party and learned that that party had heedlessly ignored solemn pledges and failed in the performance of plain duties. And in their might they registered their protest in the ballot box and drove from power the party that had plundered them by excessive tariff taxation. As a result of the people's wrath to-day at both ends of the Capitol and at the White House Democrats sit in the seats of the mighty to legislate for the real good of the whole people. We shall not deceive them, but, on the contrary, we shall heed their call and ere the passing of many more days a blighting tariff law will be clipped from our statutes and in its stead will be found the equitable measure which we here espouse.

I cherish the hope that the time will come in this country when there shall be no duty levied on a single article necessary to human existence. The levying of a tax for the protection of any business or industry is wholly indefensible and manifestly wrong. A business that can not thrive without having the arm of the Government to support it by tariff duties should perish. Why do I say this? Because the levying of tariff duties to support an industry is the forcing of the consumer—the farmer, the laboring man, who are not protected—to buy the necessaries of life in the market of the highest price instead of the market of the lowest price.

This is unnatural, unjust, and wholly wrong. The Republican Party since its inception has laid the heavy hand of taxation upon millions of the American people for the benefit of the great manufacturers and big business interests, and the result has been the fleecing of the poor man's pocket from early morning to night. Every cent exacted by the exorbitant rates of the Republican Payne tariff bill has been wrung from the purse of those who are least able to bear it.

Let us hope that we are at the dawn of a better day. To the American people we say have patience. The iniquitous legislation of the Republican Party can not be swept away in a day, because it has been in the building for many years. As a sick man can not be cured in a day, so also the ills of a Nation can not be vanquished as by magic. The course of treatment the Democratic Party has prescribed will ere long bring us back to happiness and vigor. The passage of the pending measure means the awakening and quickening of competition and thrift in our commercial life and equality of opportunity for the struggling men and women of the Nation.

And in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me lift the veil that clouds the future and, penetrating into the to-morrow, predict that when this bill becomes the law of the land it will be the beginning of a better day of prosperity and happiness, which will endure for many years to come; and, too, that it will make the name of the distinguished and talented gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] immortal in American history.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEWIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEWIS] is recognized.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, without fear of successful contradiction I make the statement that the progressive movement, which swept the old Keystone State in the primaries of 1912 and at the general election in November of that year, was a wonderful feat, made possible of accomplishment by reason of the disgust of the public with old abuses and the tyranny of political bosses. It was a rebuke not to the Republican Party but to the bosses and representatives of special interests.

Year after year, as conventions were held in Pennsylvania, we as delegates were sent to the State capital, sat there, at times were wined and dined, and at times were asking ourselves the question: "Why don't we vote? Who are we going to vote for?" Invariably we were told: "The slate has not been made. Our leader, our peerless leader, will tell you in good time whom you are to vote for." And then we voted for our peerless leader's selections, and went back to our homes again.

We got tired of that in Pennsylvania, and the people of Pennsylvania repudiated those tactics. So tyrannous did the political machines become in our State that the bosses in both parties worked in harmony, so that the voter had no voice in the nomination or election of candidates for public office. The "machine," composed of Republican and Democratic leaders, controlled the conventions of both parties and named the tickets.

This condition was a powerful factor in the dissatisfaction that led to the revolt and political revolution in our State, and the Progressives, known as the Washington Party, early and late voiced the fundamental aspirations of all good and earnest men and women of all parties for a higher tone in public life, for public servants more truly representative of the higher aims of the people, for honesty in public life, for efficiency, and for freedom from the trammels of "interests" seeking unjust privileges, for a government and administration that shall be instinct with the conscience and genuine patriotism of the best in America. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I come as a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania as a Progressive, not only because I am a believer in better government, in social betterment, in government by the people and not by machines and bosses, but also because the sturdy sons of the old Keystone State, by a vote of 608,000 and a plurality of more than 250,000, have sent me here to assist in so revising the machinery of the Government that the will of the majority may surely find expression in law, believing that the rights and liberties of every individual citizen are safer in the hands of the majority of the people than in the hands of any interested minority.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in revising the machinery of the Government, I believe Representatives of all political parties will agree with me that the rights and interests of the industrial workers should be adequately protected in addition to the protection and encouragement in every possible way of business, whether it be big business or small business, honestly conducted.

I come from a section of the State that is remarkable. Lehigh County, at Summit Hill, on its northern border, is the beginning of the anthracite coal district. In its northern portion, at Slatington, it has the slate industry. A few miles below, at Egypt, is the largest cement district of the world. Two miles below that, at City Line, is the limestone formation. Then comes the city of Allentown, with all its diversified industries. To the west and north of the city of Allentown lie the hematite ore mines, and 5 miles south of the city of Allentown are the mines of the Bethlehem Zinc Co.

There is not anywhere a county that is richer in its mineral products, and our agricultural products are the pride of our State. Our industries in the city of Allentown are principally the manufacture of iron, steel, shoes, silk, furniture, cigars, wire and nails, automobiles, knitting mills, and so on. Our people there are generally employed, contented, happy, and prosperous; and I want to say to you, gentlemen, that if this tariff bill is passed, I invite you all in a year from its passage to that beautiful valley, and you will find the desolation it has caused. [Applause on the Republican side.]

From the brief description I have given of only a very small county in the State of Pennsylvania, you can infer we are vitally interested in the outcome of this tariff legislation. You have heard how the Democratic Party intends to better conditions by passing a bill in the preparation of which there has been absolutely no difference of method from that followed by the Republicans in the preparation of their tariff measures. No public information has been obtainable outside of the reports of the perfunctory hearings of the Ways and Means Committee. The real information upon which the bill has been written has been obtained by correspondence and by private conferences, not known to the House nor is it obtainable by Members of the House.

The same old methods have been employed in the same old way. Your leader, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], is indeed a general. He reminds me of an old friend of my boyhood days. We were raised, we boys, in an Irish district. There was a man there by the name of Capt. O'Donnell. He was a little more advanced in his ideas and had perhaps the benefits of a better education than the other old Irishmen of that section. An annual St. Patrick's Day parade was held there, and invariably, as the years rolled on, Capt. O'Donnell sent out his annual message calling a meeting in the basement of Campbell's store. The old Irishmen met there, and Capt. O'Donnell walked in in all his glory and he would say: "Gintlemen, this mating is called for the purpose of ilicting a chairman of this mating. It is moved and seconded, gintlemen, that Capt. O'Donnell act as chairman of this mating. I thank yez for the honor, and the motion is carried." [Laughter.] Then he would add: "It is in order now, gintlemen, for some one to act as marshal of the St. Patrick's Day parade and to make all the arrangemints. It is moved and seconded that Capt. O'Donnell act as marshal of the parade and make all the arrangemints. The motion is carried, gintlemen, and I thank yez for the honor, and the mating is now adjourned." [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we in Pennsylvania are largely protectionists; and why? Because we claim that a protective tariff which permits of goods being manufactured in this country, while it may temporarily raise the price of the goods, will ultimately tend to reduce prices by reason of the fact that competition will bring profits to a normal condition, so that if profits are excessive capital and labor will gravitate toward the industry which yields an excessive profit, and competition will therefore bring prices to the average of profit enjoyed in any industry. This should be the outcome of a protective tariff; but if a manufacturer, by reason of the ownership of a patent or other artificial advantages, is enabled to prevent competition his profits will be excessive.

An analysis of the protected industries which have proved exceptionally profitable will disclose the fact that the use of patented machinery, appliances, or methods, or the ownership of coal or mineral lands are the chief assets of the manufacturer receiving an excessive profit, because they give him a monopoly.

The protectionists' strength in the United States has been due largely to the fact that access to land has been easy, hence labor and capital have been high priced, and a protective tariff has been necessary to enable wages to be paid and capital to be reimbursed in sufficient degree to attract labor and capital to the manufacturing pursuits. In older communities, where labor is cheap and capital plenty—and consequently cheap—the production of articles in which labor and capital are the larger elements can be carried on much more economically than in the United States or any new country, and in order to build up manufacturing industries a protective tariff is essential in order that capital and labor may be induced to engage in the manufacturing pursuits.

Now, what is the best means to adopt to obtain the fullest information, to prevent logrolling, and to eliminate politics in dealing with the tariff questions?

This year's experience points more clearly than any that has gone before the necessity for a tariff commission—a great, permanent, authoritative, confidence-commanding, power-wielding establishment which shall be at all times in touch with trade and industry, which shall have the power, preferably, actually to fix rates of duty, just as the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish and to change railroad rates.

I am firmly convinced that the Progressive Party is right in favoring the creation of a permanent, independent, nonpartisan, expert tariff commission, and I believe that the sensible men of this country will sooner or later place their stamp of approval upon this, the only fair and honest solution of the tariff problem which offers a means toward an admirable end, without disrupting our form of government or imperiling our most sacred traditions. [Applause.]

And now, in conclusion, a word to my Republican friends. You may sneer and jeer, but you will get rid of the Progressive Party the day you abandon the automobile and return to the ox cart. It is as much a part of the age as the flying machine, the telephone, or wireless telegraphy. The new alignment, long on the way, is here at last. Recognition of this fact will prevent you from making serious mistakes, especially if you happen to be a politician. A party that can poll in its first contest more votes than the party that has been dominant in the Nation for 50 years has surely come to stay.

Recognize this fact and adjust yourself to the new order or the procession will leave you far behind. Take your position for or against the new party, but as a Republican you belong to the "third party." The Progressive Party is not the result of a split, but a birth. Get this idea fixed firmly in your minds.

We have come to stay, and in a single year the principles of right, of equity, and of justice, which are the fundamental doctrines of the Progressive Party, have made a greater advance in the United States than in all the other years of its history combined.

Our faces are indeed turned to the morning, and the sun of success is sure to rise.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, for the reason that some of the leading industries of the State which I have the honor to represent are vitally affected by this bill I desire briefly to be heard. I feel that on account of the peculiar and unique relations of my State to the Democratic Party that its interests and welfare are entitled to more than a perfunctory hearing by that party.

There are promises and promises; there are pledges and pledges. There is the pledge of the Republican members of the Oregon Legislature to vote for the popular choice for United States Senator; that pledge has never been violated. Then there is the trustless Carthagenian pledge, which has made the term "Punic faith" a byword, an expression of reproach and infamy a synonym for all which is false, faithless, and unreliable. Then there is the pledge of the Democratic platform for "legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry." If this bill passes in its present form, "Punic faith" in my State will become a sweet phrase, a euphemism, in comparison with this manifestation of Democratic faith, pledges, and performance.

The State of Oregon is an overwhelmingly Republican State. Among its various industries and activities it is especially noted for two valued crops, both of which may be disastrously affected by the passage of this bill in its present form through the Sixty-third Congress. One of these great crops, which we Republicans are proud of and desirous of preserving for the State and Nation and which the promises and pledges of both your platform and your President gave us assurance would not be injured by the proposed Democratic tariff changes, is the wool crop. The other crop to which I have reference and which may also be disastrously affected by the final passage of this bill, and which crop for its continuance needs and has every right to expect the utmost concern, encouragement, and fostering care from the majority in this body, instead of the blight and mildew you seem determined to visit upon it through the passage of this bill, is the quadrennial crop of Oregon's Democratic Senators.

I stated awhile ago that there are promises and promises, pledges and pledges—so there are. I stated that Oregon was an overwhelmingly Republican State—so it is, and has been for two decades past, and so have been its legislatures. And it is because the Republican Party of the State of Oregon and the Republican members of its State legislature have been true to their promises and have spurned with scorn and righteous indignation the faintest hint or suggestion of disloyalty or repudiation of those pledges given to the people, pledges no more solemn or binding, Mr. Chairman, than the pledges of your platform and your President "that no legitimate industry would be injured by your tariff policy." I say on account of this unshaken fidelity of the Republican Party of my State this quadrennial crop of Democratic Senators has sprung up, has bloomed, and has been harvested, and by virtue of this harvest you now have a safe working majority on the other side of the Capitol in the persons of the two Oregon Senators, who, I am pleased to attest, grace their positions in that distinguished body. They were elected by Republican legislators who refused to repudiate their pledges, who refused to be recreant to their pledges, and, in the case of the senior Senator, their loyalty to their pledges was encouraged by a Republican President. I know, and I say it without egotism or desire for self-exploitation, for I had the honor at that time of being a member of the Oregon Senate.

Then and there, Mr. Chairman, as now and here, the political neologist found or suggested new meanings and definitions for words, sophistry as now furnished plausible reasons concerning what was "legitimate" and what was not; cupidity and avarice were appealed to; office, preferments, and committee appointments also failed to seduce. But these blandishments were of no avail. All terrors were then invoked to induce members to betray platform and pledges, save and except that terror which here seems most effectual—the fiat of King Caucus. But the honor of those Republican legislators of Oregon was threat proof as well as bribe proof. Each one voted for the Democratic candidate for United States Senator because he had pledged his word that he would vote for the candidate receiving the largest popular vote. Their pledge was not legally binding; it was argued that it was not "legitimate," but they considered it morally binding. It was no more morally binding than your pledges to injure no "legitimate" industry.

Do you dare follow the "Oregon trail"?

On your platform and presidential candidate's pledge, that no "legitimate" industry should be injured by your tariff legislation, your senatorial candidate, now a Member of the other Chamber and also Oregon's senior Senator, canvassed the great sheep-raising districts of eastern Oregon, quieting the apprehension of the woolgrower with iterations and reiterations of that then plain and unambiguous Democratic pledge—that pledge now grown so technical, abstruse, and recondite, a veritable Delphic oracle of hidden meaning when now interpreted, unraveled, and expounded in the light of the "Punic faith" of the philologists of the Ways and Means Committee.

If you desire to preserve that quadrennial crop, I advise you not to handicap your candidates for reelection with such a subterfuge, such chicanery, such a puerile plea for your "Punic faith" as "that the wool and sheep industry of Oregon is not a legitimate industry," such as you promised not to injure. If I mistake not the character of the gentlemen—and I feel from my individual association with them that I do not—they will not stultify themselves by carrying back such a pusillanimous excuse or message to Oregon. A dispensation to violate party pledges, coming from the casuists of the caucus, will absolve no one under the "Oregon system."

The sheepmen of my district are at a loss to know why their great industry is classed among illegitimate industries, why bastardy proceedings are visited upon it, why it deserves the appellation of filius nullius. It may be because he who has been called putative father of Democracy thought so much of the sheep industry and was so anxious to foster and encourage woolgrowing that in 1809, in violation of the laws of Spain, he smuggled a few Merino sheep out of Spain, two of which he later owned. And it is this Merino brand which is the essential and predominant strain of sheep in the great wool-raising States. The sheep industry is one of the great and legitimate industries of the Nation.

S. W. McClure, secretary of the National Woolgrowers' Association, shows that at the last census the sheep of the Nation were worth $231,000,000; that the land and equipment needed to maintain these flocks represent an investment of $350,000,000, representing a total investment of $581,000,000. The census shows sheep on 610,000 farms. The industry pays for labor $47,580,000 each year. It pays yearly for forage $23,400,000; taxes on sheep alone, $2,600,000 per annum; freight on wool is annually $4,000,000. The actual cost of maintaining the 52,000,000 sheep in this country is $137,000,000. Surely such an industry can not be the subject of the radical treatment you propose to administer without the most disastrous and radical consequences.

The Tariff Board in its report shows that it costs 11 cents a pound to raise wool in the western part of the United States and 9¼ cents in the entire country. That in the great wool-producing sections of South America the cost is only 4 or 5 cents. That in Australia, our future competitor if this bill passes, the cost is only a few cents a pound on wool. The labor cost in the United States per sheep is 82 cents, against 7 cents in Australia. The average forage cost here is 45 cents, in Australia 8 cents. Our western interest rates range from 8 to 10 per cent, in Australia it is 5 per cent. All of which demonstrates that we can not compete with Australia in the production of wool on a free-trade basis, and the consequence will be that our wool raisers in a large measure will have to abandon the industry and liquidate their indebtedness the best they can.

What are we offered to compensate us for the prospective destruction of this industry? Cheaper clothing? During the campaign last fall some of the free-trade orators talked glibly about the great reduction in the price of clothing that would follow free wool, but on Wednesday the majority leader, whose name dignifies this bill, informed us that no great reduction need be expected by the passage of this bill. Let us see just what great boon we need expect in the way of cheaper clothing to compensate us for the destruction of the sheep industry by free wool.

Dr. S. W. McClure, on behalf of the woolgrower, argues that it requires 3½ yards of cloth to make the average man's suit; that to make this 3½ yards of cloth it takes 3¼ pounds of scoured wool; for all the wool in this suit the wool raiser only receives $1.72; the tariff has advanced this suit 48 cents, according to the woolgrower's estimate. And he asks, would your storekeeper who retails this suit for $25 or $30 sell it to you for 48 cents less with wool on the free list?

Let us examine the testimony of the free-trade expert concerning the question of the reduced price of clothing under free-trade wool. Last Wednesday a gentleman on the Democratic side of the aisle asked to have printed as a public document an article in the April number of the North American Review, written by Thomas W. Page, the Democratic member of the Tariff Board. The article in question advocates free wool, and the gentleman certainly has no motive to give the wool raiser any of the best of it, for his article abounds with adverse comments on the industry. He states that it requires 9½ pounds of raw wool—meaning in the grease—to produce a $25 suit of clothes, and he adds:

> The most ardent advocate of tariff reduction could not expect the removal of the duty to reduce the sum by more than the whole amount of the duty—that is, $1.05.

So we have the protectionist telling us that free wool can only reduce the price 48 cents and the free trader telling us that the price can only be reduced $1.05 under free trade. Whichever figure you take it is evident that the prospective reduction in clothing due to free wool is a slight compensation for the financial ruin of the sheepman. Furthermore, this alleged duty of $1.05 is based on the assumption that this is the real protective duty which the wool raiser receives and that consequently the 9½ pounds of unscoured wool is increased in price to the wool raiser by that sum. But this is actually not the case, and I shall tell you why it is only the apparent duty, not the real duty. The actual duty or protection which the woolgrower receives is not measured by the duty on wool in the grease, but by the duty on the scoured pound, which is 33 cents, based on the assumption that wool shrinks 66⅔ per cent. If all wool shrank 66⅔ per cent, then in every 100 pounds of wool in the grease on which the duty is 11 cents per pound, or $11 for the 100 pounds, the purchaser of imported wools would get for his $11 only 33⅓ pounds net, or scoured wool increased in price to him by the cost of the duty of 33 cents per scoured pound. But the assumption that all wools shrink 66⅔ per cent is no longer true and has not been true for more than 20 years. The average shrinkage of the Australian and South American wools which reach our markets is 48 per cent; therefore for every 100 pounds of such wool on which the duty at 11 cents per pound is $11 the purchaser gets 52 pounds of scoured wool instead of 33⅓ pounds, which the law contemplated he should get. And this he gets at the rate of 21 cents per pound instead of 33 cents, and by the difference between 21 and 33 cents is the woolgrower's apparent duty lessened upon the scoured pound. On some light-shrinking wools the grower's protection is lowered considerably more than in the example which I have given. It is this variance in the shrinkage of different wools which has led the woolgrower to advocate a specific duty based on the scoured content of wool—fair and just to all woolgrowers and all manufacturers.

To demonstrate that the apprehensions of the woolgrowers are not groundless we need not refer to the condition of the industry following the Wilson bill, but let us refer to page 330 of the Tariff Board's report.

In Oregon the board investigated the receipts and expenditures on 229,713 sheep, and ascertained that the receipts from wool at 14 cents per pound on the 1,678,993 pounds of wool sheared were $237,000.35; from other sources, such as mutton, etc., the receipts were $272,476.51; that the total receipts were $509,476.86; that the total expense of running the sheep was $456,320.05—leaving a profit of $53,156.81. Bear in mind that this profit was with wool at 14 cents per pound, which amounted to $237,000.35. Where would these profits be under free wool with wool selling at 10 cents per pound, which is certainly a modest estimate for the price of wool on a free basis, for following the Wilson bill it sold as low as 7 cents?

Then, instead of $237,000.35 for the wool, we would have $167,899.30, a difference of $69,101.15, and instead of a profit of $53,156 we would find a loss on the 229,713 sheep of $15,944.34. This may be taken as a fair example of the effect to be expected in other States from the enactment of this bill into a law.

For this ruin and destruction of the wool industry how are we to be compensated? With a doubtful reduction of between 48 cents and $1.05 on our clothing. Mr. Page, in that article in the April number of the North American Review, adds another compensation. He tells us:

> The saving would loom large in the political addresses of those who save the country, but so widely distributed that the share of the individual consumer would hardly arouse much enthusiasm and the real benefit forgotten in the disappointment that it was less than expected.

So for thunder for that political address Democratic brethren from woolgrowing States are willing to bow to the orders of the caucus.

The sheep and wool industry in my State is an important one. It is one of the legitimate industries which the Democratic platform assured us would not be injured by their tariff legislation. It is not an industry controlled by a trust or monopoly.

It is an industry built up by honored and industrious men, many of whom in their early life suffered untold privations and hardships to get a start in the business. The importance of the industry in Oregon is shown by the following report issued by the Oregon board of sheep commissioners for the twenty-seventh legislative assembly of the State:

I quote from the report the following:

> The importance of the sheep industry in this State is best comprehended when it is called to your attention that sheep are reported to be raised on 6,318 farms, or 14 per cent of all the farms in the State are devoted to the propagation of sheep. While the census shows 6,318 farms as connected with the raising of sheep, it is unfair to presume that there are not more than that number of men engaged in the sheep industry. On many of these farms and ranches several owners are in partnership, and it would be only just to approximate that there were 10,000 sheep owners in Oregon. These 10,000 owners may be estimated to have on the average families of 4 members each, and gives us 40,000 people within the State who are more or less dependent on the sheep industry. This is a most creditable showing for the industry, but it is not all, for in gathering statistics the Tariff Board found that in this State the range flockmaster employs for the entire year an average of 1 laborer for each 400 sheep owned. Assuming that in eastern Oregon there are 2,225,000 sheep and 1 man is employed for each 400 sheep, this would increase the number of citizens of our State intimately connected with the sheep industry to 45,562, and estimating that 1 in each 6 of these laborers is married and has a family of 4, then we have 49,278 people in Oregon having a "bread-and-butter" interest in our sheep industry. This is a large per cent of the rural population of our State and should indicate to people that the sheep industry of Oregon is one of the greatest assets to our prosperous Commonwealth. The collection of data for the Tariff Board and our report shows that the Oregn flockmaster pays on an average of $1 per head to labor for all sheep he owns. He must bear in mind that the laborer on the sheep ranch is the best paid agricultural laborer in the State. These herders and camp tenders receive from $40 to $60 a month and their board. If we have 2,225,000 sheep in eastern Oregon, then the sheep industry of this State pays to eastern Oregon labor $1 for each sheep in this district, or $2,225,000. Western Oregon possibly runs sheep at an even greater expense, in so far as labor is concerned, as it is generally conceded that large enterprises are in a position to get larger returns from its labor. We might conservatively estimate that western Oregon pays to labor for the care of her 300,000 sheep something like $400,000. This amount added to the money paid to eastern Oregon labor swells the total to the sum of $2,625,000. This amount relates solely to the labor caring for sheep and does not in any way include the clerk in the store, the banker, the employee of the railroad, and a score of other employees more or less dependent on the sheep industry. It is difficult to determine the exact amount of money that the sheep industry brings to the State, as the amounts vary from year to year. It might be reasonably estimated as great as $8,000,000 during the banner years. This is a large sum of money, but its importance is more appreciated when we remember that it is profit or income that is returned from the waste places of the State. It represents an amount of money that has been gleaned from the uninhabitable desert and the thickets of our mountains, and if not made use of by sheep grazing would probably gradually undergo decay or form tinder for our forest fires. The valuation of the sheep and the equipment necessary to run the same in the State of Oregon may be conservatively placed at $32,000,000, divided as follows: Our 2,196,560 sheep of eastern Oregon on December 1 will be worth $3.75 per head, making a total of $8,236,100. The 255,354 sheep of western Oregon are worth $5 per head, making a sum of $1,276,770. The property holdings necessary to run 2,000 sheep in eastern Oregon are estimated at $8,000 per band of sheep, making a sum of estimated property holdings for the running of sheep in eastern Oregon of $16,784,000. The sheep of western Oregon require on the average property holdings to the value of $20 per head, thus aggregating $7,660,620 in this section of the State. The grand total covering the valuation of sheep in the State and the equipment necessary to run them reaches the enormous sum of $32,580,720.

I am not willing to vote for a bill which will certainly cripple and injure this important industry of my district and State, for a bill which grants a certain measure of protection to the sugar industry and the woolen manufacturer, but discriminates against the wool raiser of my State and Nation. My Democratic friends of this House, do not delude yourselves with the idea that you can return and justify yourselves before an indignant constituency with the excuse or the pretense that you have battled for your State's interests with blank cartridges and tin swords in the sham battles of the secret caucus. The real firing line is here on this floor—the real blows are given and taken here. Emulate the Senator from Louisiana. If the sand in your craw is lacking, fill it with that Louisiana sugar; it has nerved the Senators from Louisiana in their fight and got for their sugar-growing constituents a respite or stay of execution at least long enough to enable them to write a last will and testament and decently settle earthly affairs before entire dissolution shall take place. A little backbone might secure for the sheepman a like reprieve.

In this secret caucus you find yourselves like the Horatii of old separately disembowled; or, as the gentleman from Wyoming put it, "slain in detachment." We invite you to stand shoulder to shoulder on this floor with both Progressive and Republican Parties for a reasonable tariff reduction that shall not entirely annihilate the industries of our respective States.

We all know the committee appointments have been withheld awaiting the passage of this bill. Of course, this was not to whip insurgent Members of the majority into line. Oh, no. No one in his own opinion is ever coerced. Even gallant Jack Falstaff would deny such an impeachment. But a few days ago we heard—echoing through the inspired caucus leak—your tom-toms and war songs in defense of legitimate industries. But the echoes of those songs and tom-toms were only meant to tickle the ears at home. Those echoes have died away. Now you are singing another song. It is the song of Sir Joseph in Pinafore, especially arranged by the gentleman from Alabama—Director UNDERWOOD—for the benefit of wavering Members:

"I always voted at the caucus call
And never thought of thinking for myself at all;"
I thought so little they rewarded me—
How?
By making me ruler of the queen's navee?
No;
By giving me a place on the committee.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I would not have presumed upon the patience of this body to listen to me even for this limited time, inasmuch as I am a new Member on this floor, were it not for the fact that I feel most emphatically that the interests of 200,000 people in my State, which have been intrusted to my protection in this body so far as I am able to protect them, are endangered.

This pending tariff bill is a deliberate blow at the agricultural sections of this country in a studied political appeal to the laboring classes in the cities. In the report of the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee on this bill it is said: "In the effort to relieve the consumer and to mitigate the high and rising cost of living Schedule G, which deals with agricultural products, has been thoroughly revised and important reductions have been made." By "consumers," I understand, are not meant those who consume without producing anything, because if there be any such class it is not entitled to any consideration at our hands. But I understand that gentlemen on the other side mean by "consumers" the laboring men in the cities of this country. This is an attempt to array the voters of the cities against the farming communities and to build up prosperous cities out of the impoverishment of the farmers. That is a very uncertain foundation upon which to build the prosperity of any country. The laboring men in the cities can not afford any program of that kind. In my judgment the prosperity of one class of our people contributes to and helps the prosperity of every other class. When prosperity exists it must necessarily be passed around, and it has been passed around. During the past few years the farmers have prospered as they never prospered before in the history of our country. At the same time the consuming classes in the cities have prospered as never before, notwithstanding the high cost of living. Labor has been in active demand, wages have improved, the hours of labor have been shortened, and the conditions surrounding the laborer have constantly been bettered. The laborer, as a rule, has had a better living and has had more of his wages left for the proverbial rainy day. The savings-bank deposits come largely from the wage earners. Following the depression of 1907 these deposits fell to $3,660,553,945. Then note the constant advance, notwithstanding living costs:

1910	4,070,486,246
1911	4,212,583,598
1912	4,451,818,523

As the farmers find an improved market for their products and secure better prices therefor they improve their standard of living, buy more farm tools, buggies, pianos, automobiles, clothing, and all the manufactured products. Thereby is the demand for these products improved, and the manufacturer shares in the farmer's prosperity. The demand for manufactured products increasing, the demand for labor increases and wages rise. As labor finds steady employment at improved wages, its standard of living is raised, and it buys more of the products of the farm and the factory. The farmer, the laborer, the manufacturer, these constitute a trio who share together their common prosperity. Any economic plan which seeks to shut out the farmer from his fair share of this prosperity will bring disaster rather than profit to the others.

In this bill the products of the farm are thrown into a free-trade market to meet the unrestrained competition of the world. Where this is not done in fact it is done in effect. If the duty is not entirely removed it is greatly reduced. This is to redeem your pledge to reduce the cost of living for the city laborer. But everyone of you know that the bulk of the increase of the cost of living is not caused by the increase in the prices the farmer receives, but by a multitude of other causes.

Before election last fall the continuous contention of the Democratic Party and its candidate for President was that the tariff is responsible for the high cost of living. No other reason was assigned by them; but the Republicans contended that the tariff had little to do with it—that there was a scarcity of farm produce and especially of meats. But no; the Democrats insisted that the tariff was the sole cause; but now that the election is over, the Democratic Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, in a report made recently, shows conclusively that the production of meats in the United States has fallen off 30 per cent in the last six years, while the population has increased 11 per cent in the same time.

It is your plan to reduce the price of farm products to the extent of the reductions you make in the tariffs on these articles. This reduction alone will bring no substantial relief to the city dweller, but for the farmer it spells ruin. The reductions you propose in the values of the chief farm products of my district would cost the farmers of my district above $6,000,000, without including sugar beets, as is shown by the following comparisons between the Payne and Underwood bills:

And, as I have said, city and country are interdependent for prosperity. Take, for example, the protection on automobiles, which has not been seriously disturbed in this bill. In many cities where the labor market has been made strong and healthy and active by reason of the manufacture of automobiles, this bill will strike at their prosperity because, while it does not vitally affect the protection given to the manufacture of automobiles, it does affect the market for them. In my country farmers are able to buy automobiles to use them in their business and to enjoy the recreation they afford.

But if you pass this bill and cripple their buying powers, as you will, the market for automobiles will be affected, and the prosperity of the laboring men in the cities where automobiles are manufactured will be seriously injured. That illustration could be duplicated in many other cases. The man in the city who works for a day's wages can not afford this kind of a program.

You say you are not going to disturb any "legitimate industry," and still you expressly deny protection to industries which are producing things we need, which save us from monopolistic robbery, which are making multitudes happy and great sections of this country prosperous. For example, you propose free sugar. Free sugar means the end of the sugar-beet industry in this country.

And the sugar industry is a legitimate industry. The total production of sugar beets in my district, including five counties, as shown in the census of 1900, was only 18,925 tons per annum, but in 10 years under the protective tariff policy we increased that production to 157,000 tons per annum, and I believe the limit would not yet be reached were it not for the action of this Democratic majority.

Has this been for the general advantage of consumers? Dr. Wiley, Democrat, but impartial, said in the Hardwick hearings that our beet-sugar industry protects American consumers from the greed of the refiners. Have the farmers profited from this industry? Huron County produced 6,237 tons of beets in 1899 and 96,330 tons in 1909. The farm lands of Huron County in the same period increased in value from $7,462,000 to $14,338,000.

In the past 10 years of Republican prosperity farm values in my district have increased over $22,000,000, the value of their domestic animals has nearly doubled, the value of their farm buildings has nearly doubled, their purchases of the products of the cities have more than doubled. Hence the products of the factories have found ready market, and as a result the laboring men in the cities have received a constantly increasing wage and shorter hours. The city which derives its prosperity from the country will suffer when the farmer suffers. The city laborer will suffer with his country cousin.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the people at the election last fall commissioned the Democratic Party to administer the affairs of this great Nation, and in pursuance of that mandate both the executive and legislative departments of this Government passed into control of our party on the 4th day of last March. One of the first duties named under this new responsibility is the revision of the tariff downward. This great economic question demands the most serious consideration doubtless of any proposition with which we are required to deal. The bill now under consideration fairly presents the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue, and hence meets practically our pledges to the American people and such a revision as they indorsed at the ballot box. [Applause.] We are meeting the question without equivocation and in the spirit required by the condition of the times.

Four years ago the Republican Party was empowered by the people to revise the tariff downward and was unfaithful to its pledges made before the election. When it took up the execution of its work it disregarded its promises, violated its instructions, yielded to the wishes of the beneficiaries, and revised it upward. For this breach of plighted faith, for this failure of the redemption of its public promises, the people deceived thereby administered their rebuke and turned it out of power. The passage of the Payne bill four years ago was the crowning effort of legislative greed and legislative favoritism. It was protection run mad. The Republican Party, intoxicated by its long lease of power, assumed it could ignore any and all demands of the people and survive all opposition, and therefore enacted the Payne bill as a reward to the tariff barons for their liberal contributions to their campaign fund. It was a monstrosity, and in all the four years which have passed since its enactment scarcely a man can be found who has the courage to defend it before a public audience anywhere in the United States. From its sponsors it provoked silence and from the public universal disgust. [Applause.]

We are presenting to the country a bill that recognizes the rights of all classes of our people, and one which will not cripple nor destroy the business of any, but will foster the prosperity of our country, founded upon a legitimate basis and conducted upon fairness and justice. The Democratic Party is a constructive party, desirous of promoting all legitimate business and the advancement of the best interests of the great majority of the people, but it is unwilling now and ever has been hostile to any public policy which gives one class a privilege, of advantage to a favored few, which constitutes an unnecessary burden to be borne by the many and which is detrimental to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill proposes to equalize burdens and assist the ultimate consumers as well as the manufacturers of the country. Its object is not to confine prosperity to a favored few, but to pass it around, make it the common heritage of all. It recognizes the wants of the consumers and regards their consideration of just as much importance as the producers. In short, its object is the establishment of a just regard for the welfare of both the producer and consumer.

Too long, Mr. Chairman, much too long, has the welfare of the consumers of this country been ignored in the enactment of tariff legislation. Far too long, also, has it been the custom in the preparation of tariff measures to permit the beneficiaries of tariff legislation to write the schedules and fix the amount of duties. In this measure that right has been absolutely denied. It has been assailed on the floor of this House by the advocates of the high protective system as a destructive measure, one that will shut down factories, reduce wages, and turn labor out of employment. If this prophecy be true, then it is indefensible and ought not to become a law, but for all who make the prediction of such results it is safe to say they would make the same predictions if any reductions at all were made of existing duties. They always sound the old alarm, the "calamity howl." It is a stereotyped expression with them, coined for the express purpose, and in the last few years it has been made to do overtime.

The business men of the country do not so regard it, because legitimate business indorses it; the independent press of the country does not so consider it, because the independent press of the country approves it; the ultimate consumers all over the country are urging its immediate passage because it assures them relief; hence this assault upon it is only made by the standpat Republicans, the high priests of protection, who desire to uphold and maintain special privileges in this country.

Legitimate industry will thrive under it, but predatory wealth we concede will suffer, as it should do. Its purpose is to dispense with much of the legislative profit in these great protected industries and place them upon a competitive basis for profit earning, a most wholesome purpose, where the use of wits shall be installed for business success and not legislative guaranty. Could any fair-minded person object to this, and if he did what support could he hope to receive? What sympathy could he arouse? It is a common plea for the owners of protected industry to make that they can not operate if duties are reduced, and they will be forced to shut down and abandon business. This complaint has long since become chronic, and is now only a matter of form. Four years ago the great shoe industry told the public that if they were given free hides they could shoe the world and needed no protection, but as soon as Congress decided to place hides on the free list, they demanded a duty of 10 per cent on their products and got it. It was bad faith on their part, an act of perfidy, yet these great captains of industry perpetrated this shameful bunko game on the public in order to secure an increase of their special privilege. Did they need this protection to encourage infant industry? We can shoe the world, and are doing it. We not only supply the consumption at home but in addition we make annually, pay the freight to foreign countries, and sell $12,000,000 worth of boots and shoes. We shut out all competition at home, and after paying transportation charges to foreign countries sell there cheaper than to our own people at home and undersell the foreign manufacturers in their own countries. Does any fair-minded, reasonable person believe this great industry needs protection, that it should be empowered by legislation to plunder the American consumer longer? If so, upon what hypothesis does he predicate his belief? It has been the object of governmental bounty long enough, and is now, we confidently submit, fully strong enough to support itself in the open markets of the world.

It is contended by the great woolen industry that its enormously high rates of duty should not be reduced, in face of the fact that they are so outrageously high, so unjustifiable, that no man in all the broad land can be found who will come out in the open and defend them. Even President Taft, when he made his swing around the circle in 1909, attempting to appease the wrath of the American people poured out upon his party for the passage of the Payne bill, declared the woolen schedule was indefensible. This declaration has always been taken as true by common consent. What has this schedule done for this industry? The American Woolen Co. was formed about 1900 by the purchase of 34 plants over the country and formed into one company, enough to dominate the price and production of the entire commodity in the United States. It could have had no other object. The value of the entire combination was $25,000,000. It added no outside capital to the business, it paid dividends of 7 per cent each year after its organization, and after 10 years its property, at a liberal valuation, was $419,000,000. This is the value fixed by the company in its reports to the public departments. It prospered, we all admit, reasonably well. It proved a most valuable investment to those fortunate enough to hold some of its stock. Protection was a good thing for it. The privilege granted it by the extravagant tariff schedules we all say fully protected it. The combination composed by it dictated the price in this country of all woolen and worsted productions. Now, does not the most ardent protectionist on this floor feel that he owes a duty to the 93,000,000 of people in this country of reducing the duties on woolen products as low as provided for in this bill? Does not every man with the milk of human kindness in his heart feel that the ultimate consumers of this country in the consideration of this schedule are entitled to recognition and should be regarded with as much favor as the owners of this great industry, who have thrived magnificently because of the special privilege granted them by the generosity of the Republican Party? By what standard of public regard is one to be protected, avarice appeased, that should not be the right of the other? It is asserted here that free wool will blight the sheep industry of this country. Sheep are protected, but wool is on the free list by the provisions of this measure. What has been blighting the wool industry under the highest tariff laws the country has ever known, the Dingley and Payne laws? Will some one answer?

Silence alone is the only response to this question. The Government statistics show that in 1903 while the Dingley law was in force we had in this country 63,964,876 sheep and in 1905, 45,170,423. The tariff was not changed; it was the highest ever known. What caused this great depreciation in number. Again, in 1912, last year we had only 52,362,000 sheep, nearly 12,000,000 less than in 1903. How can this decrease in number be accounted for if the high tariff fosters and encourages this industry? Why this great decrease under the high tariff laws? The tariff does not sustain this industry, as the facts clearly disclose; neither does it regulate the price of wool; but the Woolen Trust, the consumer of raw wool, dictates the price on it and has been doing so for years, tariff or no tariff. This measure protects the sheep but not raw wool. If the tariff is an incubator of prosperity, why has it not kept the price high and regular on wool? For 16 years, during all of which time the duty on raw wool has been enormously high, the price on this commodity has had a wider range of fluctuation than almost any other commodity in our markets. If time would permit I would like to take up these schedules one by one and discuss each of them. The law of supply and demand is a better regulator of markets than tariff schedules and furnishes a much better barometer for what may be expected of them. The advocates of high protection will not learn by experience or profit by example. They represent but one class—the manufacturer. In all discussion, in all action, he alone is their sole and only consideration. This measure recognizes that other and much larger class, the consumers of the country, who are entitled to just as much consideration in all legislation of this character. The consumer supports the Government, pays the taxes, and defends the flag when in peril, and he as much as the producer is entitled to recognition in legislation. We are giving it to him. For this the measure is to be commended. The spirit of justice and fairness is running all through it.

Our Republican friends from Massachusetts who have been so vigorously attacking this bill, declaring it would injure their great woolen and boot and shoe industries—drive them out of business if it passes—are unduly alarmed. Their solicitude for the laboring man is pathetic. Allow me to say to them they appear to be worse scared than hurt. About a week ago in the thirteenth Massachusetts congressional district an election was held to elect a successor to Senator WEEKS, recently elected to the Senate. It is a large manufacturing district. The Democratic candidate, bold and courageous, a fearless exponent of the Democratic faith, went before the voters of that district with the Underwood bill in his hand, pledging the people if elected he would support it. He indorsed it, and the people of that district indorsed him. In a district which went 3,000 Republican last November, gave him less than a week ago 2,500 majority. The Republican majority of 3,000 was wiped out and a Democratic majority of 2,500 substituted. The laboring men of Massachusetts are not alarmed over Democratic legislation, but the tariff barons alone are; the ultimate consumers of that great State have no fears of Democratic legislation, but the beneficiaries of special privilege have. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. We Democrats in Massachusetts have been presenting the facts to the people about protection and wages. We have impressed the fact upon the people of that State that labor in the boot and shoe factories, the products of which are protected by low duties, only 10 per cent, is better paid, receives higher wages, than the labor in the great woolen industries, the highest protected of all under the Republican tariff legislation. They realize the effect in this regard and know it to be true.

Mr. CULLOP. I appreciate the force of the suggestion of the able gentleman from Massachusetts, and congratulate him upon the success he and his Democratic colleagues are making among the people of that State in disseminating Democratic doctrine and inspiring Democratic activity. I regard him as an able champion of the cause and a most worthy representative of the people. The voters of Massachusetts have had a valuable object lesson in these two great industries, as he clearly shows, the industry with a low protective duty paying labor higher wages than those paid by the highly protective tariff. The argument of the protectionist in defense of the system changes with as much ease as "the shifting sands of the seas." They used to tell us that it was needed to keep the price up in order to prevent competition with the foreign manufacturer, and by this plea secured prohibitive duties. Now, lo and behold, they deny with vehemence that it has anything to do with the price. If it does not increase the price, why not abandon it; if it is not to increase the price, why want it levied; if it has nothing to do with the price, how could it prevent competition?

They used to deny it was a tax; then they shifted that position and admitted it was a tax; but the foreigner paid the tax, and for this reason it was not a burden upon the American consumers. And now they have unmasked and admit the American consumer pays it, admit it increases the price upon everything upon which it is levied, and justify it by saying that it is necessary to encourage industry and should be high enough to cover all difference in the cost of production and also guarantee a reasonable profit—that people should be taxed on their consumption to make a private enterprise profitable. This is their position. A more radical paternalistic doctrine was never advanced or a more radical socialistic tenet proclaimed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Indiana assert that the wages in the protected woolen industries in Massachusetts are lower than in other industries?

Mr. CULLOP. I most certainly do, as a rule.

Mr. FORDNEY. They are much lower in foreign countries in the woolen industries than in Massachusetts. I have examined to see.

Mr. CULLOP. Ah, the gentleman refers to the per diem wage, and in that he is correct; but I refer to the wage per unit of production. The wages per unit in the Massachusetts woolen mills are much less than in the European mills. That is the assertion I am making, and I fear no successful contradiction. The facts sustain it. The American wage earner does more for what he is paid than any other wage earner in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has singled out the wage earner in the woolen mills of Massachusetts as poorly paid. Does he not know in the Southern States in the cotton mills wages are lower than in the same kind of mills in New England?

Mr. CULLOP. I do. It is true, and the Southern mills have the same protection duties that the New England mills have. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan, his illustration is most unfortunate for his position. It proves beyond cavil or doubt that a high tariff does not regulate wages, as he and his party claim; but the law of supply and demand does. In New England labor is scarce and in the South it is more abundant. If the tariff regulated the wages of the workingman, they would be in the same kind of labor the same everywhere. [Applause.] His assertion of the difference in wages completely refutes the position of his party as to the effect of the tariff on the wage question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The wage earner has been a theme upon which the protectionist has discoursed with eloquence upon all occasions, and no tariff discussion would be complete unless he received much attention. The laborer is his especial object of solicitude. The tariff is for the laborer, and him alone, and yet every time it is proposed to provide the tariff levied on the articles labor produces shall be paid him, make the law so labor can get it, the advocates of protection protest and denounce it as demagoguery. Why this objection if it is all levied for his especial benefit? The truth is the tariff is not for the benefit of the laboring man, but to his detriment.

Laborers have not made colossal fortunes out of it, but the owners of the industries have. Ninety per cent of those employed in labor in this country are not employed in the protected industries, but in labor producing articles on which there are no protective duties and must compete in the markets of the world, and invariably the labor employed in the production of these articles is paid higher wages than those paid in the protected industries. The paper hanger, the carpenter, the painter, the plasterer, the bricklayer, the typesetter, and many other callings all nearly without exception receive higher wages than workmen in the highest protected industries, and yet their productions enter the markets free of all duty and must compete with the entire world. No combines control the prices of their products; competition alone regulates them. If protection is for labor, why, then, does it not furnish higher wages to the men who make the protected products than are paid to the men who make the unprotected products?

We are admonished by the standpatters, the advocates of high protection, that business stagnation, panic, and ruin will follow the enactment of this measure; that it will inaugurate soup houses, shutdowns, and industrial chaos. There are no precedents for such a fear. Every panic this country has experienced in the last half century has occurred under high protection laws. What made them? Surely not low tariff. The panic of 1873 occurred under a high protective tariff, under Republican rule. It was widespread and most disastrous to all branches of industry. Prior to it a tramp was unknown in this country. The name was coined then. It is the legacy from that dark period which has been in constant use ever since. The panic of 1893 occurred when the McKinley law was in force, providing the highest duties ever known up to that time. When it occurred no Democratic legislation had been enacted and none attempted. What caused it, then? The Republican policies governing the economic affairs of the country were in force during that great disaster which paralyzed every energy in operation all over the country, wasted fortunes, and locked the wheels of progress. Distress was common, and prosperity vanished from the land.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FARR. We had panics under Democratic policies.

Mr. CULLOP. When? In 1893?

Mr. FARR. Yes; and I can prove it by one who suffered during that time if given time to do so?

Mr. CULLOP. Suffered under Democratic policies in force in 1893? If the gentleman was given until the day of the millennium he could not prove that, because it is not true. No Democratic policies were in force then; the McKinley law was in force. The Wilson bill was not passed until August 24, 1894, and did not take effect until late in 1894 and early in 1895. Yet he says his friend suffered because of it at least a year before it was even passed, and before anyone knew what its provisions would be. If you, sir, could prove your proposition it would be the eighth wonder of the world. As a splendid example of the calamity howler undoubtedly the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a howling success. Panics are the production of Republican policies; they germinate them, and they flourish too luxuriantly under them for the good of the country, as the history of these great public misfortunes abundantly establishes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, the panic of 1907, when Roosevelt was President, occurred while the Dingley law was in force, when there was no tariff agitation, and the distress which ensued wrecked fortunes, paralyzed industries, locked the wheels of transportation, established free soup houses in every metropolitan city of the land, and lined every public highway with tramps begging for food and work. Sir, this is the correct history of the panics in this country in the last half a century. Not one occurred under Democratic policies, nor on account of them, but all occurred under the highest tariff ever known up to the time and when Republican policies were in full force in every department of the Government. Let no one mistake this fact. All history corroborates it. If, therefore, high protection breeds prosperity, it likewise breeds adversity, business stagnation, and financial distress. One seems to have followed the other at regular intervals.

Do we need a high protective tariff? If so, for what purpose? Twenty-five years ago the great leaders of the Republican Party insisted it was needed for the purpose of sustaining our infant industries, but as soon as they were well established they assured the country the policy should be abandoned. The position has shifted and that doctrine is abandoned and another substituted. The infant industry has grown to a giant, and now the modern-day protectionist demands it for profit, a guarantee against loss, against bad location, against bad business management. They demand the people shall be taxed on their consumption to make private industry profitable. Cost of production is never the same in any two factories or in any two years. Conditions, locations, and business management differ at all times and in all places. The proposition is absurd, the contention unreasonable, but the desperation of the cause supported by the greed and avarice of the men who are the fawning courtiers of the public favor are not controlled by justice or fairness, but alone by unbounded selfishness. We can and do produce the leading manufactures cheaper than any people in the world. Last year our manufacturers produced enough to supply our wants at home and exported to leading foreign countries of the world nearly a billion and a half dollars worth of products and sold them to their people cheaper than they could produce and sell them. We were not only able to compete with foreign manufacturers here, we have driven them from our markets, but we can and are producing here, paying the freight abroad, and underselling them in their own countries at the very doors of their factories and to their own people. We can compete. We are doing it not only at home but abroad as well.

If they can produce cheaper, how can we do this? At this time the leading manufacturers have in their employ the best trade salesmen that money can hire scouring every country of the world soliciting orders for articles to be delivered a year hence, for the manufacture of which they have not yet purchased the raw materials. We need no tariff, no bounty, or subvention to enable us to compete with the world Our cost of production is less and our labor per unit cheaper than anywhere else on the civilized globe. We lead the world in everything. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Last year our exports exceeded our imports by the enormous sum of more than $500,000,000. This conclusively shows that we are not only able to compete at home, but abroad as well. American products are selling in every foreign market in competition with home productions. If we can not produce cheaper, we could not sell in their markets. We do this after we pay the freight to foreign countries. If we are able to pay the freight abroad and compete in foreign markets with foreign-made goods, we are able to do it at home. We need no protection for that purpose.

One of the chief objects of this measure is to establish competition. Its duties are low enough to admit competition, and it therefore makes a bold strike at monopoly. If the domestic producer attempts to combine and maintain high prices, foreign products can be imported and thereby prevent this imposition heretofore inflicted on the American consumers, who have been powerless to obtain relief from the remorseless greed of the unconscionable manipulator of markets, who employs it for the purposes of plundering the public and swelling the coffers of his unearned wealth. The ultimate consumers will hail it with delight, because in it they see an opportunity for relief.

For years the great tariff barons, the beneficiaries of an unjust policy, have been able by intimidation, coercion, and threats to sustain the protective system, which has looted the pockets of the consumers and swell their predatory fortunes beyond the wildest dreams of avarice. They have been able to dictate tariff schedules for selfish purposes, to combine, because of this system, and control the quantity of production and fix the price, destroy smaller or independent industries, and defy the Government. Intoxicated with power and encouraged by loot and gain, they now attempt to tyrannize over 93,000,000 people and dictate the policies of a Government founded on the principles of justice and mercy, worked out by patriots amid the thunder of hostile cannon and the rattle of unfriendly musketry, drenched in the blood of patriots spilled in the name of liberty. It has for years extorted from the toiling masses, patient, God-fearing people, the substance of their labor, the fruits of their toil, until now a change of conditions is demanded, the system eliminated, and another substituted, which will enable every man to have an equal opportunity and an even chance in the race of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

THE FOUR YEARS AFTER THE PASSAGE OF THIS BILL WILL BE KNOWN IN THIS COUNTRY AS THE SIXTH FREE-TRADE PERIOD.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, it matters little what we may say here concerning the pending legislation, for it will be judged by the results which follow.

Right now, even before the bill is enacted into law, grave fear and doubt is expressed as to the outcome.

The bill will be known in history as the Wilson-Underwood-Simmons tariff law.

Many feel that it will in a large degree be followed by results similar to those after the passage of the Wilson-Gorman tariff law.

During the presidential election of 1912 the following was circulated in portions of the district which honors me with a place here:

WHY TAKE A CHANCE! WHY EXPERIMENT!

"Unless you sincerely believe you can improve conditions for yourself, family, and country, why not 'let well enough alone' at this time and vote for Taft. The Democratic Party in its tariff plank this year promise exactly the same change which they gave the country in 1893, doing away with protection entirely. Their tariff law, carried into effect, then ruined our industries, put thousands of workingmen out of work, and so destroyed the market for what the farmer had to sell.

"Prof. Woodrow Wilson in his 'History of the American people,' on pages 235 and 236 of volume 5, says of the dark Democratic days of 1893 to 1897:

"A great poverty and depression had come upon the western mining regions and upon the agricultural region of the West and South. Prices had fallen. * * * Men of the poorer sort were idle everywhere, and filled with a sort of despair. All of the larger cities and manufacturing towns teemed with unemployed workingmen, who were with the utmost difficulty kept from starvation by the systematic efforts of organized charity.

"And then Prof. Wilson adds:

"Not until the year 1897, when the Republican administration came in, did the crisis seem to be past.

"No better witness can be brought forward in this campaign than Woodrow Wilson, then the historian, now the Democratic candidate for President. A vote for the Republican ticket, headed by William Howard Taft, is a vote to continue the present prosperity and present good times.

"A vote for Wilson may bring back the dark days he described, and a vote for Roosevelt only can assist toward Wilson's election.

"Remember, voter, 'it is better to be safe than sorry.'"

Who is there that lived during the last Democratic administration, from 1893 to 1897, that can not verify all and even more that Prof. Wilson said respecting conditions at that time?

How can we who believe in a protective tariff expect a continuation of the prosperous times which we have enjoyed for so many years under the Republican administrations of McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, when a free-trade party is in control of both branches of Congress and we have a free-trade President, as is clearly shown by his utterances?

WILSON A FREE TRADER—WOULD REPEAL ALL PROTECTIVE-TARIFF LAWS.

The following is taken from an address delivered by Prof. Woodrow Wilson before the Tariff Board in 1882, showing his view then on the question of the tariff and the distinct announcement of his position as a free trader, opposed to all tariffs except merely for the purpose of raising revenue:

"But the danger of imposing protective duties is that when the policy is once embarked upon it can not be easily receded from. Protection is nothing more than a bounty, and when we offer bounties to manufacturers they will enter into industries and build up interests, and when at a later day we seek to overthrow this protective tariff we must hurt somebody, and of course there is objection. They will say, 'Thousands of men will be thrown out of employment and hundreds of people will lose their capital.' This seems very plausible; but I maintain that manufacturers are made better manufacturers whenever they are thrown upon their own resources and left to the natural competition of trade."

* * * * * * *

"Protection also hinders commerce immensely. The English people do not send as many goods to this country as they would if the duties were not so much, and in that way there is a restriction of commerce, and we are building up manufactories here at the expense of commerce. We are holding ourselves aloof from foreign countries in effect and saying, 'We are sufficient to ourselves; we wish to trade, not with England, but with each other.' I maintain that it is not only a pernicious system, but a corrupt system.

"By Commissioner Garland:

"Q. Are you advocating the repeal of all tariff laws?

"A. Of all protective tariff laws; of establishing a tariff for revenue merely. It seems to me very absurd to maintain that we shall have free trade between different portions of this country and at the same time shut ourselves out from free communication with other producing countries of the world. If it is necessary to impose restrictive duties on goods brought from abroad, it would seem to me, as a matter of logic, necessary to impose similar restrictions on goods taken from one State of this Union to another. That follows as a necessary consequence; there is no escape from it."

Compare the utterances of this Democratic President with those of Thomas Jefferson, our third President, often referred to as the founder of the Democratic Party, who said:

JEFFERSON A PROTECTIONIST.

"The general inquiry now is, Shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufacturers must be for reducing us either to a dependence upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in caves and dens. I am proud to say I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufacturers are now as necessary to our independence as to our comforts.

"The prohibiting duties we lay on all articles of foreign manufacture, which prudence requires us to establish at home, with the patriotic determination of every good citizen to use no foreign article which can be made within ourselves, without regard to difference of price, secures us against a relapse into foreign dependency."

In his letter to Humphrey, 1809, he wrote:

"My own idea is that we should encourage home manufacturers to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material."

In 1817, after the close of the second war with Great Britain, in accepting an election to membership in a "Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Manufacturers," Jefferson wrote:

"The history of the last 20 years has been a significant lesson for us all to depend for necessaries on ourselves alone, and I hope 20 years more will place the American hemisphere under a system of its own, essentially peaceable and industrious, and not needing to extract its comforts out of the eternal fires raging in the Old World."

Who can read these utterances of Jefferson and say that he was not a protectionist?

Let me remind you that, beginning with 1783, under the Confederacy, we have had five free-trade periods in this country, and every one of them has been disastrous.

At the close of one of these periods, Mr. Benton, Democratic Senator from Missouri for 30 years, narrated conditions as follows:

"No price for property; no sales except those of the sheriff and marshal; no purchasers at execution sales except the creditor or some hoarder of money; no employment for industry; no demand for labor; no sale for the products of the farm; no sound of the hammer except that of the auctioneer knocking down property. Distress was the universal cry of the people; relief, the universal demand, was thundered at the doors of all legislatures, State and Federal."

THE MEXICAN WAR.

Some of you on the other side have pointed with some degree of pride to the Walker Tariff Act of 1846 and its results. Let us fervently hope that we will not have another war with Mexico as we had at that time which, owing to our scanty supply of arms and the numerous munitions of war and new supplies which had to be created and paid for, occasioned the putting in circulation in this Nation of more than $100,000,000.

FAMINE IN IRELAND.

Close upon the payment to our people of this great sum followed that well-known and terrible famine in Ireland, when so many thousands suffered and perished from starvation. This demand called for and obtained our entire surplus of flour, grain, potatoes, and many other things, and left heavy payments of money therefor, which went largely to our agricultural population.

CALIFORNIA GOLD.

Eighteen hundred and forty-nine brought to our people the discovery of those amazingly rich deposits of gold in California, the output of gold averaging for 10 years, from 1849, not less than $55,000,000 per year. Many ships were required to transport great numbers of men as well as large supplies of food for the gold hunters, and for a time the California business increased the demand for labor and for our agricultural products.

EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONS.

About the same time—1848–1851—those violent revolutions broke out in many European countries which most severely tested the regular authorities of those nations in putting down the revolutions and almost completely paralyzed their agricultural and manufacturing industries.

These events caused an immense demand upon our country, particularly for our agricultural products, gave us increased prices for them, and brought large sums of money from those countries to pay for them, and of course this money was widely distributed, and tended to make the times apparently prosperous.

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

Then right upon the heels of these revolutions followed the Crimean War between England, France, and Italy on one side and Russia on the other. This contest was long, fierce, bloody, and exhausting. Europe was utterly unable to supply her own people and those great armies besides, and a tremendous demand was again made upon us for our agricultural surplus at advanced prices, which demand continued for several years and continued our apparent prosperity.

Another series of events like these has never been known in the world's history. So far as the Nation and the tariff of 1846 were concerned, they were pure accidents, and are never likely to occur again. But 1854 saw the close of these events and of our apparent prosperity as well. As soon as these extrinsic and unusual demands ceased we learned our true economic condition. Under the low tariff we could not compete successfully with foreign manufacturers and our own factories were closed, general business was prostrated, the foreign demand for our products fell off heavily, and our own home market was insufficient and constantly diminishing as our manufacturing industries were suspended or were closed.

LOWER TARIFF AND GREATER DEPRESSION.

In 1857 the Democrats again reduced the duties, already too low, to the lowest rates we have ever had since the adoption of the Constitution; and again financial revolution, appalling in its widespread severity and distress, involved the Nation, and for more than four years tortured and impoverished our people and exhausted our resources.

Both of these latter tariffs—1846 and 1857—were intended as tariffs for revenue only. Let us see if they were successful as revenue producers.

From 1847 to 1857 the expenditures of the Government exceeded its revenues by $21,790,909, and the public debt increased in the same period $13,149,629. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, the act of 1857 kept in force the principles of that of 1846 and reduced the duties upon all articles that involved the doctrine of protection.

From this time to 1861, when a protective tariff was enacted by the Republicans, the public debt increased nearly $46,000,000 and the expenditures exceeded the receipts by $77,234,116 in the same time. So much for tariff for revenue only.

After these and similar experiences would you not suppose that our Democratic friends would profit by their mistakes and stop insisting upon a tariff for revenue only? The misery, want, and loss under these last two tariff acts for revenue only can not be set forth in clearer, more convincing, and unmistakable language than was used by another Democratic President, James Buchanan, in his official message. Speaking of that distressing period he said:

"With unsurpassed plenty in all the productions and all the elements of natural wealth our manufacturers have suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet notwithstanding all these advantages our country in its monetary interests is in a deplorable condition."

Is this not an awful indictment, coming from a Democratic President, against the Democratic Party?

You will recall that the revenues were so small under the tariff of 1857 that it became necessary to obtain loans to meet the current expenses of the Government, and this Government did pay interest at the exorbitant rates of from 8 to 12 per cent so low was our national credit and resources. The Republican Party has had no trouble under a protective tariff in borrowing money as low as 2 per cent.

I sometimes wonder why the Democratic Party did not profit by its mistakes, for in 1860 in the Democratic national convention it reaffirmed the platform of 1856 in favor of "progressive free trade throughout the world."

On May 2, 1911, I said in this House that a Democratic House may mean in 1912 the beginning of the sixth free-trade period in this country. Gentlemen, in my opinion, it is just ahead of us.

You may be spared a bond issue like unto the one of 20 years ago, but only because you expect to get more than $70,000,000 from an income tax and enough more to make up $100,000,000 from the corporation tax.

I observe that apatite and asafetida are on the free list, but rice, a food product, is on the dutiable list. I wonder why this is?

Some of you speak lightly of the marvelous growth of this country under a half century of protection. Compare for a moment conditions:

Comparison.

	In 1893, under a Democratic administration and a free-trade tariff.	In 1900, under a Republican administration and a protective tariff.
Bank clearings	$50,000,000,000	$105,000,000,000.
Foreign commerce	$1,539,508,130	$2,244,193,543.
Exports of merchandise	$793,392,599	$1,394,479,214.
Customs receipts	$152,158,617	$233,857,958.
Treasury balance	Deficit, $42,805,223	Surplus, $81,229,771.
Balance of trade	$75,568,200	$544,764,885.
Failures	$226,096,834 (1896)	$90,879,889 (1899).
Wages paid	$2,291,016,000	$3,056,635,000.
Sheep (number)	38,298,783	67,121,881.
Sheep (value)	$65,167,735	$246,175,325.
Pig-iron production (tons)	6,657,388 (1894)	13,620,703 (1899).
Miles railroad built	1,650	5,100.
Farm products	Loss in value, $4,283,000,000 (1893–1897)	Increase in value, $6,355,000,000 (1897–1900).
Uncle Sam	In 1894–1896 had to borrow $262,000,000	In 1900 had $300,000,000 in bank.

And the growth under a protective tariff has even been greater since 1900.

On the 3d of March, this year, we turned the country over to you with factories running full time, labor never better paid, the farmer and merchant prospering, with a working balance in the Treasury offices of $80,581,398.85 and a total balance in general fund of $149,335,711.78, quite a marked change in all these conditions as compared with those when you turned the country over to us after four years of rule and ruin, during which time you issued bonds bearing 4 and 5 per cent interest to the amount of $262,315,404, and at the end of the fiscal year 1897 there was a deficit of $18,052,454.

I want to say to our friends on the other side of the aisle that you have no idle task before you if you turn the country back to us at the end of four years, as you will, with all our people as prosperous as they are to-day.

It is idle and almost a waste of time for us as Republicans to offer any objections or amendments, because of a Democratic majority in this House of more than 140, pledged in caucus to pass this bill without any amendments; but in the name of the people of my State—Michigan—and in behalf of the farmer, laborer—skilled and unskilled—the merchant and manufacturer, and all our people, and in behalf of the sugar-beet industry of my State, I protest against the passage of this bill.

You are going to put sugar on the free list in three years as you have wool. If free sugar is a good thing for the people in three years from now, why is it not a good thing at this time, and why have you not the courage of your convictions and place it there at once? It is an undeniable fact that placing sugar on the free list will not benefit the consumer; that the country will annually lose more than fifty millions in revenue, and that this legislation is in the interests of the foreigner and the sugar refiners.

Since I was 10 years of age I have listened to Democratic orators and read Democratic speeches telling of the glorious results which would follow the enactment of tariff for revenue only legislation, with the emphasis on the word "only," as Mr. UNDERWOOD says.

You have the machinery of government to work out your will; the President and both branches of Congress are yours. I hope, without unnecessary delay, you will write into law a tariff just as you want it. If it proves a success raising sufficient revenue, does not close our factories, giving the laboring man the good wages which he has been receiving, and the farmer splendid prices for his products, we will give you just praise, for we are all Americans before we are partisans; but if you fail, as I believe you will, I bid you forever hold your peace about a tariff for revenue only, frankly admit your mistake, and join us as Republicans in again giving to the country a fair measure of protection that this may continue to be the greatest and most prosperous of all Republics. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARDNER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure places shoes upon the free list because some one makes the charge that the shoe manufacturers of this country sell a small part of their surplus product in the markets of the world at a less price than they sell it at home.

The same bill levies a duty of 10 cents a bushel upon wheat, not for the purpose of raising revenue, but for the sole purpose of leading the wheat grower of this country to believe that his industry is being protected. The census reports of this country show that for the past decades the farmers of this country have yearly raised millions of bushels more of wheat than we have consumed and that they have been selling it in the markets of the world. Your last census abstract, on page 380, states that the wheat imports into this country are insignificant and may be wholly disregarded, while our exports of wheat and flour, its equivalent, amount to 87,360,000 bushels.

As far back as I can recollect—and that is a good way—the farmers of this country have raised more wheat than we have consumed, and they have sold their surplus products in the markets of the world in competition with foreign wheat, and frequently at a less price in the foreign market than at home. Yet the 10 per cent ad valorem is to be taken off of shoes and 10 cents a bushel levied on wheat. If the shoe manufacturer of this country does not sell his surplus shoes in the markets of world, pray tell me where shall he sell them? Must he cease to manufacture shoes just as soon as it is ascertained that the domestic demand has been fairly supplied? Do you require the wheat grower to do so? Do you penalize his industry by placing his product upon the free list because he raises every year more wheat than we consume and frequently sells his wheat and flour in the markets abroad at a less price than at home? I do not understand the logic of these gentlemen. Has there ever been any combination among the shoe manufacturers of this country tending to artificially raise the price of shoes? Have not "corners" in the Chicago wheat market been of frequent occurrence? Have not prices soared skyward with lightning rapidity, to the enrichment of the cold, unscrupulous speculator, and to the impoverishment of the shorn lamb, and working in the final result a great hardship upon the consumer of breadstuffs? As I say, I can not understand the reasoning of these gentlemen. The Democratic majority on the Ways and Means Committee are certainly cognizant of these facts. They are a matter of public knowledge, and the gentlemen can not now say that they are putting products on the free list because they are controlled here by large combinations of capital, or that they are sometimes sold in the markets of the world at a less price than at home.

When was it that the American wool grower has ever been guilty of the unpardonable sin of selling any portion of his product in the markets of the world? When, at any time since the enactment of the Dingley law in 1897, has raw wool sold too high or at an exorbitant price? Yet you place raw wool upon the free list. Why do you remove the protection from the shoe manufacturer of my district and retain protection for the cotton manufacturer of North Carolina? Why do you remove the protection from the wool grower of my district and retain it for the rice grower of the South? Why do you take protection off the manufactured products of wheat, barley, oats, and rye, products of the North, and retain that protection upon the manufactured products of rice, a product of the South? [Applause on the Republican side.] You answer that you are levying duties to raise revenue only, and that, necessarily, there will be some incidental or accidental protection in any tariff bill you can possibly offer.

But the framers of tariff for revenue measures always have the happy faculty of figuring out in advance just where this incidental protection is going to strike. In framing the pending bill they had no trouble, apparently, in finding out in what part of the United States rice is grown; and by means of graduated or shifting rates of duty, or by a proper classification, or by all these means, there is not much trouble in protecting the cotton manufacturer of North Carolina against his northern competitor.

At the second session of the Sixty-second Congress we were solemnly told by the Democratic leader of this body, the gentleman from Alabama, that the enactment into law of his free-sugar bill would remove from the shoulders of the American people an enormous annual burden of $115,000,000.

The gentleman vividly portrayed in doleful tones the woeful condition of the people of the country, groaning under this burdensome taxation.

According to the gentleman from Alabama none but the most heartless could longer sit idly by and witness this wholesale robbery of the people and refuse to grant the immediate relief proffered by his measure.

But believing that this great Democratic leader was not properly informed and unduly alarmed, and well knowing that our domestic cane and beet suger industries could not exist without adequate protection, I cast my vote against his proposition.

And now a year later and after our Democratic friends have gone before the American people and promised that if returned to full power they would give them sugar without money and without price, to my utter amazement we are to-day confronted by a bill providing for a complete revision of our tariff laws not carrying in any of its schedules free sugar, but on the contrary retaining the larger portion of the alleged outrageous robbery of which our Democratic friends so bitterly complained and so vehemently denounced one year ago.

True the pending measure provides a definite date for the execution of the domestic sugar producer and impliedly invites arrangement and preparation for his impending demise. This lease of life, we are told, is not given for the purpose of fostering and developing our domestic sugar industry, but solely for the purpose of allowing this unconstitutional, tax-sustained producer time to wind up his industrial existence.

And incidentally free sugar is to be given by this bill three years hence and on the eve of a presidential campaign, and evidently it is to be used again as the Democratic slogan for reelection.

Our Democratic friends seem to look upon the sugar schedule of our tariff law as a political football. One year ago they declared for free sugar immediately by passing the Underwood sugar bill; now they say that some consideration must be given to the domestic producers. If the domestic producer is entitled to some consideration at this time, why should he not have been given some consideration one year ago? Has anything occurred in the business or economic conditions during the past year that will warrant this change about of front? The Democratic proposition before us concedes that the domestic sugar producer is entitled to some consideration, which vindicates the position taken by those who cast their votes against the measure one year ago, in so far as the action of the Democratic Party is capable of bringing about vindication. But how is it possible for the Democratic leader of this House to sit passively by during the next three years and raise no protest against the high-handed robbery he once so roundly and loudly denounced?

The real leader of Democracy, our President, is of the opinion that the immediate destruction of this great industry would be exceedingly distressful to the sugar-producing territory of the Nation, and he no doubt fears that its disastrous consequences might be inimical to business throughout the length and breadth of the land. In this I fully agree with him.

But how about the radical reduction of the textile duties of the woolen schedule and placing raw wool on the free list? Will not this, too, prove disastrous to thousands and thousands of woolgrowers throughout the country and result in thousands and thousands of laborers being thrown out of employment?

Democrat after Democrat during the last Congress gave testimony in lengthy speeches that the placing of wool on the free list of our tariff law would destroy the raw-wool industry of the Nation; and this belief is fortified by not only an abundance of facts and sound reasoning, but such has been the result of the tried-out experience of the past. Why could not this real Democratic leader accord to the woolgrowers of the country the same generosity he proposes to extend to the producers of sugar? Why make fish of one and fowl of the other?

Why should the farmer who grows the wool for the clothing that goes upon our backs be so summarily dealt with and the farmer who grows the cane and beets out of which is made the sugar which goes down our throats be given not only three days of grace, but three years? Why this class discrimination?

Is not the labor which cares for the flock and shears the sheep entitled to the same consideration as the labor of the sugar factory and the labor of the woolen factory? Are the woolgrowers of the Nation growing rich too fast? Is there any combination among the woolgrowers tending to arbitrarily enhance the price of wool?

The cost of all the wool in the average suit of clothes to-day is hardly $2.

Our Democratic friends during the last Congress passed and repassed the Underwood wool bills, levying 20 per cent ad valorem duty on raw wool, and many of its supporters took the position that if a duty is levied on the manufactured product of a raw material produced in this country to such an extent as to be a great industry, that in all fairness there should be a duty levied on the raw material. Raw material is the finished product of the woolgrower as much as cloth is the finished product of the weaver. Each industry requires capital, labor, skill, and close attention in order that it may be fairly successful.

It is a well-known fact that free raw material affords protection to the industry using same, and the woolen textile industries under the pending bill are not only given free wool but they are further protected by duties levied on woolen goods. Why this double protection of the woolen textile industries as against the woolgrowers?

Again, why the free listing of many items and the radical reduction of duties on those items remaining in the metal schedule of our tariff law?

This heavy cut in the end must be borne by labor. And in this connection, I desire to submit an excerpt from the opinion of Mr. Andrew Glass, one of the owners of a large steel mill in my district employing 1,600 men at good wages, as to how the reduction of duties on two items of the metal schedule will affect the earnings of labor in the industries now protected thereunder. He says, that "Under 15 per cent tariff on black and 20 per cent on galvanized sheets, home mills would be at a disadvantage that labor would have to make good. That would be the end, and no other end is possible; but it would not be reached without long strikes, bringing lots of misery and trouble to the workers, and plenty of expense and sleepless nights to those charged with the duty of meeting the new conditions."

As to its effect upon the small manufacturers, especially of iron and steel, I desire to give at this point an excerpt from a letter of Hon. H. A. Marting, of Ironton, Ohio, president of the Marting Iron & Steel Co., of that city, as follows:

> It certainly looks to us as though it is the desire of the Democratic Party now in power to drive all of the smaller manufacturers out of business. The so-called trusts may be able to compete with foreign-made products, made by cheap labor, as they have an advantage over the smaller industries by owning and controlling raw material, etc., but the smaller independent manufacturers will, I fear, be compelled to close their shops and go begging for a livelihood if Congress makes into law the tariff bill as at present outlined, but it looks as though it is needless to protest.

Such is the judgment of two men who have had years of experience in the iron and steel industries, but it will have no weight with those who, now drunken with power, are bent on smashing American industries.

Yesterday I inquired of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] why the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee changed the specific duty of $2.50 per ton on ferromanganese, a product which he says is not made for sale in this country, to a 15 per cent ad valorem duty, resulting in an increase of duty at this time of more than 300 per cent. The gentleman, in a somewhat labored answer, among other things stated that "our purpose in making the rate on ferromanganese was entirely as a revenue-producing proposition." Upon an investigation of the report on the pending tariff bill, prepared with great care, no doubt, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the chairman of that great committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD], representing an iron district in the State of Alabama, on page 112 of the report we find that they propose to reduce the revenue of $190,203 received by the Government on ferromanganese this year to $82,500 next year. It may be of some interest to the Members of this House to be informed just how these gentlemen propose to accomplish the remarkable feat of reducing the revenue now received on ferromanganese to less than one-half of the amount now being derived therefrom by increasing the duty 300 per cent. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, the United States Steel Corporation is the only producer of ferromanganese in this country, and they use practically their entire product. It is, therefore, incumbent upon our independent steel concerns to purchase this article abroad, and the duty is thereby necessarily a tax added to the cost of their raw material. So if the output of our independent steel mills would be as large next year as in 1912, at the present price paid for ferromanganese they would have to pay a revenue of $750,000, instead of $82,500 as estimated in the report on the pending tariff bill. This would be over $650,000 more than they paid on this item in 1912. And as the pending measure takes the 15 per cent ad valorem duty off of manganiferous ore the independent steel producer is not only handicapped by the largely increased duty on a part of his raw material, but his chief competitor in this country, the United States Steel Corporation, who already enjoys a great advantage over him by reason of owning practically all of its raw material and large transportation facilities, and being able to make its ferromanganese, is relieved from paying any duty on about all of the raw material it consumes.

I have no doubt but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would deny that the United States Steel Corporation requested that this unfair discrimination in their favor over the independent steel companies be made; but why should the gentleman voluntarily be a party to such an outrageous discrimination in favor of a trust which Members on that side of the House daily denounce is beyond my comprehension. Still, I have no doubt but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Alabama gave much care and consideration to this item, and that the object it will accomplish will be just as they purposed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania intimates that it is not a matter of much consequence; but, be that as it may, they thought it important to remove the small duty of 15 per cent ad valorem on manganiferous ore, a raw material used solely by the United States Steel Corporation, and to increase the duty 300 per cent on ferromanganese, a raw material used by the independent steel companies.

And while the gentleman thinks it is not a matter of much importance, the Portsmouth Steel Co., of my district, state that they use approximately 1,500 tons of ferromanganese yearly, and that this increased duty means an increased yearly cost to them for this raw material of from ten to fifteen thousand dollars, and that they are not only handicapped by reason of this increased cost, but on account of the frequent fluctuations in the price of ferromanganese, and the duty thereon being an ad valorem one, and by reason of changing from a specific to an ad valorem duty and cutting in two the protection on their product, it is nearly impossible for them to calculate with any certainty the cost of products they make and prices of which they must quote to consumers.

While this may not be a concrete illustration of President Wilson's idea of whetting the wits of our people in a contest with the rest of the world, it is an apt illustration as to how the proposed revision of the metal schedule is whetting the wits of the United States Steel Corporation in a contest with our independent steel companies. The scythe of the Steel Corporation is being well sharpened, for the harvest looks promising, and the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Alabama are the experts engaged in this sharpening process. But the Portsmouth Steel Co., of my district, seriously objects to be used as the whetstone.

But to return to the wonderful feat of reducing the revenue to be received by the Government on ferromanganese from $190,000 to $82,500 by increasing the duty thereon more than 300 per cent. If you will inspect carefully page 112 of the report on the pending measure you will observe that while the import value of ferromanganese was $2,821,935 in 1912, the gentleman from Pennsylvania estimates that the value of ferromanganese to be imported for the first year under the pending measure will be only $550,000. As it is absolutely necessary to use ferromanganese in the manufacture of steel, and as he states the independent steel concerns must obtain all of it abroad, undoubtedly the gentleman anticipates a shrinkage of the business of the independent steel companies under the first year's operation of the Underwood bill to less than one-fifth of what it is now, because if they use less than one-fifth of the amount of ferromanganese in 1913 that they used in 1912 they can produce only one-fifth as much steel as they produced in 1912. Necessarily, if there is a great shrinkage of the amount of ferromanganese imported, an alloy used in the manufacture of steel, there must be a great shrinkage in the output of our independent steel concerns. The estimate of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Alabama conclusively shows that they expect the independent steel companies to lose more than four-fifths of their business under the operation of the Underwood bill for the first year or they have provided the 300 per cent increase of duty for the purpose of compelling the independent steel companies to purchase ferromanganese from the United States Steel Corporation, which they protect in the manufacture of this product from $8 to $9 per ton.

I do not believe that it will result in lowering the price of steel to the consumer for the independent steel companies to be driven to purchase this part of their raw material from the United States Steel Corporation, a company which Mr. Carnegie under oath states needs no protection and which has for a number of years stifled all competition in many of the products of iron and steel and which is greatly interested in getting rid of the independent steel manufacturers.

If there are other jokers in the metal schedule by reason of shifting from a specific to an ad valorem duty so favorable to the United States Steel Corporation as the one to which I have just referred it is very easy to predict as to what will become of the independent steel companies.

You put shoes on the free list and compel the American manufacturers of shoes to compete with the foreigner who not only enjoys the use of free raw materials but whose labor cost is not over half of what it is here.

This means a reduction of the wage of 200,000 shoe workers in our country.

The employees of the iron and steel and shoe industries to a great extent make many of the local markets for the agricultural products of my congressional district, as well as the great Pittsburgh market, which consumes a large part of the garden, dairy, poultry, butter, and live stock products of northern and southeastern Ohio. Why should the existing protection be removed from the products of these industries and retained on wheat, the raw material of bread, the staff of life? If protection is right, why not be consistent?

But a careful consideration of the proposed bill will disclose that the 10 cents a bushel duty on wheat, barley, oats, and rye is nothing but a delusion and a snare—a hypocritical effort to deceive the farmers of the country, for the reason that wheat and rye flour, bran and screenings, oatmeal and rolled oats, and other products of these alleged raw materials are admitted duty free. So, while the foreigner can not import wheat, barley, oats, and rye without paying an import duty of 10 cents a bushel, yet he can easily evade this payment by transforming them into some manufactured product. The northern and western farmer will note in this connection that the manufactured products of rice are protected as well as rice, the raw material.

The levying of duties on wheat, barley, oats, and rye and leaving their manufactured products unprotected will stimulate the building of more foreign flour mills and cereal-food factories. Why this great discrimination against the American flour mills and cereal factories? On the other hand, raw wool is placed on the free list and a duty is levied on manufactures of wool. All done, it is claimed, for the purpose of producing revenue only. But more revenue was derived last year upon raw wool than upon its manufactured products under our existing tariff law. This proposed change is certainly not in the interest of the user of woolen goods, for under the existing tariff law the wearer of a suit of clothes is taxed not to exceed 75 cents upon the raw wool therein. Under the proposed law he is to be given the raw wool free, but he is taxed upon the manufactured product of the wool in his suit from $1.20 to $1.50.

Imported cattle and sheep are taxed 10 per cent ad valorem, and there is an apparent attempt to protect the farmers and live-stock growers constituting these great industries throughout the country. But when it is found that beef, pork, mutton, and all meats come in duty free the whole performance turns out to be an arrangement to encourage and protect the foreign butchers and meat packers. In the place of the foreign fattened hogs, sheep, and cattle being shipped in and butchered and packed at some American plant, upon paying the duty of 10 per cent, they will be slaughtered at some foreign plant by foreign labor, employed by foreign capital, and the slaughtered product will be shipped in duty free and sold in free competition with the meat product of our American meat-packing establishments. So the farmers and stock raisers of this country occupy about the same position that is accorded the victim of a successfully worked "shell game"—now you see it, and now you do not see it. But after he has passed through the ordeal he will be well aware that he has been fleeced.

It seems that our Democratic friends, in their mad desire to reduce the high cost of living, have come to the conclusion that the agriculture class shall hereafter be made the "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

I can not support a tariff bill that gives to the foreigner the magnificent raw-wool market of this country; that contemplates handing over to the foreigner our great sugar market; that proposes to give away the markets of our mills and factories and of our great agricultural industry amounting to $30,000,000,000 a year, without receiving or without the hope of receiving anything whatever in return.

Only during short and at few intervals have those engaged in agricultural pursuits enjoyed any considerable prosperity since the Civil War up to the time of the enactment of the Dingley tariff law of 1897. Since then the Nation's prosperity has gone forward by leaps and bounds. But, while the combined wealth of the Nation has more than doubled in value within the last 20 years, farm property in all its forms has more than doubled in value within the past 10 years, disclosing that in the race for wealth during the past 10 years the agriculturist has been twice as fleet as the average man engaged in the other pursuits of our country. In other words, "the farmer has come into his own."

The general condition of the farmer as well as of the whole country, after 16 years of Republican protection, presents a most striking contrast to the condition existing at the end of three years of operation under the last Democratic free-trade tariff law. No better description can be given of the distressful and deplorable condition of the country at that time than that set out in the Democratic national platform of 1896, which declared "that the products of the people's toil are depressed in price till they no longer repay the cost of production."

This was the deliberate judgment of all the representatives of the Democratic Party composing that memorable convention at the city of Chicago in 1896.

I have never heard the truth of this declaration questioned from that time to this.

Do you know what it means when the products of labor's toil no longer repay the cost of production? I do. I have seen 15 and 20 cent corn. Just imagine a man getting rich off of a hillside corn field at such prices. I have seen railway ties hewed and hauled 4 and 5 miles at 25 to 28 cents per tie, and by the time the railway inspector got through throwing out the culls the ties would average the owner about 20 cents apiece. Now, you can imagine how rapidly this timberman accumulated wealth while engaged in furnishing and hauling these ties from 4 to 5 miles when the hewing per tie cost him 10 cents. I have passed through a similar experience at producing below cost the products of the farm and of timber grown in my district.

I have worked at the job from sunup to sundown, year after year, and I have no desire to tackle the proposition again or see some one else compelled to do so. Once in a lifetime is enough. When the products of labor's toil no longer repay the cost of production it means that the compensation received by the laboring man for a day's work is wholly insufficient to buy enough bread and meat to sustain the bone and muscle which is necessary for the performance of his day's work. And I fully agree with the Democratic nominee of that great Chicago convention of 1896 when he said:

> Is it a fair measure of value that in our great producing Nation 10 bushels of potatoes must be paid for a dollar, 10 bushels of oats for a dollar, 6 bushels of corn for a dollar, 3 bushels of wheat, and of the other products of the soil and mines and the labor of all wage earners at the same ratio? Does any fair mind say that this is honest money that forces such an exchange? And if it is not fair exchange, is it honest? Is it less than robbery?

Such, gentlemen, was the utterance of Mr. Sewall, of Maine, in his letter accepting the Democratic nomination for the Vice Presidency in 1896. It was a concrete illustration of the declaration in his party's platform to the effect "that the products of the people's toil are depressed in price till they no longer repay the cost of production." And it was the description by a great Democrat of the deplorable condition of the country at the close of the last Democratic free-trade administration. He was talking at a time when all the facts were fresh and exceedingly vivid to his mind. This philosophical Democrat also asked another significant question in his letter of acceptance, and that was this:

> How else can you increase labor's producing power but by increasing the price of all of labor's products?

Remember, my Democratic friends, he said "all."

At the time the Democratic national convention of 1896 and its nominee for the Vice Presidency were passing through their sporadic gyrations in behalf of the American laborer and producer that great commoner of the time, Mr. Bryan, in his letter of acceptance seemed to be as equally concerned about the welfare of the producers of our country.

And he contributed to the political history of our country the following illuminating dissertation:

> Labor creates capital. Until wealth is produced by the application of brain and muscle to the resources of the country there is nothing to divide among the nonproducing classes of society. Since the producers of wealth create the Nation's prosperity in times of peace and defend the Nation's flag in times of peril, their interest ought at all times to be considered by those who stand in official positions.

Mark you, he said "at all times," and I now respectfully commend his utterance to the consideration of those who occupy official places in this great representative body. How much consideration have our Democratic friends on the Ways and Means Committee given to the producers of raw wool, of sugar, of shoes, of wheat and rye flours and oatmeal, of the products of iron and steel, and of the products of the farm?

In 1896 Mr. Bryan held himself out as the special friend of the producer. His party's complaint was that the products of labor were entirely too cheap. Now it is contended that everything is too high, and they blandly tell us that they propose to cheapen the price of everything we have to buy without lowering the price of anything we produce or have to sell.

And some of them believe it can be done!

I know but little about the science of political economy as taught at some of our leading universities. In fact, I have read and pondered over but very little of the recorded effusions of those theoretical free-trade minds which have been constantly dreaming for more than a quarter of a century.

But there are some things that I know as much about, I believe, as any college professor.

I know when you reduce the price of the products of the people's toil that you are going to reduce the price of labor. I know that when you place raw wool and sugar and many other agricultural as well as manufactured products upon the free list of our tariff law, and practically cut in two the existing import duty on those articles remaining on the dutiable list, I am certain that you will vastly increase importations, especially if you raise anything like the revenue upon such dutiable articles which would be the equivalent of that produced under our existing tariff; and when you do this you are going to displace a large amount of American-made goods and American labor, even if American labor consents to work for the pauper wages paid abroad.

Naturally, since it is proposed to place on the free list articles bearing a heavy import duty and which are produced in large quantities in foreign countries, or to materially lower the import duty, the importers of such articles cease importation or greatly reduce it until the time arrives when they can bring it into the country without paying any duty or by paying the reduced duty, thereby resulting in the collection of little revenue during this period of time. The man who has contracted to take the product of the factory, entered into on the supposition that the goods he is to receive are protected to some extent from foreign competition, at once begins to ascertain if there is not some way of becoming released from his contract. When confronted with the fact that he must sell his product, made under protected and high-priced labor, in competition with the same product made by cheap and unprotected labor, he can see nothing but loss, and if his contract is a large one ruination stares him in the face. And although he does not want to repudiate his contract his fast diminishing resources decree otherwise, and bankruptcy and humiliation are his fate.

The factory owner turning out goods made by high-priced and protected labor at once becomes aguish as he contemplates the disposal of his product in free competition with similar goods made by cheap and unprotected labor.

His sole recourse, unless his labor will consent to work for the prices of labor paid by his foreign free-trade competitor, is to speedily close his establishment. This procedure on his part stops the consumption of raw material and thereby the employment of those engaged in that industry ceases, and so on down the line until discord, chaos, and disaster permeates the whole industrial and commercial realm of the entire country.

I am one of those who believe that William McKinley was right when he advocated that it would be better to open our mills to the workingmen of our country than to open our mints to the free silver of the world.

I believe that the people of this country were right when they commissioned President McKinley and a Republican Congress to enact a protective tariff law as a remedy for the industrial ills from which we were suffering in 1896.

I believe the Republican Congress was right when it enacted the Dingley tariff law, and that the immortal McKinley was right when he appended his signature to that measure, which quickened the dead mills and factories and the inactive industries of our country and brought them again to life and caused the wheels of commerce again to move, resulting in an era of prosperity without a parallel in our history and outrivaling any era known to the world.

And as we have prospered so greatly under the protective policy, I can see no reason why its principles should not still be adhered to and equitably maintained in any revision of our tariff law made necessary by the ever-changing conditions of our country.

Mr. GARDNER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I have given considerable thought in years past and recently to the question now before the House. It must be conceded that there is legitimate argument that can be advanced both in favor of free trade and protection, but it seems to me that the weight of the argument is in favor of a reasonable protective tariff. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the first tariff act passed by the United States, July 4, 1789, recited in its first sentence:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

The Democratic Party does not now agree, has never agreed, and probably never will agree with the declaration made by the first Congress of the United States that a tariff is necessary for the "encouragement and protection" of American markets. The leaders of the Democratic Party have always contended, and its leaders in this House now, as well as its last national platform, boldly assert that there should be no tariff for protection, but only such a tariff as may be absolutely necessary to make up an amount of revenue, which, when added to our internal revenues, will pay the running expenses of the Government. By the logic of this argument, the Democratic Party is bound to say that we should not have any tariff at all if the internal revenues alone shall ever furnish a sufficient amount of money to pay the running expenses of the Government, and this contingency may be upon us before we know it, since our internal revenues last year amounted to two-thirds of our total revenues, and since we are to add to those revenues in the future by an income tax.

Therefore the issue is squarely drawn between the Democratic Party, which is opposed to any tariff whatever for protection, and the Progressives and Progressive Republicans, who are in favor of a tariff for protection. The Democratic Party can not escape from the inevitable position of absolute free trade, into which it is precipitated by the cold logic of this issue, by pointing out to the farmers and manufacturers of this country that it is involuntarily giving to them in some instances a slight incidental protection by levying duties to make up a deficit in our national revenues. For, as stated, this deficit may be wiped out in a short time by an increase of our internal revenues, and then if the Democratic Party is in power we shall have absolute free trade. The Democratic Party from its infancy has persistently held to the doctrine of free trade, and it is holding to and practicing that doctrine now as far as it is possible for it to do so in presenting to the country the Underwood-Woodrow bill. Probably it should be called the Woodrow-Underwood bill. [Laughter.] It was written, I understand, by UNDERWOOD and underwritten by Woodrow. [Laughter and applause.]

On page 14 of the report filed with the present bill, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] gives the country an insight into the true scope and nature of the measure when he says that in framing it the sole object had in mind was—

> The establishment of duties designed to produce revenue for the Government, and without thought of protection.

From the doctrine asserted in the paragraph just quoted, the Progressives and the Progressive Republicans of this House enter their vigorous protest and dissent. And from that doctrine I believe that at least three-fourths of the citizens of this country will dissent.

Our distinguished President agrees fully with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and in so doing the President is in keeping with the free-trade principles of the Democratic Party. On April 8 the Chief Executive honored this body and the Senate, sitting in joint session, with a personal visit. The only specific statement in the speech read to us by the President on that occasion was the following declaration touching the proposed tariff revision, concerning which the President said:

> We must abolish everything that bears even the semblance of privilege or of any kind of artificial advantage, and put our business men and producers under the stimulation of a constant necessity to be efficient, economical, and enterprising, masters of competitive supremacy, better workers and merchants than any in the world.

I cite these declarations of the leaders of the Democratic Party to show that they are opposed to a tariff for protection. It is true that some Democratic Congressmen and many Democratic voters favor a tariff for protection, but their party does not. They are in the wrong party, and they ought to join the Progressive Party or the Progressive Republicans. The present leaders of the Democratic Party are entitled to credit for one thing, and that is for sticking religiously to the free-trade doctrines of their party.

The President says that our producers must compete with the world without "any kind of artificial advantage" such as a protective tariff affords, and intimates with beautiful rhetoric that when our producers are reduced to the necessity of competing with foreign countries absolutely without protection they will become "masters of competitive supremacy" and will be "better workers and merchants than any in the world."

The free-trade declarations of the President sounded very well. But every hard-headed, practical American citizen will realize that we must protect and foster our home markets by a reasonable protective tariff or we will be reduced to the level of foreign countries in the matter of wages and in our manner of living.

But the President only followed the Baltimore platform in declaring for free trade. That platform says:

> We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue * * *.

That the Democratic Party is plunging the country headlong toward absolute free trade there can be no question, when we consider the assertions of its leaders, its platform declarations, and its legislative actions. That the Democratic Party unqualifiedly asserts that we have no excuse for levying any tariff at all on imports, except to make up the deficit in our national revenues, no Member of this House will dare to deny. Last year the total revenues of the United States from all sources was $938,522,481. Only one-third of this sum was realized from import duties, while one-third came from our internal-revenue taxes, and nearly one-third was realized from our postal revenues. Therefore it is plainly to be seen that the Democratic Party may in a short time, if continued in power, have an opportunity to place our country upon an absolute free-trade basis. Those who desire that this result be accomplished should support the Democratic Party. Those who are opposed to making our markets free to foreign countries should hereafter support the Progressive Party or the Progressive Republicans.

The present bill takes a long step toward the ultimate absolute free trade to which the Democratic Party boasts that it is drifting. By this bill American markets are made practically free to all the world, so far as agricultural products are concerned. The farmers are the first class that are to be subject to Democratic free trade.

On page 24 of the Underwood report appears the following statement relating to agricultural products:

> In the effort to relieve the consumer and to mitigate the high cost of living Schedule G, which deals with agricultural products, has been thoroughly revised and important reductions have been made.

No doubt that statement, coming from the leader of the Democratic Party in this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD], will fill the farmers of this country with hilarity and greatly increase their admiration for the unterrified Democracy.

But if the farmer is not filled with exuberance by the statement just quoted, he may turn over to the next page of the report, where his eyes will meet with this most friendly and encouraging declaration:

> Schedule K, dealing with wools and woolen manufactures, has been the center of criticism for many years, and the committee has given it careful study. The result has been to make raw wool free of duty. * * *

After giving the matter "careful study," the Democratic Ways and Means Committee decided to aid the farmers of this country by putting raw wool on the free list, while retaining a duty of 25 per cent on blankets, 35 per cent on dress goods and clothing, and 50 per cent on carpets. The farmer was only asking for an 18 per cent ad valorem duty on raw wool, which would only amount to about 3 cents a pound, but he was refused even that.

Neither the Progressive Party nor the progressive Republicans are in favor of a tariff which, like the existing Republican tariff, amounts to more than protection in many cases; nor do they believe in taking all the tariff off of any article grown or manufactured in this country by honest competitive producers. The tariff bill now presented does take all the tariff off many articles grown in this country by honest, bona fide, competitive producers, notably the products of the farmer, and for that reason it becomes pertinent to inquire whether the present bill, if passed, would not do more harm than good.

The farmers are the bone and sinew of any country. They certainly have as high a claim upon the Nation for a reasonable protective tariff for their products as have the manufacturers. Foodstuffs are too high I admit, but it is because of high transportation rates and combinations of packers and middlemen. The farmer deserves all he gets. When the Union Station in this city, which was built partly by the Government, was completed, the committee in charge cast about for suitable legends to have carved upon the face of that magnificent marble structure. Three legends appear there, but the one which appeals most to me reads as follows:

> The farm—Best home of the family—Main source of national wealth—Foundation of civilized society—The natural providence.

Even the so-called Peerless Leader, in his first famous speech at the Chicago Democratic national convention in 1896, in a burst of eloquence declared:

> You may destroy the cities and towns of this country and they will be rebuilt, but destroy the farms and the grass will grow in your streets.

But we now find Mr. Bryan, as the premier of the present Democratic administration, sanctioning a tariff bill which practically places upon the free list nearly every article grown on the farm, while liberal protection is retained for the big business man and manufacturer in the city. If Mr. Bryan does not favor this bill at heart, he is at least giving to it his implied approval by remaining silent, for it is well known that Mr. Bryan does not remain silent when he has anything to say.

It is safe to assert that no tariff bill ever offered to the country discriminated against the farmer as this bill does. The placing of barbed wire and agricultural implements on the free list as an offering of compensation to the farmer for taking all the protection off of nearly everything he raises is a palpable attempt at deception and is an insult to the intelligence of the farmers. Everyone knows that the manufacture and output of these articles is already controlled internationally by American manufacturers and that the placing of them on the free list will not reduce their cost to American farmers one penny.

While the Democratic Party declared at Baltimore in favor of only such a tariff as might be absolutely necessary to make up the deficit in our national revenues, and therefore warned us that they would take all protection off of everything whenever the internal revenues of the country shall equal the running expenses of the Government, still the declarations of that platform, under any fair interpretation that could be given to it, warranted the farmers in believing that they would be the last to be touched by Democratic tariff revision. As proof of this I cite the following plank of the Baltimore platform, which was written by Col. Bryan himself:

> The high Republican tariff is the principal cause of the unequal distribution of wealth; it is a system of taxation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer; under its operations the American farmer and laboring man are the chief sufferers; it raises the cost of the necessaries of life to them, but does not protect their product or wages. The farmer sells largely in free markets and buys almost entirely in protected markets.

Col. Bryan, as the Moses of the Democratic Party at Baltimore, was then complaining because the Republicans had left the farmer to sell nearly all of his products in free markets.

Mr. GORDON. Is that true or false?

Mr. LAFFERTY. It will be absolutely true if the Underwood bill becomes a law, but it is not true under existing law. [Applause.]

The following is a partial list of agricultural products which are amply protected under existing law, but which will come into the United States absolutely free of duty under the Democratic tariff law now about to be enacted:

> Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, bacon, cured meats, milk and cream, condensed milk, potatoes, wool, rye and rye flour, swine, tallow, corn and corn meal, bran and wheat screenings, broom corn, lard, flax straw, buckwheat and buckwheat flour.

The Canadian farmers can and will compete with our farmers as to all of these products, but Canada places a heavy duty upon all of the articles mentioned, which will prevent our farmers from participating in the Canadian trade. Canada levies a duty of 3 cents per pound on fresh meats from the United States, whereas fresh meats from Canada are to come into this country free under the Democratic tariff bill. Canada levies a duty of 3 cents per pound on wool, whereas Canadian wool will come into the United States free of duty under the pending bill. Canada charges a duty of 1½ cents per pound on swine imported from the United States, whereas the Canadians may import swine into this country under the Democratic bill free of duty. Canada charges a duty of 1½ cents per pound on lard, 3½ cents per pound on milk products, 20 cents per bushel on potatoes, 10 cents per bushel on rye, 50 cents per barrel on rye flour, 25 cents per barrel on corn meal, and 20 per cent ad valorem on tallow, whereas all of these products will come into the United States free of duty from Canada and all other countries under the pending Democratic bill.

Under the Canadian law cattle and sheep on the hoof going into that Dominion from the United States must pay a duty of 25 per cent, whereas under the pending Democratic bill Canadian cattle and sheep on the hoof may come into this country on paying a duty of only 10 per cent. Butter going into Canada from this country must pay a duty of 4 cents per pound, while Canadian butter may come into this country under the pending bill on paying only 3 cents per pound. Under the Canadian law eggs imported from the United States are charged a duty of 3 cents per dozen, while under the proposed Democratic law Canadian eggs will only have to pay a duty of 2 cents per dozen.

Under the Canadian tariff law poultry going from the United States into Canada must pay a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem, while the proposed Democratic law will admit Canadian live poultry into the United States upon the payment of a duty of only 1 cent a pound and dressed poultry on the payment of a duty of only 2 cents a pound.

It remains to be seen what excuse the Democratic Party will have to offer for giving to the Canadian farmers better trading terms in this country than Canada will give to our farmers across the line. Many farmers were opposed to Canadian reciprocity because that bill admitted the exchange of many American and Canadian products upon terms of equality. The Underwood bill is bound to be far more injurious to the American farmer than the Canadian reciprocity pact could possibly have been.

The manner in which the Progressives and progressive Republicans would revise the tariff is stated in detail in the very admirable minority report to the pending bill made for the Progressives and progressive Republicans in this House by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. Whenever the Progressives and progressive Republicans shall be commissioned by the American people to revise the tariff, which important event will possibly take place at the fall elections next year and, in any event, not later than November, 1916, the plan outlined by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will be followed in good faith and to the letter. [Applause.] That plan contemplates a permanent, nonpolitical, scientific tariff commission and a complete revision of our tariff schedules downward to the actual difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, but provided always that we shall never give to any other country more advantageous trading terms than such country is willing to give to us, which principle of reciprocity is being flagrantly violated by the Democratic Party, to the injury of American farmers in favor of Canadian farmers, in the passage of the present bill.

Mr. GORDON. Is not that in direct violation of the Progressive platform adopted last fall?

Mr. LAFFERTY. No; it is in direct accord with the Progressive platform.

Mr. GORDON. Did not you promise to reduce the tariff?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. But you say unless they give us the same advantages.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That is always understood.

Mr. GORDON. Was that in your platform?

Mr. LAFFERTY. It was implied; as much so as that no man will permit another to assault him without hitting back.

Mr. GORDON. Why did you not put it in the platform?

Mr. MURDOCK. It is in the platform.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I thank the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], but I repeat that it is not necessary to put into a platform that which is necessarily implied. I might say that I would not go out on the street and assault a man, but it would be implied in the statement that if he hit me first I would hit him back. No party with one eye and a grain of sense will ever give trade conditions to a neighboring country which are better than they are willing to give to us. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. The promise you made was contingent.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Not at all; I have fully answered that question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that the rule is that when a Member desires to interrupt another he must first address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUBEY). The gentleman from Kansas is correct, and gentlemen who wish to interrupt must first address the Chair.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party, however, can not be charged with being inconsistent in making a wholesale revision of the tariff without regard to exact information on the subject or in placing many agricultural products on the free list. The Democratic Party has expressly disclaimed that it has given a thought to the principle of protection in the preparation of the present bill. On the other hand, it affirmatively avers that it does not believe in protection, and that the only reason why it proposes to retain any import duties at all is to make up the deficit in our national revenues. The Democratic Party is unquestionably joined to its idol—free trade—and the issue having been now clearly drawn, the American people as a whole must either affirm or repudiate that doctrine at the election next year and at the general election in 1916. The experiences of the past leave little doubt that the verdict will be in favor of protection.

The Democratic Party is the very opposite of the Progressive Party and progressive Republicans. The Democratic leaders stand now where they have always stood, for free trade and bourbonism, while the Progressives and progressive Republicans stand for the protection of our home markets and for modern laws to control industrial combinations. [Applause.]

The continuation of the Democratic Party in power and the crystallization of its central idea of free trade into permanent law would be a stumbling block, if not a complete bar, to every measure for the uplift and advancement of America that the progressives of all parties favor. The Progressive Party and the progressive Republicans favor the placing of certain obligations upon the industries of this country in the interests of labor and in the interests of the consuming public which are not placed upon similar industries in foreign countries. Therefore, if we reserve to ourselves the right to regulate our industries by placing upon them obligations not borne by their competitors in the foreign commerce, it goes without saying that we should protect our home industries in a reasonable degree against foreign competition. The Democratic idea of free trade would mean the abandonment of the progressive measures that intelligent men and women of this country of all parties are demanding.

The Progressives and progressive Republicans propose to pass a law providing that no manufacturer in this country who employs child labor shall be permitted to engage in our interstate trade. They propose to pass a law providing that no American manufacturer engaged in our interstate trade shall employ females for less than a specified minimum wage, which shall be a living wage. They propose to exclude from our interstate commerce any corporation refusing to establish an eight-hour day for its employees. It must be clear to everyone that if these laws are to be enacted and enforced in the United States, thereby making this the best country in which to live of any in the world, that we must have a reasonable protective tariff and not free trade.

The Progressives and progressive Republicans favor the passage of a law creating an interstate trade commission, with power to regulate and control, in the interests of the consumer and in the interests of labor, all industrial corporations engaged in our interstate trade. By this law they propose to make it unlawful for any corporation engaged in interstate commerce to exact a price for any commodity which shall be unreasonable, or to resort to any practice, scheme, or device that shall be against public policy or dangerous to the public welfare or unfair to any competitor or employee, and they propose to give to the interstate trade commission full and plenary powers to carry this law into effect. They propose identically the same kind of control over industrial corporations, through an interstate trade commission, that is now had over carrier corporations through the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Dickering with the tariff question is but scratching the bark on the outside of the tree as compared with going to the heart of the question of the high cost of living as proposed by the Progressives and progressive Republicans through the law that I have here outlined. That there is need for such a statute is amply proved by the fact that all political parties profess to be in favor of a law which will "control big business."

Controlling monopolies or near-monopolies does not mean to make them be good and go to Sunday school. It means for the Government, through some duly constituted tribunal, to have something to say about the prices they shall exact from the public. Big business resists with all the power that it can command any effort put forth by the people, through their Government, to bring it under just control. For example, it was nearly 30 years ago that the Interstate Commerce Commission was created with a view to having it exercise some control over the rates of common carriers.

The bill creating the commission provided that it should be unlawful for any interstate carrier to charge an unreasonable rate. And the commission was given power to decide when a rate was unreasonable, but the commission was given no power to substitute a reasonable rate for the one declared to be unreasonable, but the new rate was left to the carrier itself. Not until 1909 was the original interstate commerce act amended, giving to the commission the power to initiate rates, and even then the commission found itself unable to fix rates which would be fair to the public, because it had no means of ascertaining the physical valuations of the carriers.

The commission thereupon made three annual reports to Congress, praying that it be given the power to make a physical appraisement of the common carriers of this country, and only during the last session of the last Congress was such power conferred upon the commission, together with the necessary appropriation to make the appraisement. We may now expect that in the course of a year or two the Interstate Commerce Commission, after 30 years of effort, will have gotten to the point where it can really protect the public from extortionate rates.

What the Progressive Party and the progressive Republicans propose to do is to give to an interstate trade commission the same powers over industrial corporations that the Interstate Commerce Commission is just now about to begin to exercise in fact over interstate carrier corporations. There is nothing radical about that.

The people of this country know what they want and they are overwhelmingly in favor of the interstate trade commission. They are overwhelmingly in favor of all of the other laws for the benefit of the average citizen proposed by the Progressive Party and the progressive Republicans. [Applause.] The people have already found that they can not expect relief from the old standpat leaders of the Republican Party. They are just now beginning to realize that the difference between the standpat Republican leaders, who have just gone out of power, and the standpat Democratic leaders, who have just come into power, is the difference between two peas in the same pod. The party representing the principles now advocated by the Progressive Party and the progressive Republicans is the party that I shall support in the future, no matter by what name it may be called.

Big business and the money power has been able for 50 years to defeat practically every effort that has been made by the American people to bring them under control of law. In so doing they have controlled the channels of news and actively participated in political conventions, and they have influenced legislatures and Congresses.

The tentacles of big business and the money power extend into every American city and State. The presidents, vice presidents, directors, and attorneys of their local street railroad, electric light, and telephone companies are among the influential men of every congressional district. These men, prior to the days of the direct primary, cut an important figure in congressional and legislative nominations. But few men have served in the American Congress who have not been flattered at home by the class of men to whom I have referred, if they were conservative and made no effort to secure legislation for the common people, or who have not been ridiculed and treated with contempt at home by the class of men to whom I have referred, and their newspapers, if they advocated legislation that would bring under control of law the money power and big business. How many times have we been told that any proposed law in the interest of the people will "hurt business"? That is he stock expression of those who are reaping extortionate profits in the absence of laws to protect the public.

I have not made the case of the people against big business and the money power as strong as the facts will fully justify. It would be impossible for any man of ordinary ability to do so. Let anyone who doubts this statement consider for a moment the present conditions in this country. The total wealth of the United States is $125,000,000,000. Fifty men own 40 per cent of this wealth. Two hundred thousand men own 70 per cent of this wealth, leaving only 30 per cent for the remaining 91,800,000 of our people, figuring that we have 92,000,000 people all told.

Such an astounding unequal distribution of wealth could not possibly have occurred under just laws. It is easy to see how the national wealth has all drifted into the hands of the money power when we look about us and observe conditions.

In every city is to be found the Bell telephone system, a street car system, an electric light system, a gas system, several express companies, and several trunk lines of railroad. But one may look about in vain to find any citizen of the average city who owns a dollar's worth of stock in any of these public-utility corporations. The stock is owned by the money power of New York, London, and a few other financial centers in this country and Europe. In nine cases out of ten these public-utility corporations are charging extortionate rates. At the end of the year the average laborer or small-salaried man has contributed about one-third of his earnings to these monopolies alone. The rest of his earnings have gone for food and clothing for himself and family and for the general necessities of his household. In purchasing the latter he has also come in contact in many instances with big business and the money power. He has paid tribute during the year to the American Sugar Refining Co., the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil Co., and other industrial combinations controlling household necessities.

As an illustration of the astounding profits that big business is exacting from a gullible public let me give just one instance. A few years ago I went into the telegraph office in Portland to send a telegram of 97 words to Washington. The agent said it would be $6.50. I told him that I wanted to send it Government rate. He then said the charge would be $1.10, a difference of $5.40 on one little 97-word telegram, and it is certain the company was not handling the Government business at a loss.

The various State public-service commissions should at once make appraisements of local public-utility corporations and fix rates accordingly. As a result they would reduce telephone rentals at least one-half; electric-light, gas, and water charges about the same, where owned by private corporations; and street car charges would be reduced to 3 cents, and the companies would be compelled to furnish seats. Right here in Washington the two street car systems each charge 5-cent fares, refuse to give interchangeable transfers, and herd the population in the cars like sheep. As many as 50 people are frequently crowded in the aisles of the large cars and stand the entire distance of their ride. The officers of the companies have instructed the motorman and conductor, when the seats are full, to begin the herding process. They carry these orders out by driving the people forward in the car, men and women being indiscriminately crowded together, until the car will not hold another passenger. This sort of outrage would not be tolerated in any city in the United States outside of Washington, but as the people here can not vote they are not to be censured. The fare is too high everywhere. To make it convenient in all the cities of the United States to adopt the 3-cent fare, I have introduced the Bulkely bill to coin 3-cent pieces.

Unless our public-service commissions shall fix reasonable rates, then I shall favor Government ownership of public-utility monopolies; and I favor such ownership anyway in the case of telephones and telegraphs. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. now owns every Bell telephone system in the United States, and it owns the Western Union Telegraph Co. It also owns the Western Electric Co., of Chicago, which manufactures all the switchboards and instruments, and in that way even controls and receives all the profits of the farmers' lines. If these facts that I am here stating can be disproved, I will resign from Congress. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co., in its own advertisements in financial journals in New York, boasts of owning all the Bell telephone systems in every city of the United States and the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Western Electric Co. They charge for business phones about $8 a month, and I will warrant that no investigation into their cost and upkeep of plants would justify them in charging over $4 a month for business phones, and it would more probably be less than the latter figure. Residence phone rentals should likewise be cut in half at least.

I also favor a Government parcel express. This means of transportation at cost would form a conduit between the kitchen in the city and the farm in the country. A genuine parcel express would do more than any other one thing to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, we who favor progressive laws are frequently taunted with the question as to why the multimillionaire, George W. Perkins, is for the progressive laws if they would really control the money power. It is easy to answer that question. Every man of wealth ought to favor these progressive laws. In that way alone can prosperity, happiness, and peace for all be secured. In my speech in this House on August 21, 1911, I made this statement:

> If those who now enjoy the profits from large blocks of industrial and public-service corporation stocks want their children and their grandchildren to enjoy that same opportunity they will see the wisdom and the necessity of placing all industrial and public-service corporations upon a basis that is fair to the public. Otherwise Government ownership will come as surely as one day follows another. For that reason I stated in my campaign speeches that those who advocated Government control, as I do, were in reality the best friends of the owners of such stocks.

On August 17, 1912, in a speech on Boston Common, Col. Roosevelt was questioned by a man in the crowd who called out, "How about Perkins?"

"I am delighted to tell you about Mr. Perkins," the Colonel replied.

"Mr. Perkins is a rich man," he said. "He came into this movement not at my request but of his own initiative. I felt just the same curiosity that a man in the crowd who asked me about him felt. I said to him, 'Mr. Perkins, why are you supporting me?' Mr. Perkins flushed and said he did not know but that he ought to be offended; but I told him he should not be, and that I was both surprised and pleased to have his support.

"'The prime reason why I am with you,' he told me, 'is because I have children. I have come to the conclusion that this country won't be a good place for my children unless we have substantial justice; unless the relations between capital and labor are on a better basis. I wish to support any movement that will bring that about.'"

Even the late Postmaster General, a dyed-in-the-wool, old-line Republican, in his last two annual reports, advocated Government ownership of telegraphs, to be operated in connection with the Post Office Department, but Congress paid no attention to him. No Congress ever will give the public any substantial relief until the Progressives or genuine progressive Republicans prevail.

Under the system of permitting big business and the money power to go uncontrolled by law it is little wonder that they have acquired practically all of the wealth of the United States and that the average citizen finds himself unable, while paying unjust tribute to them, to get anything more out of life than the most meager living. No man can make me believe that under any fair system of laws in this country—a country having the greatest resources of any nation in the world—we would find any honest, sober, and industrious man working all of his life, 10 hours a day, for a bare living. But that is just the condition we do find in this country to-day. Under just laws no man or woman would be required to work more than 8 hours a day. Under just laws every able-bodied man who would work from the time he was 21 until age should entitle him to retire would be able to buy with his earnings a comfortable living for himself and family, to take a vacation of 30 to 60 days each year in the mountains or at the seashore, to educate his children, and to lay by an ample competency for his old age besides.

In conclusion, I desire to say that I was raised a conservative and am a conservative now. It is only the cold facts that I have tried to present in this discussion which might seem to make my remarks appear radical, if they do so appear. I was practically raised in a law office, and lawyers are, by their very nature, conservative. One of the first books I ever read was Blackstone's Commentaries, and one of the few things that I recall, outside of the fact that the author had a most remarkable vocabulary, is that he said that the object of the law is to protect the weak against the aggressions of the strong. If Sir William Blackstone were living to-day, and a citizen of the United States, he would be a Progressive, or a progressive Republican, which means the same thing. [Loud applause.]

Some of the progressive measures introduced in the Sixty-third Congress by Mr. LAFFERTY:

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

A bill (H. R. 4384) to create an interstate trade commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, corporation, or association engaged in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, to hereafter employ in its business any child under 14 years of age, or to employ any female for less than $6 per week, or to work any employee longer than 8 hours in any one day or longer than 48 hours in any one week, except in case of an emergency or upon a permit from the interstate trade commission, which it is hereby authorized to issue temporarily upon a showing which in its opinion warrants such action: Provided, That employees engaged on railroad trains, steamboats, steamships, or other vessels or equipment of common carriers may be employed as long as 12 hours a day or as much as 72 hours a week, but such employees shall have at least 6 full days' rest each calendar month, and any person, company, corporation, or association violating any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each separate offense shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That every corporation engaged in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, not subject to the provisions of the act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and acts supplementary and amendatory thereof, and whose gross annual receipts or the total annual gross receipts of whose subsidiary companies for the calendar year 1911 were, or for any calendar year thereafter shall be, in excess of $5,000,000 shall be subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That every corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or that may hereafter become subject to the provisions of this act, is hereby declared to be a quasi public agency.

SEC. 4. That the price or prices at which any corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall sell or dispose of any article of merchandise, or any product whatsoever, shall be just, fair, and reasonable, and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to sell or dispose of any article of merchandise, or any product whatsoever, at a price or at prices that are unjust, unfair, or unreasonable, and every corporation subject to the provisions of this act is hereby prohibited from so doing.

SEC. 5. That every practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion or extension thereof, shall be just, fair, and reasonable and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every corporation subject to the provisions of this act in the conduct of its business is hereby prohibited from engaging in any practice, or from using any means, method, or system, or from pursuing any policy, or from resorting to any device, scheme, or contrivance whatsoever that is unjust, unfair, or unreasonable, or that is contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and every act or thing in this section prohibited is hereby declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 6. That every corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall deal justly and fairly with competitors and the public, and it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to grant to any person or persons any special privilege or advantage which shall be unjust and unfair to others, or unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or to enter into any special contract, agreement, or arrangement with any person or persons which shall be unjustly and unreasonably discriminatory against others, or which shall give to such person or persons an unfair and unjust advantage over others, or that shall give to the people of any locality or section of the country any unfair, unjust, or unreasonable advantage over the people of any other locality or section of the country, or that shall be contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, and any and all the acts or things in this section declared to be unlawful are hereby prohibited.

SEC. 7. That whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made to the commission hereinafter created, or after full hearing under an order for investigation and hearing made by the said commission on its own initiative, the commission shall be of opinion that any price or prices whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act for any article of merchandise or product, or that any practice, method, means, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance used by any such corporation in conducting its business, or in the management, control, regulation, promotion, or extension thereof, is unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial or contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be a just, fair, and reasonable price to be charged for such article of merchandise or product, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged until further order of the commission, and to determine and prescribe what practice, method, means, or system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance is just, fair, and reasonable, and not contrary to public policy or dangerous to the public welfare, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that such corporation shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the commission finds the same to exist, and such corporation shall not thereafter charge or collect or accept for such article of merchandise or product a price in excess of the maximum price so prescribed, and shall adopt, conform to, and observe the practice, method, means, policy, and system so prescribed, and cease to use any device, scheme, or contrivance prohibited by the order of the commission.

All orders of the said commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than 30 days, and shall continue in force for such period of time, not exceeding 2 years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the commission, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Interstate Trade Commission, which shall be composed of seven commissioners, and the said Interstate Trade Commission is referred to hereinafter as "the commission."

SEC. 9. That on the taking effect of this act the Bureau of Corporations shall cease to exist and shall be merged into and become a part of the commission, and the person who at that time shall be the Commissioner of Corporations shall become a member of the commission and continue as such for a period of two years, and said person shall also for a period of one year be the chairman of the commission, at the expiration of which time, and annually thereafter, the commission shall elect a chairman; and the Deputy Commissioner of Corporations shall become one of said commission, and shall hold his office for a period of one year. The commission shall appoint a secretary of the commission, who shall hold his office at the pleasure of the commission, and all the clerks and employees in the Bureau of Corporations shall become clerks and employees of the commission, and all the duties and powers of the Bureau of Corporations are hereby transferred to, granted, and bestowed upon the commission, and any funds belonging to said Bureau of Corporations which by law are authorized to be expended by said bureau are hereby transferred to the commission, which is hereby authorized and empowered to expend the same.

SEC. 10. That the commission shall consist of seven members, not more than four of whom shall be of the same political party. Except as hereinbefore provided, the members of the commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the first appointees shall hold their positions for periods of three, four, five, six, and seven years, respectively; and in making such appointments the President shall designate the length of terms of such appointees, and thereafter the members of said commission shall be appointed for a term of seven years. The members of the commission shall each receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and the secretary of the commission shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. In case of vacancy the appointment shall be for the unexpired term of the member whose retirement from the commission caused the vacancy.

Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. No person in the employ of or holding any official relation to any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or owning stocks or bonds thereof, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of or hold such office. Said commissioner shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

No vacancy in the commission shall impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to make and establish rules and regulations not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States to aid in the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act, and may, by such rules and regulations, prohibit any particular or specific act or acts, practice, method, system, policy, device, scheme, or contrivance that is contrary to any of the provisions of this act.

That the decisions of the commission shall be final as to the facts, and in all cases of appeal from any decision of the commission the court shall have jurisdiction to pass only upon questions of law and to determine whether or not the commission acted within the scope of its authority, or whether or not the decision in effect confiscates property or takes the same without due process of law.

SEC. 11. That in case any corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall do, cause to be done, or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such corporation shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for double the amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act, together with a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in every case of recovery, which attorney's fee should be taxed and collected as a part of the costs in the case.

SEC. 12. That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the commission, as provided in this act, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such corporation shall be liable under the provisions of this act in the Commerce Court; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt.

In any such action brought for the recovery of damages the court before which the same shall be pending may compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of such corporation defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

SEC. 13. That any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, who, alone or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, be subject to a fine not to exceed $5,000 for each offense, and, in the discretion of the court, may be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years.

SEC. 14. That the commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from such corporation full and complete information necessary to enable the commission to perform the duties and carry out the object for which it was created; and the commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act.

And upon the request of the commission it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the commission may apply to institute in the proper court and prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecutions shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

SEC. 15. That any person, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society or other organization, or any body politic or municipal corporation, complaining of any act done or omitted to be done by any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, in contravention of the provisions of this act, may apply to the commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the complaint thus made shall be forwarded by the commission to such corporation, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint, or to answer the same in writing, within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission. If such corporation, within the time specified, shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, it shall be relieved of liability to the complainant only for the particular violation of the law thus complained of. If such corporation shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the matter complained of in such a manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

The commission shall have full authority and power at any time to institute an inquiry, on its own motion, in any case and as to any matter or thing concerning which a complaint is authorized to be made, to or before said commission by any provision of this act, or concerning which any question may arise under any of the provisions of this act or relating to the enforcement of any of the provisions of this act. And the said commission shall have the same power and authority to proceed with any inquiry instituted on its own motion as though it had been appealed to by complaint or petition under any of the provisions of this act, including the power to make and enforce any order or orders in the case, or relating to the matter or thing concerning which the inquiry is had, excepting orders for the payment of money. No complaint shall at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant.

SEC. 16. That the commission is hereby given authority on its own initiative to institute and conduct an investigation to determine whether or not any corporation subject to the provisions of this act was organized in violation of the provisions of the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or is doing business in violation of the provisions of said act; and if, after investigation, the commission shall conclude that any such corporation was organized in violation of the provisions of said act, or is doing business in violation of the provisions of said act, the commission may issue an order citing such corporation to appear and answer to the charge in such matter; and if on final hearing the commission shall find that such corporation was organized in violation of the provisions of said act, it shall make an order providing for the dissolution of such corporation; and if the commission shall find that any such corporation is doing business in violation of any of the provisions of said act, it shall make such order or orders as will prevent the further violation of said act on the part of such corporation; and thereafter such corporation so found to have been organized in violation of the provisions of said act, or so found to be doing business in violation of said act, shall cease to engage in interstate commerce except upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the commission.

SEC. 17. That the following sections and provisions hereinafter mentioned, in so far as they are applicable and are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended to and put in force in all matters relating to or pertaining to the commission herein created and to every corporation subject to the provisions of this act; and the power, authority, and duties conferred by the sections and provisions hereinafter mentioned upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as the same are applicable, are hereby conferred upon the commission created by this act; and the duties, liabilities, and rights conferred upon common carriers by such sections and provisions are hereby conferred upon every corporation subject to the provisions of this act; and the rights, privileges, and liabilities conferred upon any person or persons, firm, corporation, association, or locality by such sections and provisions are hereby conferred upon any such person or persons, firm, corporation, association, or locality, namely, sections 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the act approved June 18, 1910, entitled 'An act to create a Commerce Court, and to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes."

SEC. 18. That this act shall take effect and be in force 60 days after its passage.

THREE-CENT PIECES.

A bill (H. R. 4356) to authorize the coinage of 3-cent pieces, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That as soon as practicable after the passage of this act there shall be coined at the mints of the United States a 3-cent piece of the standard weight of 60 troy grains, with no greater deviation from the standard weight than 2 grains each piece, and said coin shall be composed of 75 per cent copper and 25 per cent nickel. The diameter and the devices of said coin shall be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That upon one side there shall be an inscription of the word "Liberty" and the year of the coinage, and upon the reverse there shall be an inscription of the words "United States of America" and a designation of the value of the coin. Said 3-cent piece shall be a legal tender in any payment to the amount of 30 cents.

SEC. 2. That all laws now in force relating to the minor coins of the United States and the striking or coining of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coin, or for any other purpose, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act all 1-cent pieces coined at the mints of the United States shall be of the standard weight of 48 troy grains, with no greater deviation from the standard weight than 2 grains each piece, and shall be composed of 75 per cent copper and 25 per cent nickel.

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY.

A bill (H. R. 2980) to establish a primary election for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President.

Be it enacted, etc., That every nomination of a candidate or candidates for the offices of President or Vice President of the United States made by any political party, as hereinafter defined, shall be made in and by a primary election to be held in the several States at the time and in the manner herein provided; and it shall be unlawful for any person to be a member of or participate in the proceedings of any caucus, convention, or meeting of such political party called or held for the purpose of nominating any such candidates, or looking toward such nomination, in any method or manner except by and through the primary election established by this act.

SEC. 2. That any political organization which, at the presidential election last preceding the time herein fixed for any primary election hereby established, nominated candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, and which cast in the aggregate in all the States 5 per cent of all the votes cast for President of the United States at the last preceding presidential election, reckoning the votes for opposing electoral tickets in the several States as votes cast for President, shall be deemed a political party for the purposes of this act; and any political organization, whether it has heretofore nominated candidates or not, which at the first primary election held hereunder proposes candidates for said offices in the manner herein prescribed, to be voted for at the first primary election or any succeeding election, whose candidates for President and Vice President of the United States receive the aforementioned percentage of votes cast shall be thereafter held to be a political party within the meaning of the act.

SEC. 3. That every person qualified under the laws of the State of which he is or shall be a citizen to vote for a governor or a Member of the House of Representatives in Congress at the election for said offices last preceding any primary election held under this act shall be a qualified voter at such primary election upon complying with the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the primary election herein established shall be held in all the States and at each polling place in all the States on the second Monday of July, 1916, and upon the second Monday of July of every four years thereafter.

SEC. 5. That in those States in which by the law candidates for governor or for Members of the House of Representatives in Congress are nominated in and by a primary election, the two primaries may be held simultaneously by the same judges and clerks; otherwise the judges and clerks of the primary election for the nomination of candiadtes for governor or Members of the House of Representatives in Congress last preceding shall be the judges and clerks of the primary election held under this act. Vacancies caused by death, failure to appear, or refusal to act shall be filled by the judge or the judges appearing. Before entering upon their respective duties each of them shall take an oath of office which shall be substantially in the following form, to wit:

STATE OF ———, COUNTY OF ———, ss:

I, ———, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully perform the duties of a —— of the primary election for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, now about to be held.

——— ———.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this — day of ——, —.

——— ———.

In those States in which neither candidates for governor nor for Members of the House of Representatives in Congress are by law nominated in and by a primary election the judges and clerks of the last preceding general State election or national election for Representatives in Congress shall be the judges and clerks of the primary election held under this act. Vacancies caused by death, failure to appear, or refusal to act shall be filled by the judge or judges appearing. Before entering upon their respective duties each of them shall take an oath of office, which shall be substantially in the form heretofore prescribed.

For their services in holding each primary election herein provided for, and in making the returns herein required, each judge and each clerk shall receive the sum of $5, to be paid by the United States as hereinafter prescribed.

In the States having laws for primary elections, as aforesaid, the primary elections herein established shall be held according to the laws of the several States, in so far as they are practicable and not inconsistent with this act; that is to say, as to the polling places, the time of opening and closing the polls, the method of determining party affiliations, if any, the manner of entering the names of voters upon the lists, and generally all things which go to the right of the voter to cast his ballot and to the manner of voting. The form of ballot throughout the United States shall be uniform, and is herein specifically set forth.

In the States having no laws for primary elections, as aforesaid, the following procedure shall be observed, namely: The polling places shall be the same or substantially the same as the polling places at the last preceding general State election or national election for Members of the House of Representatives in Congress. The polls shall open at 8 o'clock a. m. and close at 7 o'clock p. m. The judges at each polling place shall be provided with a list of the qualified voters of the polling precinct or district taken from the latest registration list or from the record of the last preceding general State election or national election for Members of the House of Representatives in Congress, at the discretion of the State board, and those persons so listed, and no others, shall be permitted to vote unless, where the polling list of the preceding election is used, it is made to appear to the judges under oath, first, that the proposed voter had become a resident of the precinct or district since the said last preceding election, and had cast his vote at said election in some other precinct or district of the United States, or had since the last election become of lawful age; or, second, that having been a qualified voter of the precinct at the said last preceding election was, by reason of temporary absence from the precinct or district on election day, or by reason of illness, unable to cast his vote at such election.

No canvassing or electioneering for or against any candidate shall be carried on within 100 feet of the polling place while the primary election is in progress. The clerk or clerks of the election shall, as the votes are cast, write the name and address of each voter, which list, having been certified by the judges, shall be returned to the State canvassing board hereinafter provided for with the returns of the election.

SEC. 6. That the ballot to be used in all the States and at all polling places shall be printed on plain white paper, and shall be in substantially the following form:

(Name printed in) Party.	(Name printed in) Party.	Independent of party.
For President of the United States.	For President of the United States.	For President of the United States.
☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Blank.)
☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Blank.)
☐ (Blank.)	☐ (Blank.)
For Vice President of the United States.	For Vice President of the United States.	For Vice President of the United States.
☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Blank.)
☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Name printed in.)	☐ (Blank.)
☐ (Blank.)	☐ (Blank.)

The columns for party candidates shall be as numerous as may be required, and there shall be one column without names of proposed candidates denominated, as aforesaid, "Independent of party." In the lines in the party columns shall be printed the names of proposed party candidates for President, Vice President, and at the left of each line a square, as shown, and the voter's choice shall be made known by crossing the square thus ☒.

In each party column there shall be a sufficient number of lines left blank, so that each elector shall have the opportunity to vote for his preference as the candidate of his party, even though the name of his preference is not printed on the ballot.

No voter shall vote in more than one column, and if he does the entire vote shall be rejected. A vote for two persons for President or Vice President shall also be rejected.

SEC. 7. That there is hereby established a national canvassing board for primary elections and for the distribution of both primary and final election publicity pamphlets, to be known hereafter in this act as the national board. It shall be composed of five persons, each of whom shall receive for his compensation, to be paid by the United States for his services in connection with each primary and final election, the sum of $3,000, and each of whom shall serve for four years and until his successor is appointed. The members of said board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, upon the nomination of the chairmen of the several national political committees, so that, in so far as it is possible, there shall be upon said board a member affiliated with each of the political parties as herein defined.

There is also established a State canvassing and returning board for primary elections and for the distribution of both primary and final election publicity pamphlets in each State. The said several boards shall be composed of three persons, each of whom shall receive for his compensation, to be paid by the United States for his services in connection with each primary or final election, the sum of $250, and each of whom shall serve for four years and until his successor is appointed. The members of said boards shall be residents of the State wherein they are to serve and shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, upon the nomination of the chairmen of the several national political committees, each of said chairmen having the right to name one person for each of said boards, so that, in so far as possible, there shall be upon each of said boards a member affiliated with each of the political parties as herein defined. The powers and duties of each of said boards are hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 8. That no candidate for nomination as a candidate of any such political party for the offices of President and Vice President shall have his name printed upon the official primary ballot of his party unless at least 45 days prior to the date fixed for holding the primary election a nomination paper shall have been filed in his behalf with said national board. All nomination papers shall be in substantially the following form:

"I, the undersigned, a qualified elector of ——— County, and State of ———, and a member of the ——— Party, hereby nominate ———, of ——— County, State of ———, who is affiliated with and is a member of the ——— Party, as a candidate for the office of ———, to be voted for at the primary election to be held on the second Monday of July, 19—."

The said nomination paper shall consist of sheets with the above heading, of uniform size, about 8½ by 13 inches. No signatures shall be counted unless they are on sheets each having such form written or printed at the top thereof. No signer of a nomination paper shall sign more than one such nomination paper for the same office, and only one candidate shall be petitioned for or nominated in the same nomination paper. Each signer of a nomination paper shall add his residence, with street and number, if any, and the date of signing.

For all nominations for President and Vice President all signers of each separate part of a nomination paper shall reside in the same State. The nomination paper when filed shall not be withdrawn nor added to nor any signature thereon revoked or recalled. The affidavit or affidavits of a qualified elector or electors shall be appended to each such nomination paper, stating that he is personally acquainted with all or certain of the persons who have signed the same; that he knows them to be electors of the State or county, as the case may be, and believes them to be affiliated with the party named therein; that he knows that they signed the same with full knowledge of the contents thereof; that their respective residences are truly stated therein; and that each signer signed the same on the date set opposite his name; but such affidavit shall not be made by a candidate for nomination. If there be more than one such affidavit, they must, taken together, include all the signers of the nomination paper.

The nomination papers above described and required shall be signed as follows:

If for the office of President or Vice President of the United States, by at least one-half of 1 per cent of the voters of the party (as shown by the returns of the last general election) in each of at least five States, and in the aggregate not less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total vote of his party as shown by the returns of the last general election in the United States.

The vote to be taken for the purpose of computing the percentage shall be the vote cast for the head of the ticket.

The said national board shall cause to be printed and keep on hand a sufficient quantity of nomination paper blanks, in form as provided for in this act, and shall furnish the same on application to any qualified elector desiring to petition for the nomination of any candidate, or to any person who intends to be a candidate for the office of President or Vice President. Any such nomination papers or parts thereof may be sent either directly to the said national board or to the State board of the State from which they come, and by the State board transmitted to the said national board.

SEC. 9. That said national board shall cause to be prepared and printed as public documents both a primary election publicity pamphlet and a final election publicity pamphlet, which pamphlet shall, at Government expense, be mailed to each registered voter as provided in this section. At least 30 days prior to any primary or final election each State board shall notify the national board as to the number of such pamphlets that, in their opinion, will be required to supply each registered voter in their several States. At least 20 days prior to any primary or final election the national board shall send in bulk to the various State boards the number of such pamphlets so required, which pamphlets shall be inclosed in sealed manila envelopes and bear the Government frank. Each State board shall cause one of such pamphlets to be mailed to each registered voter at least 10 days prior to any such primary or final election. Such publicity pamplets shall contain only the statements and arguments of the several candidates for President and Vice President, or for nomination to those offices, which statements may include portrait cuts of the candidates, each candidate for President or for nomination for President being limited to eight pages, and each candidate for Vice President or for nomination for Vice President being limited to four pages. Copy for such pamphlets shall be filed with the national board by the respective candidates at least 30 days prior to any such primary or final election, and if the same contains any reflection upon the honor, integrity, or character of any other candidate proof shall be submitted that a certified copy thereof in full was served upon such other candidate at least 40 days prior to such primary or final election, in default of which such matter shall be expunged from the statement of any candidate by said national board. Each candidate shall pay for space in the primary election publicity pamphlet at the rate of $1,000 per page, or fraction thereof, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States by said national board. No charge shall be made for space in the final election publicity pamphlet.

SEC. 10. That at least 30 days before any such primary election the said National Board shall transmit to each State board a certified list showing the name and post-office address of each person for whom a nomination paper sufficiently signed has been filed in its office for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, and at the same time shall transmit to the said board a sufficient number of printed ballots for use at the primary election in that State. The primary ballots shall be substantially in the form hereinbefore prescribed, and shall have printed upon them in proper columns the names of all the persons for whom sufficient nomination papers have been filed for President and Vice President. The names of candidates proposed for nomination for President and Vice President shall be so arranged that the name of each of the proposed candidates shall be first upon a substantially equal number of ballots.

SEC. 11. That each State board shall, immediately after receiving the ballots from the National Board, notify by written or printed letter each of the judges and clerks of election who are to act under the provisions hereof of their duties as herein prescribed, and shall put in the possession of the judges, or one of them, at each polling place a sufficient number of ballots for use at that polling place, and shall also take the necessary steps to supply said judges with any lists of voters that may be required by the laws of the State or by the provisions of this act, and shall further provide all supplies that may be necessary to enable the said judges and clerks to perform all the duties which the law of the State or this act imposes upon them, and it shall see that an arrangement is made for a suitable place in which to hold the election, the expense thereof to be paid by the United States as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 12. That upon the closing of the polls the judges and clerks shall immediately open the ballot box and take therefrom the ballots and count the votes cast for each proposed candidate for nomination for the offices hereinbefore mentioned, and after the votes are so counted the result of the canvass shall be certified upon a blank furnished for that purpose, upon which shall be shown the number of votes cast for each proposed candidate and the political party which proposes him, the names voted for in party columns not proposed through nominating papers, with the number cast for each, and also the number of votes cast for each person as a candidate independent of party. The certificate shall be signed by the judges and clerks and placed in an envelope, and the certificate so inclosed, with all the ballots and the tally sheets used at the polling place, shall be put in another envelope and returned, within 24 hours after the election has closed, to the said State board; and if the returns from any polling place be not received by the said State board three days before the time hereinafter fixed for the State canvass, the said State board shall forthwith send a messenger for any missing returns, the expense thereof to be paid as expenses for the said election.

SEC. 13. That on the second Wednesday following the primary election the said State board shall meet at the seat of government of the State and open and canvass the returns from each polling place in the State, and make abstract thereof, stating in words written at length the number of ballots cast in the State by each political party for each office; and also the number of votes cast for candidates independent of party, the name of each person voted for, and the number of votes given to each person for each different office, and shall sign and certify thereto; and within 24 hours after the said canvass is completed transmit the same to the National Board at the seat of government of the United States. The State board in making its canvass shall canvass only the certified returns made by the several judges and clerks of election, but if any candidate whose name appears upon the primary ballot shall file with said State board a statement under oath that fraud was committed or error or mistake made in counting or returning the votes cast at any polling place, as to the office for which he was a candidate, in such specific terms that it furnishes reasonable ground to believe that a recount of the ballots would produce a different result as to his candidacy, the said State board shall thereupon recount the ballots cast at any such polling place for the office for which the contestant was a candidate, and if the result reached by the board on the recount of the ballots as to such office be different from that returned by the judges and clerks of said election, it shall be substituted therefor as the true and correct return and so regarded in all subsequent proceedings. The action of the board shall be final, and no other contest of any kind shall be permitted.

SEC. 14. That on the first Monday of August following any such primary election the National Board shall meet as a canvassing board and open and canvass the returns received from the State boards of the several States. If returns are not received from all the States, the board shall immediately send a messenger after the said returns, and the board may adjourn from day to day until they are received. The National Board shall make an abstract of its canvass, stating in words written at length the number of ballots cast by each political party separately for each office for which candidates are to be nominated under this act, the names of all the persons voted for, and the number of votes received by each person for each office, and shall sign and certify thereto. Any candidate receiving a plurality of the votes cast by his party, or independent of party, in any State shall be credited by said National Board with a number of votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which such State may be entitled, and any candidate so receiving a plurality of the votes of all the States shall be duly and legally named as the nominee of his party, or as a nominee independent of party, as the case may be, for the office for which he is a candidate, and shall be entitled to have his name printed on the official ballots to be voted at the general election whenever the laws of the several States provide for the printing of such name or names when nominated by a party convention, as has heretofore been the practice, or when the laws of any State shall hereafter provide for the printing of such name or names upon the official ballots at the general election. In any case of a tie vote between the candidates having the highest number of popular votes in any State for any office each shall be credited with an equal proportion of the vote of that State upon the basis herein named, and in any case of a tie as to the final result before the National Board, said board shall award the nomination to the candidate who received the largest popular vote.

The said National Board shall prepare and certify a list of the candidates for President and Vice President so named by each party separately, and shall deliver the same to the national party committee, and the said nomination shall thereafter be dealt with in the same manner as though the same had been made by party convention, as heretofore.

All subsequent proceedings which relate to the placing of the names of candidates for President and Vice President and for electors of President and Vice President upon the ballots for the general election in November shall be taken in the same manner and with the same effect as they have heretofore been taken when nominations for such offices were made by convention or through any other method.

SEC. 15. That when the said canvass by the national board is concluded and the certificates aforesaid made the board shall deliver the original abstract of all the returns to the Secretary of State, who shall file and preserve the same.

SEC. 16. That vacancies occurring in nominations made in any such primary election may be filled in any manner determined upon by the national party committee, and when so filled shall have the same force and effect as though made at a primary election.

SEC. 17. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed so as to prevent any voter from voting for whomsoever he may desire at any such primary election, but no person nominated independent of party shall be permitted to use the name of any political party authorized or entitled under this act to nominate candidates for such offices by primary vote.

SEC. 18. That any public officer upon whom a duty is imposed by this act who shall willfully neglect to perform any such duty, or who shall willfully perform it in such a way as to hinder the objects thereof, or shall disclose to anyone, except as may be ordered in a court of justice or as provided herein, the contents of any ballot or any part thereof as to the manner in which the same may have been voted, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment in the penitentiary not to exceed five years, or by both said fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 19. That any person who shall agree to perform any service in the interest of a candidate in consideration of any money or other valuable thing, or who shall accept any money or other valuable thing for such service performed in the interest of any candidate, or any person paying or offering to pay or giving or offering to give money or other valuable thing for such service, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year. But nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit any candidate from making contracts in good faith for the employment of one private secretary and two stenographers and for the announcement of his candidacy in the newspapers and for securing the names of voters required to file preliminary nomination papers and the payment of any reasonable compensation for such service: Provided, That no candidate for any primary nomination for the office of President shall spend or incur obligations, all told, in furtherance of his candidacy, in excess of $25,000. Nor shall any such candidate for Vice President spend or incur obligations, all told, in furtherance of his candidacy, in excess of $10,000. And any money spent or obligations incurred by others in furtherance of the interests of any such candidate with his knowledge and consent shall be deemed an expenditure made or obligation incurred by the candidate himself. Conviction under this section shall work a forfeiture of office and disqualification to hold any office of trust or profit under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 20. That any person offering or giving a bribe, either in money or other consideration, to any elector for the purpose of influencing his vote at a primary election, or any elector entitled to vote at such primary election receiving and accepting such bribe; any person making false answer under any of the provisions of this act relative to his qualifications and party affiliations; any person voting or offering to vote at a primary election who is not a qualified voter or not a qualified elector of the precinct where he offers to vote; or any person violating any of the provisions of this act; and any person knowingly procuring, aiding, or abetting such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, or be imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 1 year.

DIRECT ELECTION OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 26) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States making the Federal judiciary elective and subject to recall.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of section 1 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States the following section be proposed as an amendment to said Constitution, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ARTICLE III.

"SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices for a term of 12 years each and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Successors to all judges now in office, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall be elected at the first general election at which presidential electors shall be chosen after the adoption of this amendment: Provided, That the Congress may by law prescribe that successors to only one-third of the membership of the Supreme Court shall be elected every four years until successors to the entire membership of said court shall be elected. The terms of all judges now in office, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall expire and terminate on the first Monday in January following the election of their successors. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint judges, either of the supreme or inferior courts, to fill temporary vacancies. All judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall be subject to recall at any general election at which presidential electors shall be chosen."

MAKING PRESS ASSOCIATIONS COMMON CARRIERS.

A bill (H. R. 1691) to regulate press associations engaged in interstate commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons, companies, corporations, associations, or cooperative concerns engaged in the transmission of news by letter, telegraph, telephone, or otherwise between the several States, or between any State or Territory and any foreign nation, or between any State and any Territory, or within any Territory, for hire or for any consideration or thing of value whatsoever, intending that the news so transmitted shall be printed in any newspaper, are hereby declared to be common carriers and hereby made subject to all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

PROVIDING EASIER METHODS OF AMENDING CONSTITUTION.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 60) submitting amendment in relation to amendments.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of Article V of the Constitution of the United States, the following article be proposed as an amendment to said Constitution, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ARTICLE V.

"The Congress, whenever a majority of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of a majority of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of this Constitution when ratified by two-thirds of the several States, either through their legislatures or by a majority of the qualified electors, under the laws of the said several States, voting upon said proposition under the referendum: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

[From the Congressional Directory, April, 1913.]

WALTER LAFFERTY, Progressive Republican, of Portland, at present supporting the platform and organization in Congress of the Progressive Party because in his judgment it comes much nearer to representing the sentiments and aspirations of the rank and file of the Republican Party than does the platform enunciated by the last so-called Republican national convention, is the fifth of a family of eight children, having four sisters, Ora, Gussie, Rosa, and Roxa, and three brothers, Luther, Albert, and Rolla, all of whom and both parents, Abraham M. and Helen (Kinney) Lafferty, are living, parts of the family now residing in each of the States of Missouri, Idaho, Washington, and Oregon; was raised in Pike County, Mo., on a farm, in which county his parents and all brothers and sisters were born, but was himself born on a farm near Farber, Audrain County, where his parents resided briefly; full name is ABRAHAM WALTER LAFFERTY, but has always been called Walter, and signs his name A. W. LAFFERTY; his father served in the Union Army, as did also his grandfather, George W. Kinney, who was born in Ohio; his mother's first cousin, Maj. Luther H. Cowan, Forty-fifth Illinois Infantry, was killed in battle before Vicksburg, May 22, 1863; both grandfathers served in Indian wars, his paternal grandfather being Lawson Lafferty, of North Carolina; his brother Rolla served in the provisional volunteers in the Philippines, enlisting when he was 17 and coming out with the rank of corporal; maternal grandmother was Mary Ann Gunn, of North Carolina, and his paternal grandmother was Hester Ann Martin, of Kentucky; his great grandmother Kinney was Eleanor Pierce; began studying law on the farm in Pike County; attended law department of the State university year 1895–96, and three years later received the degree LL. B. from that institution; was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of Missouri on examination June 5, 1896, five days before he was 21, and practiced law at Montgomery until December, 1904, during which time he served three years with the rank of captain in the Missouri National Guard and one term as prosecuting attorney; December, 1904, was appointed special agent of the General Land Office, and after brief preliminary instruction at Washington, D. C., was sent to Oregon, arriving at Portland March 20, 1905, where he has since resided; as special agent he took up the cause of the homesteaders, reporting that it was not the settler who was robbing the Government but the railroad companies and scrip applicants, and recommending more liberal treatment to settlers; resigned as special agent October 1, 1906, and reentered the private practice of law; as prosecuting attorney in Missouri he secured the first convictions ever had in that State for the offense of communicating quotations by wire for the purpose of gambling in grain, stocks, and provisions, putting more money in the treasury in fines than his salary amounted to, and under a law which had remained unenforced upon the statute books of that State for 40 years; in Oregon his principal case has been the prosecution which he started in 1907 against the Oregon & California Railroad Co., being the first suit ever brought to enforce the terms of the act of Congress which 40 years ago granted to that company nearly one-third of the lands in western Oregon, but upon the express provision that every acre of the lands should be sold by the company to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than one quarter section to any one settler, and for prices not exceeding $2.50 per acre, which case is now pending in the United States court at Portland, and involves 2,300,000 acres of unsold lands still held by the company unaffected by the claims of any innocent purchasers, the Government having already realized $1,000,000 on a compromise concluded in 1913 with those who bought portions of the granted lands contrary to law prior to the institution of the suit, the compromise having been made by authority of the act of August 20, 1912, which was introduced by Mr. LAFFERTY, and if the 2,300,000 acres of unsold lands still held by the company shall be sold to settlers as sought by the prosecution started by Mr. LAFFERTY, or forfeited to the United States, as asked in the Government suit filed one year later, and then opened to settlement (and not put into a forest reserve), in either such case homes of 160 acres each for 15,000 families will thereby be provided in the most beautiful and picturesque portion of western Oregon; was elected to the Sixty-second Congress and reelected to the Sixty-third Congress as the nominee of both the Progressive and Republican Parties.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance at this late hour that I rise to make any remarks in the House on the pending bill. I realize quite well that nothing I can say will throw any new light upon this subject, and I am also conscious that no remarks of mine or of any other Member on the floor of this House will change a single vote, for each Member of this House considers himself an expert on the tariff. [Laughter.] If each one could write a bill expressing his individual views, we would have as variegated an assortment of tariff bills as there were colors in Joseph's coat. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the country from my viewpoint on this bill, and the country will ever owe to our matchless leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee a debt of gratitude for bringing in this bill in the interest of the masses of the American people.

This bill, after exhaustive hearings on their part and laborious work, was submitted to a Democratic caucus. It has been approved by that caucus. It has the approval of our great Democratic President of the United States, and I believe fully carries out the platform of the Democratic Party, as expressed in Baltimore, for a revision of the tariff downward.

It is a bill that by every rule of political economy, every law of equity and justice, should reduce the cost of living—a bill that will relieve the toiling masses of humanity from many of the burdens of taxation that now rest upon them; a bill that distributes some of the burdens of government upon the idle rich, "who toil not, neither do they spin, and yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed as one of them." In our country a government of the people, for the people, and by the people in its fairest form must necessarily be run by party organizations.

In this country we have had two great parties. One of those parties is now divided, and the policy of the Republicans, whether they be standpatters or Progressives, has been a protective-tariff system. The Democratic Party has always opposed protection in every form and has contended for tariff for revenue only. I am opposed to protection in all of its forms. Protection, to my mind, makes it possible by law for the favored few to get without earning what other people earn without getting. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It enables a very few by class legislation to guarantee a profit to themselves by wringing from the consuming mass of humanity money they have earned and that they themselves should be permitted to enjoy.

The protective-tariff system was conceived and born in hypocrisy, and when it was first advocated its friends claimed that it was only intended to encourage infant industry, which satisfied the people for a while. They next claimed that it was intended to create new manufactories and bring about competition and enable the people to get goods cheaper. When this deception was exploded they told the people that the foreigners paid the tax, which no sensible or sane man in this day for one moment believes, and the Republicans themselves have abandoned this claim. They next claimed that this protection insured the workingman higher wages. After years of operation, when the workingman has become poorer and the tariff barons richer, they have at last abandoned this claim.

The present able Democratic Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, a millionaire manufacturer of engines, said publicly in a speech in the House of Representatives:

> Several years ago a representative of a branch of the Steel Trust came to me to sign a petition to Congress for an increase of the tariff on their production. I was one of them, and they talked freely to me. I asked why he wanted an additional duty. He replied, "We must keep up the American standard of wages for our working people." I asked how much of the proposed increase he would pay his workmen, and he replied that they had not got to that yet. I told him I had signed a petition for a reduction of the duty, but told him if he would enter into a contract with me to pay his men any part of the increase I would withdraw my name from the other petition and sign his. He replied, "You know I can't do that." He said his company was only paying 10 per cent, and they wanted to pay a larger dividend, and wanted to increase the tariff so as to do it.

The Republican Party now admit that the tariff should be reduced, but like all despoilers, hating to have their power to rob by law the many for their own enrichment taken from them they now advocate tariff boards and tariff commissions, claiming that the tariff reduction should be based on a report of a scientific board, which has never been done in the whole history of our country. It is simply another subterfuge for delay.

In my humble opinion the greatest issue before the American people is the tariff question. Realizing how important this question is to my people for the purpose of getting the practical workings of a protective-tariff system before them, I desire to briefly illustrate how they are affected by it. The only money received by the Federal Government from customs or a tariff on goods is on those goods imported into this country which pay the tax into the customhouse at the port of entry. Only one-fifth of the goods consumed in this country are imported, the remaining four-fifths used being manufactured here. The Federal Treasury receives from the customhouse on imported goods about $310,000,000, but this is not all the American people pay, for by this unjust system there is wrung from the American people about $1,540,000,000. The Treasury receives $310,000,000, the protective tariff and the favored few receive $1,240,000,000. You say how can this be so. I will illustrate: A suit of clothes costs $10 in England, when it reaches our customhouse, $9 tariff must be paid, and when the buyer pays for this suit he pays $10 plus the $9, making the suit cost him $19. Our tariff barons, being protected by a tariff wall of 90 per cent, charge instead of $10 for a similar suit, as they have no competitors, they charge $18—$1 cheaper than the imported suit. The $8 that was added on does not go into the Treasury of the United States, but goes into the treasury of the tariff barons; but it has been wrung from some American citizens as a bonus to the favored manufacturer, or tariff barons.

Under this system $1 out of every $5 unjustly taken from the people goes into the Treasury of the United States. The $4 of the money thus extorted from the American people go to Rockefeller, Carnegie, and other millionaire manufacturers, and makes it possible for them to grow richer and richer, while the poor man, with the cost of living higher than ever before, struggles, toils, and labors to get daily bread and clothes for himself and loved ones.

The only reason they can thus rob the American people is owing to the injustice and iniquity of the tariff law, which builds a high wall around our country which prevents competition and makes it possible for the few to exploit the many. A sewing machine made in America is shipped to the Orient, the freight is paid, and it is then sold in the Orient for $12, while an American in America is compelled to pay for the same machine $20 or $30. Farm machinery, shoes, and many other articles manufactured in America are sold abroad cheaper than in our own country.

This but shows the injustice of the Republican system, shows how our people are unjustly taxed, and I am unalterably opposed to this injustice, extortion, and despoiling the many for the few.

The fiscal policy of this country since the Civil War has been bottomed upon protection, and the Democratic Party realizing that that had been the fiscal party of the country in their convention declared for a gradual reduction of the tariff. I am myself an extremely low-tariff man. Had I my way I would place all of the necessities of life absolutely upon the free list and raise money to run the Government from other sources. But this bill pending now before the House carries out instructions and campaign pledges of the Democratic Party to revise the tariff downward. The bill places the following necessities of life upon the free list:

> Meat, flour, bread, boots and shoes, lumber, iron ore, milk and cream, coal, harness, saddlery, potatoes, salt, swine, corn, cornmeal, cotton bagging, agricultural implements, leather, wood pulp, Bibles, printing paper not worth more than 2½ cents per pound, typewriters, sewing machines, typesetting machines, cash registers, steel rails, fence wire, cotton ties, nails, hoop and band iron, fish, sulphur, soda, tanning materials, acetic and sulphuric acids, borax, lumber products, including broomhandles, clapboards, hubs for wheels, posts, laths, pickets, staves, shingles.

It has greatly reduced the duty on woolen goods, on cotton goods, on ready-made clothing, on blankets, and on many other articles of necessity, and it reduces the duty on sugar from $1.90 per hundred pounds to $1.30, and after May, 1916, places sugar on the free list. The bill will relieve the consuming masses of the country from many of the burdens of taxation.

I have the honor to represent one of the greatest districts in the country. My people ask no special legislation for themselves. I have in my district lumber and cotton mills, but I shall not come here and ask to place those things which other parts of the country raise upon the free list or to reduce the duty upon them and to retain it upon the things that are raised in my own district. I am a Democrat and am against class legislation for anyone, whether they reside in my district or elsewhere. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is one special feature in this bill that I wish to refer to briefly, and I shall not inflict myself upon the House further—that is the income tax. That feature of the bill is especially most gratifying to me. In 1896, as a tribute to my father, I was nominated to represent his district in Congress, filling out his unexpired term. In speeches going over the district in 1896 I publically advocated an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to make it legal to levy an income tax to meet the decision of the Supreme Court in the Pollock case, in which the income-tax provision of the Wilson bill was declared to be unconstitutional. Thirteen years after I first advocated it Congress submitted such an amendment to the several States for ratification, and it has just been ratified. Therefore it is with great pleasure that I realize that that proposition has now become a part of the organic law of the land and that to-day it is legal to levy an income tax.

The great Committee on Ways and Means has provided for levying one. I think it is the fairest of all taxes, because, under an income tax, a man contributes to the support of the Government according to his ability to pay, according to the benefits and privileges he has received, and not according to his necessities. Under an indirect tax a man contributes because he must eat and he must wear clothing. He is thus forced to contribute to the support of the Government. An income tax equitably and justly distributes some of the burdens of Government.

When the Master was on earth He knew that the fairest way of contributing to the support of His church, which was His government, was by paying an income tax, for He commanded that each should contribute one-tenth of his yearly income. Again He recognized that those who were able to pay should pay, for when the rich men were casting into the treasury of their abundance and the widow gave her mite, He said, "She has cast in more than they all." Forty-seven of the countries of the world levy an income tax to provide revenue. I have no fight to make upon wealth. Any man who has honestly acquired wealth shows but an evidence of his industry, intelligence, and skill, and he has my profound respect, but I do say that a man with a great fortune is more able to pay for the support of the Government, for its care of him and his property, than is his less fortunate brother. This income tax will place some of the burdens upon him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, without detaining the committee under the privilege already granted, I shall incorporate in my remarks a statement taken from the New York World, showing how this income-tax provision will affect some of the great millionaires of the country:

	Capital.	Income.	Tax.
John D. Rockefeller	$500,000,000	$80,000,000	$2,000,000
Andrew Carnegie	300,000,000	15,000,000	600,000
William Rockefeller	200,000,000	20,000,000	800,000
Estate of Marshall Field	120,000,000	6,000,000	240,000
George F. Baker	100,000,000	5,000,000	200,000
Henry Phipps	100,000,000	5,000,000	200,000
Henry C. Frick	100,000,000	5,000,000	200,000
William A. Clark	80,000,000	4,000,000	160,000
Estate of J. P. Morgan	75,000,000	7,500,000	300,000
Estate of E. H. Harriman	68,000,000	3,400,000	146,000
Estate of Russell Sage	64,000,000	3,200,000	128,000
W. K. Vanderbilt	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Estate of John S. Kennedy	65,000,000	3,250,000	130,000
Estate of John J. Astor	70,000,000	3,500,000	140,000
W. W. Astor	70,000,000	3,600,000	140,000
J. J. Hill	70,000,000	3,500,000	140,000
Isaac Stephenson	74,000,000	3,700,000	148,000
Jay Gould estate	70,000,000	3,500,000	140,000
Mrs. Hetty Green	60,000,000	3,000,000	120,000
Estate of Cornelius Vanderbilt	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Estate of William Weightman	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Estate of Ogden Goelet	60,000,000	3,000,000	120,000
W. H. Moore	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Arthur C. James	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Estate of Robert Goelet	60,000,000	3,000,000	120,000
Guggenheim estate	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Thomas F. Ryan	50,000,000	2,500,000	100,000
Edward Morris	45,000,000	2,250,000	90,000
J. O. Armour	45,000,000	2,250,000	90,000

In the $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 class, yielding incomes of $1,250,000 to $1,750,000 and taxes of $50,000 to $70,000, are James Stillman, J. H. Schiff, Charles M. Pratt, J. H. Flagler, Quincy A. Shaw, E. T. Bedford, E. T. Stotesbury, John Claflin, Henry Walters, E. C. Converse, Clarence H. Mackay, Nathaniel Thayer, W. H. Moore, and the estates of H. H. Rogers, Robert Winsor, George Smith, W. B. Leeds, W. Scully, John Arbuckle, J. Crosby Brown, John F. Dryden, W. L. Elkins, and O. H. Payne.

Now, another beneficial effect from an income tax is that under an indirect system of taxation the people do not realize that they are contributing the vast sums of money expended by the Federal Government, but when you have a direct system of taxation, and the tax collector goes to those who have to pay under this law and demands of them the amount due the Government, the result is they will realize that they are paying the money that runs this Government, and they will demand of their representatives economy in the administration of public affairs. We are all human; and, gentlemen, when your constituents demand a thing of you you are very apt to follow their desires.

In conclusion, I rejoice in the confident knowledge that when the final roll is called this great measure to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government will pass this House. When it becomes a law the American people will say the Democratic Party has "kept the faith" and been true to the people of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

[Mr. FRENCH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in opening the debate last Wednesday on the pending measure the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, uttered the following:

> The bills that we propose to the country are not new. We are not taking advantage of the American people in proposing them. A Democratic House was returned two years ago and wrote a series of bills revising this tariff, and we presented them to the country as our platform. They were indorsed by the national platform of the Democratic Party as a flag under which we would fight our battles. We went to the country, and the American people have returned to this House one of the greatest majorities any party has ever had in these Halls since the Civil War. We do not speak for ourselves, but we speak through the authority of an edict from the American people.

I do not believe that the gentleman really lays the flattering unction to his soul that the Democratic majority in this Congress is due entirely to the Democracy's stand on the tariff question. He knows, as we all know, that many of his colleagues on the opposite side of the broad aisle owe their presence here to the schism that existed in the temple of the protectionists of this country—a schism that not only lost us many seats in the House and Senate, but which also gave the country a President elected by a minority of its legal voters. And yet it is but fair to say that the country is anxiously awaiting the result of your labors on tariff legislation. That the heat and passion of a bitter political campaign have died away, and that the country is on the tiptoe of expectancy as to the program of the Democratic Party, now fully intrenched in both Houses of Congress, as well as in the Executive Department of the Government, was fully demonstrated when the President of the United States appeared before the joint session of the Congress on April 8. The announcement to the two Houses that the Chief Executive would deliver his message in person created rather a favorable impression.

The press of the country on the whole approved the innovation. I dare say that if President Taft had made a similar announcement a year ago he would have been denounced as a "reactionary" in many quarters, while if Col. Roosevelt had attempted a similar feat during his incumbency in the presidential office there would have been a considerable portion of our population that would have pronounced the proceedings "revolutionary." But partisan utterances that would have reverberated throughout the land in the case of these former occupants of the White House were not invoked against the present Chief Executive. His reception in this Hall was all that his heart could desire. It was one of the most dramatic incidents that has ever been witnessed under the dome of this Capitol. It must always linger in the memory of those who were privileged to see it. It was a bold stroke, a brilliant spectacle, excellently executed. During the eight minutes consumed in the delivery of the address every syllable, every word, every sentence was absorbed by the expectant assemblage. All ears were strained to hear a clarion note that should arouse the newly awakened hopes of triumphant Democracy. But the note was never sounded. The President had not proceeded far ere he uttered the following:

> We have sought in our tariff schedules to give each group of manufacturers or producers what they themselves thought that they needed in order to maintain a practically exclusive market as against the rest of the world. Consciously or unconsciously, we have built up a set of privileges and exemptions from competition behind which it was easy, by any, even the crudest, forms of combination, to organize monopoly, until at last nothing is normal, nothing is obliged to stand the tests of efficiency and economy in our world of big business, but everything thrives by concerted arrangement. Only new principles of action will save us from a final hard crystallization of monopoly and a complete loss of the influences that quicken enterprise and keep independent energy alive.

That was the keynote of the speech; the basis of his argument. Thus early was the listener able to realize that the doctrines of Cobden, of Adam Smith, of John Stuart Mill and their school that "free trade means free competition" was the doctrine which the new President has taken for his guide in framing tariff legislation. It is the doctrine of the free trader, sugarcoat the pill as you may, and before the concluding word of the well-phrased message had been uttered it had become evident, at least to some of his listeners, that ultimate free trade is his hope and his desire.

I deny that the protective tariff is responsible for monopolies and combinations. If that be true doctrine there ought be no combinations nor monopolies in free-trade England, while the fact remains that Great Britain is honeycombed with combinations and monopolies. Why, even before the thirteen Colonies had freed themselves there were combinations and monopolies in England. As early as 1771 the owners of the collieries north of Newcastle on Tyne formed a combination to prevent competition, limit output, and maintain prices. This combination was repeatedly charged with all the iniquities attributed to its modern imitators. It was investigated by committees of Parliament no less than five times, and some of the reports against the combine were exceedingly severe. Court proceedings were instituted against it at times but they were vain. The combination existed for upward of 70 years. It was in 1844, only after the construction of railroads which enabled competing colliers to send their coal to London by train, that the combination was finally broken. The real beginning of the modern combinations in England was during the decade from 1880 to 1890. At that time the free-trade doctrine was in full operation and had been in full operation for many years. In 1887 a large combination, known as the Bath Stone Firms, was organized with a capitalization of approximately $1,700,000. They monopolized the entire business, excepting one firm, and have since then acquired practically all of the Portland stone properties.

In 1888, 64 firms combined to form the Salt Union, capitalized at $21,000,000. In 1891 the United Alkali Co. (Ltd.) was organized. It took in 49 separate firms, and its capital stock amounted to $42,500,000. In 1895 the Liverpool Warehousing Co. (Ltd.) was created by a combination of six firms. The capitalization was for $5,250,000. In 1896 J. & P. Coates (Ltd.), embracing five sewing-thread concerns, was organized, with a capital of $37,500,000. There were about 20 smaller firms standing outside of this combination. In 1897 most of the latter organized a combination of their own known as the English Sewing Cotton Co. Its capitalization was for $15,000,000. Subsequently these combinations created still another thread trust which they called the American Thread Co. In December, 1897, the Yorkshire Dyeware & Chemical Co., with a capitalization of $1,580,000, was created by a combination of 10 firms. Nine firms, in May, 1898, organized a combination known as the Linen Thread Co., with a capital of $10,000,000. In 1898 the Fine Cotton Spinners & Doublers' Association, with a capitalization of $33,750,000, was organized by a combination of 40 firms.

I have here a list of 26 additional combinations, all organized and created in free-trade England between 1898 and 1900, most of them being connected with the textile industries, as follows:

Name of company.	Date incorporated.	Number of plants acquired or controlled.	Capital.
United Turkey Red Co.	Jan., 1898	3	$6,000,000
British Dyewood & Chemical Co	May, 1898	4	2,850,000

Wall Paper Manufacturers (Ltd.)	do	30	21,000,000
Bleachers' Association (Ltd.)	1900	53	41,250,000
Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (agreement with 4 other firms).	do	34	40,000,000
British Oil & Cake Mills	do	17	11,250,000
Rivet, Bolt & Nut Co. (practically all the manufacturers in Scotland).	do	15	2,750,000
Wholesale News Agents' Association (all firms in Bradford, Leeds, and Sheffield).	do	32	1,450,000
The Extract Wool & Merino Co. (Ltd.)	July, 1900	7	1,700,000

Macrosty, in his "Trust Movement in the British Empire," mentions a number of additional trusts in the woolen industry; while Levy, in his "Monopoly and Competition," treats of the Locomotive Trust, the Whisky Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Cable Cartel, and the British and International Rail Syndicate. There is also a combination in the manufacture of glass bottles, which has an agreement with continental manufacturers to the effect that they will not enter the British market and the British combination covenants not to enter the continental market. But the most recent combination of which I have any knowledge is that made by the Standard Oil Co. with the Royal Dutch Oil Co. Hon. Frank B. Kellogg, of Minnesota, who has just returned from England, told me that through the efforts of this combination the price of gasoline to the consumer has been forced up to 42 cents per gallon in free-trade England, while in the United States the price ranges from 18 to 20 cents per gallon to the consumer. And there is no duty on oil in England. Neither is there a duty on oil in the United States. Nevertheless the Standard Oil monopoly has grown to gigantic proportions in the United States. That monopoly has been charged with all kinds of crimes, but it can not be truthfully contended that the protective tariff is responsible for its existence.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown conclusively that the assertion that monopolies and combinations owe their organization to the protective tariff is fallacious. They owe their existence to man's cupidity. The desire to get rich quick exists in free-trade England, even as it exists in the United States. And so long as men can combine to fix prices so as to prevent loss through cutthroat competition, so long as men can combine to limit output so as to prevent the overstocking of the market, so long will we have monopolies and combinations.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to go into details on the pending bill at this time. Others have done that during this debate, and I will not cover the ground again. I confess I do not know upon what economic principles the pending measure has been framed. You have put finished products on the free list and placed a duty on the raw materials that go into those finished products. It seems to me that your purpose in this bill is to hit an American industry wherever you can see one. The future will soon determine the unsoundness of your views. But I feel that before I close I ought to place before the House a few figures as to conditions among the laboring classes in free-trade England and in the United States. I find in Whitaker's Almanack for 1912, page 509, that the population of England in 1911 was a little over 32,500,000. Of course that does not include Scotland, Ireland, or Wales. The number of paupers in England in 1911 was over 833,000. The population of Yorkshire, in which the great woolen industries of England are located, was somewhat over 3,700,000 in 1911. In this one county alone there were 78,000 paupers. This is in free-trade England. According to the census of 1910 the population of the United States was about 92,000,000. The number of paupers present in the almshouses of the United States on January 1, 1910, according to the statistics of the Census Bureau, was 64,266. So that, while our population is nearly 3 times that of England, the number of paupers in that free-trade country is considerably over 10 times as great as in the United States. In fact, the county of Yorkshire, with its great woolen industries, with its population of 3,700,000, has 14,000 more paupers than we have in our entire country. [Applause.]

According to the report of the comptroller of the currency for 1912 the combined population of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales is given as 45,289,000.

The number of depositors over there in the trustee savings banks was 1,849,043. Their total deposits aggregated a little over $258,000,000. The postal savings banks had 12,370,646 depositors, with an aggregate of a little over $859,000,000 deposits.

There was also held for depositors certain Government stock which at the end of the year 1911 amounted to $120,776,000 in the postal savings banks and to $12,934,000 in the trustee savings banks. The average deposit in the free trade United Kingdom in the trustee savings banks is $139.58, and an average of $5.70 per inhabitant. The average deposit in the postal savings banks is $69.44, and an average of $18.97 per inhabitant. The same authority gives the total population of the United States for 1912 at a little over 95,400,000 inhabitants. The mutual and stock savings banks have 10,010,000 depositors, with $4,451,800,000 deposits, or an average of $444.72 for each depositor, and $46.66 to the inhabitant. The postal savings banks in the United States have been organized but a few years. However, there are already 300,000 depositors and $28,000,000 of deposits. You will find the figures I have quoted on page 77 of the comptroller's report. They speak more eloquently than words of the great advantage the working people of the United States under a protective tariff have over their English competitors under free trade. You have the votes to put through your bill. We who oppose it hope at least that you will pass it speedily. The future will soon determine the soundness or the fallacy of your theories, and I for one do not doubt but that the Republican Party will be empowered to write a new tariff law, based upon the principle of protection for American industries, in 1916. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of entering upon a general argument for political effect upon the Democratic tariff bill, but I should like to call attention again to the fact that it is not a tariff for revenue only or even a tariff for revenue chiefly. It is a protective tariff, the protection much reduced, and dangerously reduced, as I believe, on many articles, but still a protective tariff, principally, with an income tax attached. It marks, as the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, said in his opening speech, "a new era in the fiscal legislation of this country." And yet in the inauguration of this new era certain precedents of the past, much criticized by Democrats and by free traders, have been followed. An enlargement of the free list has been a feature of many of the tariff bills passed since the war, and the charge has been made over and over again that Republicans have removed duties from strictly revenue commodities in order that they might retain or increase the high protective duties of war time.

Now, we do not find in this bill that the articles which are known as the best revenue producers, the articles upon which nearly all countries levy tariffs for revenue only, have been taken off the free list where they were put by Republicans—on the contrary, we find that the free list has been still further enlarged by adding to it sugar, the best of revenue producers, wool, and other articles, some doubtless for the purpose of furnishing free raw materials, but others clearly for the purpose of affording an opening for the tax upon incomes.

Now, I am a believer in a tax upon incomes, but I question whether the Federal Government should levy such a tax in normal times. Nothing is in a greater state of chaos than taxation in this country, but out of that chaos some few principles seem to have emerged, principles which are coming to govern the legislation of States when they are understood. Briefly stated, these principles demand that real estate should be left to be taxed by the cities, towns, and counties; that the States should raise their revenue from corporation, inheritance, and other taxes reaching personal property, the taxation of which by localities has generally broken down; and that the National Government should raise its revenue chiefly from import duties supplemented by certain internal-revenue taxes.

If I have correctly stated these fundamental principles of taxation, it follows that income taxes, which are taxes upon personal property chiefly, should be levied in normal times by the State governments and not by the National Government; and they should take the place of personal-property taxes, which in most States are still nominally levied through the assessors of the cities and counties. If this should be done, it would clear up in large measure the tangled mess in which our State tax systems find themselves.

Some States have already taken advance steps in this line. Washington has abolished taxation upon instruments of credit, and Wisconsin and Massachusetts levy income taxes, and the example of these States, I believe, is soon to be followed by others. Just what effect the "butting in" of the National Government with the income tax will have no one can clearly prophesy at this time, but it seems to me that the National Government is encroaching upon a source of revenue which normally belongs to the States, and I believe the probability is that this new national scheme of taxation will retard instead of hasten the general reform of taxation so greatly to be desired in our States.

There is clearly no necessity for a national income tax at this time, for the sum of a hundred million dollars, which the Ways and Means Committee expects will be raised by it, could have been very easily raised by small duties on articles put on the free list—duties so small they would not have affected perceptibly the price of those articles to the consumer.

I do not care to take the time of the committee by voicing the protests or complaints of manufacturers in my district at the changes proposed in the Underwood bill. I might mention the treatment which the pocket-cutlery industry is receiving, and I will say that it seems to me that the lumping together of several different varieties of buttons in paragraph 348 of Schedule N is unscientific, to say the least, as this paragraph includes buttons made by a variety of different processes of widely differing costs. There appears to me also to be a possible conflict between paragraph 348 and paragraph 384 of Schedule N with regard to buttons made from so-called vegetable ivory. As a product of vegetable ivory they appear to be dutiable at 30 per cent only, and I would respectfully ask the members of the Ways and Means Committee if it was not their intention to include in section 348 buttons made of vegetable ivory—tagua nuts—as well as buttons of ivory?

The people of my district are about equally interested in manufacturing and in agriculture; and the farmers will certainly not be pleased at the removal of the duty on some commodities and at the reduction of duties on many other commodities which they produce.

Among the main articles manufactured in my district none are more important or larger than those of agricultural machinery, and from the owners or managers of these large factories I have heard no complaints, though their products are placed upon the free list. Apparently they do not care for protection. Yet, in spite of this fact, I rather doubt the wisdom of the entire removal of duties upon their products. In my home city, the city of Poughkeepsie, on the Hudson, the largest factory, or at least the factory employing the greatest number of men, is the De Laval Co., which makes cream separators. It is a Swedish company and was established in this country because of the tariff on cream separators. The capital invested in it, so far as I know, is wholly Swedish capital. Now, with the duty removed these gentlemen may find it cheaper to make their separators in their home country of Sweden and ship them to America, thus throwing out of employment all the men now employed there. The threat of the International Harvester Co. to remove its cordage plant from Auburn, N. Y., to Germany is an indication of what might easily happen as a means of coercing labor if the products of that labor are to be on the free list.

I am not an extreme protectionist, and I find myself almost as frequently in agreement with the moderate protectionists of my party from the Northwest as with some of the gentlemen who have spoken from this side of the House. But I believe that serious damage is likely to result to some industries from the operation of this bill if it shall become a law unchanged, and I sincerely hope that it may be modified considerably before it does finally take its place upon the statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 28, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, recommending the repeal of the law authorizing the reimbursement of official traveling and subsistence expenses of inspectors in the Steamboat-Inspection Service (H. SENATE.

MONDAY, April 28, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, a Senator from the State of Michigan, and ISAAC STEPHENSON, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Bacon	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smoot
Borah	Hitchcock	Oliver	Stephenson
Bradley	Hughes	Overman	Sterling
Brady	James	Owen	Stone
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Page	Swanson
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	Jones	Pomerene	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Robinson	Thornton
Chilton	Kern	Root	Tillman
Clapp	La Follette	Saulsbury	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clarke, Ark.	Lodge	Sheppard	Walsh

Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Williams
Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Goff	Newlands	Smith, Md.

Mr. KERN. I was requested to state that the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is absent from the city on official business.

I wish to make the same announcement as to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I rise to speak to a question of personal privilege for a few minutes.

Since the last sitting of the Senate it has come to my attention that in the last few days there appeared in two newspapers of this city a foolish, ridiculous, absurd, and untrue statement about an alleged altercation between myself and a Senate elevator employee, one Charles Lamb, alleged to have occurred in an elevator cage in the Senate Office Building last Wednesday.

The articles put me in a most unmanly, ungentlemanly, undignified attitude. The articles are wholly, entirely, and absolutely false, untrue, and without a particle of fact or foundation. They are without a scintilla of truth in them. They are false in whole and in every part, every particular, and every particle. Not one statement in either one of them possesses one scintilla of fact or truth or foundation.

Upon hearing of them I sought out the young man mentioned in them as an elevator employee, Charles Lamb, and at the first opportunity, in the office of Mr. Werner, Superintendent of the Senate Office Building, I asked him in the presence of Mr. Werner if there was any truth in those articles. He said not one particle. I asked him if he inspired or caused the publication of them. He said he did not; that he regretted the publication of them; and that he had no idea how it came about. I asked him if, in the interest of truth, he would sign a statement to that effect, and he said he would do so gladly, cheerfully, and willingly, and he did do so of his own free will and accord. I have it and read it:

APRIL 26, 1913.

The articles appearing in the Times and another newspaper of this city about an alleged altercation between me and Senator MYERS are wholly false, untrue, and unfounded. At no place nor time did anything like it ever occur. I had nothing to do with the publication of either such article and did not inspire either.

P. C. LAMB.

At the time that was signed, Mr. Lamb had resigned his position in the employ of the Senate, a day or two before, and it was not signed under any fear of a discharge or of losing his position, because he held no position to lose; he had already resigned and was preparing to start to his home.

On New Year's Day of this year, the 1st day of January, 1913, in a public hallway, a corridor of the Senate Office Building, I had a few words with that young man, in which I admit that I was partly to blame, because I was overly vexed about a comparatively small matter. But the cause of it was nothing remotely resembling anything referred to in these two articles; not remotely resembling even in the slightest degree. Mr. Lamb made an explanation which was satisfactory to me, and I went my way.

Four or five days after that—in fact, on the first Sunday in January, which was the 5th day of January, 1913—I met the young man and we greeted each other as two ordinary acquaintances and passed on our respective ways.

From that day, the 5th day of January, 1913, until last week I never saw nor heard of Charles Lamb. I never gave him a thought. I did not know that he was in existence or in the city. I did not know whether he was in the employ of the Senate or not. As far as I was concerned he might have remained in the employ of the Senate the balance of his lifetime. I had no cause to desire that he should not remain in the employ of the Senate. For four months, until last Saturday, I had not seen him, and until last week for four months I had not heard of him and had not given him a thought.

Nothing like anything stated in these articles, nothing resembling in the remotest degree, at any time or place, anywhere, ever occurred; nothing that could be distorted by the wildest flight of the most disordered imagination into anything resembling anything there stated ever occurred.

Somebody, I know not whom, for some cause, I know not what, has started this foolish, absurd, preposterous report, and it got into a couple of the newspapers of this city—the Times and the Herald—and at least one newspaper in New York—the New York American.

The whole thing is a miserable, petty fabrication, and I should think that reporters and correspondents, who enjoy the courtesy of the Senate, in the way of press privileges, before they publish any such false, absurd, and ridiculous statement about a Senator, would at least ask him if there were a grain of truth in it. In this particular instance, if they want to be fair, they will be as quick to publish my denial and Mr. Lamb's written refutation as they were to publish the false statement.

This matter is trivial and frivolous, but, nevertheless, annoying and unjust. I could not afford the time to go to each and every Senator and tell him there was no truth in these ridiculous articles, and show him Mr. Lamb's written refutation. Therefore I take this occasion to speak to the Senators collectively, and to put in the RECORD Mr. Lamb's written refutation.

I never knew much about this young man, Mr. Lamb, until I talked to him in Mr. Werner's office last Saturday, and from his conduct and demeanor at that time I am glad to say that I believe him to be a gentleman and a man who wants to do what is right.

I feel that if the statements in those articles were true I would be unworthy to occupy a seat in this body; I would not be entitled to the respect and association of the other Members of this body; if they were true, I would not have any self-respect; and a man who does not respect himself should not have the respect of others.

Therefore, Mr. President, while this is a comparatively trivial matter, and while at first I thought I would not dignify it by giving it notice on the floor of this Chamber, and while I feel like apologizing to the Senators for taking up their time with so frivolous and ridiculous a matter, yet I felt it was so false and unjust a report that I wanted to take this opportunity to deny it and to submit written proof of its utter falsity in toto and in every part.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 20,000 additional copies of the report of the Ways and Means Committee on the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Knoxville and Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, praying for a reduction in the duty on sugar, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1913.

Resolutions relative to an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the practice of polygamy.

Whereas it appears from investigations recently made by the Senate of the United States, and otherwise, that polygamy still exists in certain parts of the United States, notwithstanding the enactment of prohibitory statutes by the several States thereof; and

Whereas the practice of polygamy is generally condemned by the people of the United States and there is a demand for its more effective prohibition by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby requests that Congress will enact and submit to the States for ratification an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy and polygamous cohabitation and giving Congress power to enforce such prohibition by appropriate legislation.

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth is hereby directed to send a copy of these resolutions to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted March 28, 1913.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, April 2, 1913.
A true copy.
Attest:

FRANK J. DONAHUE,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition of sundry shoe workers, residents of Lynn, Mass., praying for the maintenance of a protective tariff. I ask that the body of the petition be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body of the petition, omitting the signatures, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOE WORKERS.

We, the undersigned citizens of Lynn, Mass., believing that the best interests of the wage earners of the United States are promoted by a tariff policy which reasonably restricts foreign importations and protects the American standard of wages, respectfully petition Congress for such duties on imports as will safeguard our welfare and not injure or destroy legitimate industry, and we urge our representatives in Congress to advocate such measures as will afford adequate protection and maintain the present prosperity of the country.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition of sundry leather employees and tanners, residents of Peabody, Mass., praying for the maintenance of a protective tariff. I ask that the body of the petition be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body of the petition, omitting the signatures, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEATHER EMPLOYEES AND TANNERS.

We, the undersigned citizens of Peabody, believing that the best interests of the wage earners of the United States are promoted by a tariff policy which reasonably restricts foreign importations and protects the American standard of wages, respectfully petition Congress for such duties on imports as will safeguard our welfare and not injure or destroy legitimate industry, and we urge our representatives in Congress to advocate such measures as will afford adequate protection and maintain the present prosperity of the country.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition of members of the faculty of Wellesley College, Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation to prohibit the importation of aigrettes and the plumes and feathers of wild birds. I ask that the body of the petition, omitting the signatures, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body of the petition, omitting the signatures, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 922) providing for an increase of salary of the United States marshal for the district of Nevada, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 26) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 662) for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 25) thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 18) thereon. I give notice that I will ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2973) making appropriations for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 19) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

PURE-FOOD LAW—DEFINITION OF WHISKY.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I return certain documents which were transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States on July 13, 1911, in compliance with a resolution dated June 7, 1911, with reference to the definition of whisky, and so forth. The committee finds that all of the definitions of whisky are in print, and therefore they authorize me to submit the order which I send to the desk and for which I ask immediate consideration.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the documents and data submitted to the Senate on July 13, 1911, by the President of the United States in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of June 7, 1911, pertaining to the definition of whisky be returned to the President, as requested in his message transmitting the same.

ELLEN D. GIVENS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution No. 61 to pay Ellen D. Givens 12 months' salary in lieu of allowance for funeral expenses of her late husband, and I submit a report (No. 22) thereon. The resolution is amended so as to strike out, before the word "months," the word "twelve" and insert "six."

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Ellen D. Givens, widow of Edgar L. Givens, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PAINT CREEK COAL FIELDS, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 37, authorizing the appointment of a committee to make an investigation of conditions in the Paint Creek district, West Virginia, submitted by Mr. KERN on the 12th instant, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 24) thereon. I ask that the resolution take the regular course. I will not ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is in his place, and I ask his attention. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has reported back favorably, with amendments, the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana in connection with an investigation of the troubles in the West Virginia coal mines. Not seeing the Senator in his seat, I asked that the resolution take its regular course. Request can be made for the present consideration of the resolution, but I think it would be better for it to go over for a day.

Mr. KERN. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; let the resolution take the regular course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 39, authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to conduct hearings, and so forth, and I submit a report (No. 20) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert:

That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO SENATORS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 19, to authorize the allowance of an additional clerk to Senators having less than three, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 17th instant, to report it with an amendment, to submit a report (No. 23) thereon, and with the recommendation that the resolution as amended do not pass.

I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and other Senators to this matter. The committee had one of three courses to pursue—either to report the resolution favorably, after amending it so as to make it plainer, to report it adversely, or to pass a motion to let it lie on the table in the committee. We thought it fairer to the Senate that it be reported adversely, so that the Senate could consider it. I ask if we can not fix a time at which we may consider it; let us say immediately after the morning hour at the next session of the Senate. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the committee acted wisely in making a report so that this matter might receive the consideration of the Senate. I suggest to the Senator that he allow the resolution to go to the calendar, and it can be called up at some convenient time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; that suits me. I merely thought that Senators might want to fix a time. If not, the resolution can go to the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall doubtless have a hiatus in our proceedings before long, and we can call it up then for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 60, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to hold hearings and to send for persons and papers in connection with the same. I submit a report (No. 21) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert:

That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ABANDONMENT OF DESTITUTE PARENTS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill providing against the abandonment of destitute, infirm, or aged parents in the District of Columbia. I may say, in passing, that it is identical with the bill which passed the Senate during the last Congress. I ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 1653), providing against the abandonment of destitute, infirm, or aged parents, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

UNIFORM BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce. I will state that this is substantially the same as Senate bill 387, introduced by me several weeks ago, and as the bill which passed the Senate at the last session. There are several modifications which have been made by friends of the measure, and it is to satisfy their desires that the amended bill is presented.

The principal change is in sections 2 and 3 of the original bill, which provided for the form of the bill of lading. It is claimed that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to provide the form of a bill of lading. With the amendments contained in the modified form, that entire part of the subject would be left to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are several other changes, but they simply tend to perfect the bill and in no way change the plan or purpose of the measure as it was passed at the last session of Congress. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 1654), relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $76,700 for the support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Wahpeton, N. Dak., and to pay the superintendent, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the administrator of the estate of John W. West, deceased, the sum of $5,000, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States standing to the credit of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $40,000 for an investigation into the cases referred to in the report transmitted to Congress April 22, 1912, relative to the names of all persons found to be equitably entitled to enrollment as members of either of the Five Civilized Tribes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 to print the proceedings of the annual convention of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow in the accounts of the United States marshal for the district of Connecticut amounts paid by him from the appropriation "Pay of bailiffs, etc., United States courts, 1912," to Selah G. Blakeman, $192, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—THOMAS F. MANGAN.

On motion of Mr. WORKS, it was Ordered, That Thomas F. Mangan be authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate all papers accompanying Senate bill No. 6505, Sixty-second Congress, second session, entitled "A bill granting a pension to Thomas F. Mangan," no adverse report having been made thereon.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. On March 17 the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] reported back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate Senate resolution 13, special session of the Senate, authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency to employ clerks, and it was considered, amended, and agreed to. On the 24th of April I moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to and that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which was agreed to. I move that the vote be reconsidered by which the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that the resolution be considered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk at $2,500 per annum, an assistant clerk at $1,440 per annum, and a messenger at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from "Miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

POLICEMEN'S AND FIREMEN'S PENSION ROLLS (S. DOC. NO. 10).

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, some days since I introduced a resolution asking for information as to the pension roll of the police and fire departments of the District of Columbia. A report has been made by the commissioners. I have casually examined it, and it seems to me it ought to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with a view of having the committee investigate the disbursing of the funds. The funds are collected from various fines and other systems of taxation here in the District.

I notice, on page 66, that one G. J. Burton, who is an ex-policeman, has been retired with a pension of $40 a month on account of the disease of locomotor ataxia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the benefit of the Senator from Kansas, the Chair will state that the report has already been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was referred on the 17th of the present month.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is what I rose to suggest in case it had not been done.

As I was saying, the report shows that a Mr. Burton, who is pensioned at the rate of $40 a month, having been retired because of the disease of locomotor ataxia, is now a clerk in the War Department receiving a salary of $1,400 a year. It also shows that one Isaac Pearson, who is pensioned at the rate of $90 a month, having been retired because of old age, is now a messenger or watchman in one of the departments at $720 a year.

While Mr. Pearson was retired at the rate of $90 per month on account of age, there appear to be other policemen who were retired at much lower rates on account of age. It seems that there is no rule and no law governing the amount which shall be paid. It is discretionary with the commissioners. They can give a policeman when he retires $90 or $20 or $50, or whatever they think he is entitled to, and if he recovers from his affliction he can go out and get employment and continue to draw this pension. I think it is a matter that the District Committee ought to examine with some care, with a view of having some law regulating these payments.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on next Monday, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks upon the subject of trusts and combinations.

THE JEFFERSON MEMORIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was appointed originally upon the committee assigned to visit St. Louis in connection with the Jefferson memorial. I hoped to be able to go, but I find this morning I can not. Therefore I ask the consent of the Senate to withdraw or resign from that committee. I hope the Chair may be able to appoint some one in my stead who will be able to go.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Senator from Iowa will be excused from service upon the committee. The Chair would be under obligation to the Senator from Iowa if he would suggest a successor who could go.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have made no inquiry, Mr. President. I am not able to make the suggestion just now, but I will inquire, and if I can find anyone who will go I will be glad to give the name to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The announcement will not be made until later.

PRINTING OF TARIFF REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

House concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 20,000 additional copies of the report of the Ways and Means Committee on House bill 3321—15,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be apportioned as follows: Two thousand to the Committee on Ways and Means, 1,000 to the House document room, 12,000 to the House folding room; and 5,000 for the use of the Senate.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 65, submitted by Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama on the 24th instant, as modified as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate the number of men in the Diplomatic Service of the United States and in the Consular Service, the States from which appointed, the aggregate salaries of the appointees from the several States and the District of Columbia, and the political party with which such appointees were affiliated at the time of their appointment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this resolution, I take it, is intended to lay the foundation for a radical change in the present system of conducting the Consular Service.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It is merely to permit me to make a suggestion. I am going to ask that the resolution may lie over until the next sitting of the Senate, because I have some additional matter that I wish to present, and I desire to change the character of the resolution a little. I am not prepared to go on with it now.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I have no objection to the resolution going over, but what I desire to say about it can be said as well at this time as any other. I wish, first, to call attention to what has been done and what has been attempted in regard to the Consular Service, which I think has been somewhat overlooked.

It is a very natural desire on the part of the victorious party when they secure control of the administration to fill the consular offices with new men. I quite understand the pressure that exists. I quite understand the desire. I have been through similar situations myself on more than one occasion. But I think, Mr. President, just what has been done in regard to this service not only by successive administrations but by successive Congresses should be considered.

Appointments to the Consular Service of the United States until comparatively recent times have been simply through political favoritism. That system has been carried on by both parties. At times the changes in the service have been so complete that the whole service has been suddenly filled with new men. That condition was so prejudicial to the work of the service that the matter was taken up in Congress, and for many years efforts have been made to improve the Consular Service and make it what it should be—a service for the promotion of the export business of the United States and the protection of its trade and commerce.

The first attempt in that direction I find in a report, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, on the Consular Service, transmitted by President Arthur in 1882. That was followed by a message from President Arthur in 1884, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State, which discussed the whole service with great elaboration with a view to its improvement. President Arthur again brought the subject before Congress in 1885. In the House the question was also taken up and pressed from year to year. The first effort was made in 1886, under President Cleveland's first term, when Mr. Belmont, reporting a bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said:

> The chief purpose of this bill is to put the Consular Service of the United States on a salaried basis, to abolish the uncertain and demoralizing system of compensation by fees, and to bring within the control of Congress a large number of important consular positions which are now practically buried from public scrutiny.

In 1897 Mr. Adams, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, took up the question of the reorganization of the service. He made another report in 1898, another in 1900, and another in 1902. Finally he reported a bill for that purpose in 1903, and again in 1906, which was the year we passed the bill under which reorganization was undertaken.

In 1911 an attempt was made in the House for the improvement of the foreign service by a report by Mr. Lowden, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a Republican, and later one with that object was made by Mr. Sulzer, the present governor of New York, covering the Diplomatic Service.

In the Senate the first attempt to reorganize the Consular Service, place it upon a business basis, and remove it from politics was made by one of the ablest and most patriotic Senators I have ever been associated with in this body, Senator Morgan, of Alabama. He prepared a very elaborate bill for the improvement of the service and submitted it, with a report, in 1895, during Mr. Cleveland's second administration.

In the following year he asked me to take charge of the measure, he being employed with other matters, and I reported the bill, embodying his report as my report for that year.

I reported again legislation to improve the Consular Service in 1900, in 1902, and finally in 1906, the bill under which the reorganization was affected. It will thus be seen that I reported the bill and made elaborate reports during a succession of Congresses from the Committee on Foreign Relations without obtaining any action. Finally, in 1906, we passed the bill which is the present law.
